Kingman, Joseph
Knight, Hiram
Knight, Jefferson
Knight, Joseph
Knowlton, Charles L.
Knowlton, J. S. C.
Knowlton, William H.
Ladd, Gardner P.
Langdon, Wilber C.
Lawrence, Luther
Lawton, Job G., Jr.
Leland, Alden
Lincoln, Abishai
Loomis, E. Justin
Marble, William P.
Marcy, Laban
Marvin, Abijah P.
Mason, Charles
Meader, Reuben
Merritt, Simeon
Monroe, James L.
Moore, James M.
Morss, Joseph B.
Morton, William S.
Nash, Hiram
Nayson, Jonathan
Newman, Charles
Nichols, William
Norton, Alfred
Noyes, Daniel
Nute, Andrew T.
Orne, Benjamin S.
Osgood, Charles
Packer, E. Wing
Paine, Benjamin
Paine, Henry

Friday.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—WOOD.

[July 8th.

Parris, Jonathan
Parsons, Samuel C.
Partridge, John
Peabody, Nathaniel
Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
Penniman, John
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Jesse
Perkins, Noah C.
Phelps, Charles
Phinney, Silvanus B.
Pierce, Henry
Pomroy, Jeremiah
Pool, James M.
Powers, Peter
Putnam, John A.
Rawson, Silas
Richards, Luther
Richardson, Daniel
Richardson, Nathan
Richardson, Samuel H.
Ring, Elkanah, Jr.
Rockwood, Joseph M.
Rogers, John
Ross, David, S.
Royce, James C.
Sanderson, Amasa
Sanderson, Chester
Sheldon, Luther
Sherril, John
Sikes, Chester
Simmons, Perez
Simonds, John W.
Smith, Matthew
Sprague, Melzar
Spooner, Samuel W.
Stevens, Granville

ADSENT.

Allen, James B.
Andrews, Robert
Austin, George
Baker, Hillel
Banks, Nathaniel P., Jr.
Beach, Erasmus D.
Bigelow, Jacob
Bliss, William C.
Bullea, Amos H.
Butler, Benjamin F.
Carter, Timothy W.
Choate, Rufus
Clark, Salah
Coggin, Jacob
Conkey, Ithamar
Denison, Hiram S.
Eustis, William T.
Fellows, James K.
Gooch, Daniel W.
Gourgas, F. R.
Heywood, Levi
Houghton, Samuel
Hunt, William
Huntington, George H.
Hurlburt, Samuel A.
Hyde, Benjamin D.
Kendall, Isaac

Yeas, 123; nays, 243; absent and not voting, 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the final passage of the resolves.

Upon motion of Mr. GRAY, of Boston, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WOOD, of Fitchburg, moved a suspension of the Rules of the Convention requiring that the names of members be called in alphabetical order, with the design of moving that the mode of calling the roll be reversed.

The motion was rejected.

The Secretary then proceeded to call the roll, and upon the final passage of the resolves the vote stood—yeas, 233; nays, 131—as follows:—

YEAS.

Abbott, Josiah G.
Adams, Shubael P.
Allen, Charles
Allen, Joel C.
Allen, Parsons
Alley, John B.
Allis, Josiah
Alvord, D. W.
Austin, George
Ayres, Samuel
Baker, Hillel
Ball, George S.
Bancroft, Alpheus
Bartlett, Russel
Barrett, Marcus
Bates, Eliakim A.
Bates, Moses, Jr.
Beal, John
Bennett, William, Jr.
Bennett, Zephaniah
Bigelow, Edward B.
Bird, Francis W.
Bishop, Henry W.
Bliss, Gad O.
Booth, William S.
Boutwell, George S.
Boutwell, Sewell
Breed, Hiram N.
Brown, Adolphus F.
Brown, Alpheus R.
Brown, Artemas
Brown, Hammond
Brown, Hiram C.
Brownell, Frederick
Brownell, Joseph
Bryant, Patrick
Buck, Asahel
Burlingame, Anson
Cady, Henry
Carruthers, William
Case, Isaac
Chandler, Amariah
Chapin, Daniel E.
Chapin, Henry
Clark, Henry
Clark, Ransom
Clarke, Alpheus B.
Clarke, Stillman
Cleverly, William
Cole, Lansing J.
Cole, Sumner
Coledge, Henry F.
Crane, George B.
Cressy, Oliver S.
Crittenden, Simeon
Cross, Joseph W.
Curtis, Wilber
Cushman, Henry W.
Cushman, Thomas
Cutler, Simeon N.
Dana, Richard H., Jr.
Davis, Ebenezer
Davis, Isaac
Day, Gilman
Dean, Silas
Deming, Elijah S.
Denton, Augustus
DeWitt, Alexander
Duncan, Samuel
Dunham, Bradish
Durgin, John M.
Eames, Philip
Earle, John M.
Easland, Peter
Easton, James, 2d
Eaton, Calvin D.
Edwards, Elisha
Edwards, Samuel
Ely, Joseph M.
Fay, Sullivan
Fellows, James K.
Fiske, Emery
Fisk, Lyman
Fitch, Ezekiel W.
Foster, Aaron

Penniman, John
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Jesse
Perkins, Noah C.
Phelps, Charles
Phinney, Silvanus B.
Pierce, Henry
Pomroy, Jeremiah
Pool, James M.
Powers, Peter
Putnam, John A.
Rawson, Silas
Richards, Luther
Richardson, Daniel
Richardson, Nathan
Richardson, Samuel H.
Ring, Elkanah, Jr.
Rockwood, Joseph M.
Rogers, John
Ross, David S.
Royce, James C.
Sanderson, Amasa
Sanderson, Chester
Sherril, John
Sikes, Chester
Simonds, John W.
Smith, Matthew
Sprague, Melzar
Spooner, Samuel W.
Stevens, William
Stiles, Gideon
Strong, Alfred L.

NAYS.

Abbott, Alfred A.
Adams, Benjamin P.
Aldrich, P. Emory
Appleton, William
Aspinwall, William
Atwood, David C.
Barrows, Joseph
Bartlett, Sidney
Beach, Erasmus D.
Bell, Luther V.
Blagden, George W.
Bradbury, Ebenezer
Bradford, William J. A.
Braman, Milton P.
Brewster, Osmyn
Brinley, Francis
Briggs, George N.
Bronson, Asa
Bullock, Rufus
Bumpus Cephas C.
Chapin, Chester W.
Childs, Josiah
Churchill, J. McKean
Cogswell, Nathaniel
Cook, Charles E.
Copeland, Benjamin F.
Crockett, George W.
Crosby, Leander
Crowell, Seth
Crowninshield, F. B.
Cummings, Joseph
Davis, Charles G.
Davis, John
Davis, Robert T.
Davis, Solomon
Dawes, Henry L.
Doane, James C.
Dorman, Moses
Eaton, Lilley
Ely, Homer
Farwell, A. G.
Fowler, Samuel P.
French, Charles H.
Gardner, Henry J.
Gould, Robert
Goulding, Dalton
Goulding, Jason
Gray, John C.
Greenleaf, Simon
Hale, Artemas
Hale, Nathan
Hammond, A. B.

Sumner, Charles
Sumner, Increase
Swain, Alanson
Thayer, Willard, 2d
Thomas, John W.
Tilton, Abraham
Tilton, Horatio W.
Turner, David P.
Tyler, William
Underwood, Orison
Viles, Joel
Vinton, George A.
Wallace, Frederick T.
Wallis, Freeland
Walker, Amasa
Ward, Andrew H.
Warner, Marshal
Warner, Samuel, Jr.
Weston, Gershon, B.
White, Benjamin
White, George
Whitney, Daniel S.
Williams, J. B.
Wilson, Henry
Wilson, Willard
Winslow, Levi M.
Wood, Charles C.
Wood, Nathaniel
Wood, Otis
Wood, William H.
Wright, Ezekiel

Friday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, &c. — MORTON — SUMNER.

[July 8th.

Stetson, Caleb
Stevens, Charles G.
Stevens, Granville
Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Stevenson, J. Thomas
Talbot, Thomas
Taylor, Ralph
Thayer, Joseph
Thompson, Charles
Tilston, Edmund P.
Tyler, John S.
Upham, Charles W.
Upton, George B.
Walcott, Samuel B.

ABSENT.

Allen, James B.
Andrews, Robert
Ballard, Alvah
Banks, Nath'l P., Jr.
Beebe, James M.
Bigelow, Jacob
Bliss, William C.
Bullen, Amos H.
Butler, Benjamin F.
Carter, Timothy W.
Choate, Rufus
Clark, Salah
Coggin, Jacob
Conkey, Ithamar
Dehon, William
Denison, Hiram S.
Eustis, William T.
Frothingham, R., Jr.
Gourgas, F. R.
Hall, Charles B.
Hapgood, Lyman W.
Heywood, Levi
Hobart, Aaron
Houghton, Samuel
Hunt, William
Huntington, George H.
Hurlburt, Samuel A.
Hyde, Benjamin D.

Absent and not voting, 55.

And the resolves were finally passed.

Upon motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, at 1 o'clock, the Convention adjourned until 3 P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at 3 o'clock.

Basis of Representation.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. It will be recollected, that in my remarks yesterday, I expressed a determination to offer, for the consideration of the Convention, an alternative proposition. This morning, by the courtesy of the Convention, I had an opportunity to offer that proposition. It was but a very short time before the vote was to be taken on the general proposition, in relation to representation, and the several amendments. It was suggested by some of my friends who did not agree with me in opinion upon that subject, that it was rather a surprise upon the Convention, and that there was not sufficient opportunity of investigating and discussing it. Being entirely unwilling to do anything which would operate as a surprise, or what would even have the appearance of operating as a surprise, or of preventing a full and free discussion of the subject, I then withdrew the proposition, at the same time declaring, that it was my intention to avail myself of the first opportunity to present it again to the consideration of the Convention.

Mr. President, on this great subject, which we

Walker, Samuel
Waters, Asa H.
Weeks, Cyrus
Wetmore, Thomas
Wheeler, William F.
Wilbur, Daniel
Wilbur, Joseph
Wilder, Joel
Wilkins, John H.
Wilkinson, Ezra
Williams, Henry
Wilson, Milo
Winn, Jonathan B.

have been discussing for a long time, and which, I trust, we are about to draw to a close, there certainly is a great diversity of opinion. Gentlemen have expressed their views with freedom, and we have had a direct vote upon the question; and a great majority of the Convention have decided against my motion. It not my wish, in any form, again to call up that question. But it seems to me, that taking into view the various circumstances attending the transaction, the difference of opinion among the members of the Convention, and above all, their difference in relation to the wishes of the people on the subject, that it would be no more than reasonable and proper to submit to the people the choice between the two systems which have been brought before the Convention, and fully discussed by them. But, my desire is, so to present this subject to the people, that they may have an opportunity to decide, in the first place, whether they will amend the existing Constitution; and in the second place, if they choose to amend the Constitution, whether they will prefer one or the other of the two systems; that is, whether they will choose the district system, or the town system. I do not intend to go into a discussion of the question; but there is one suggestion, which, in the outset, I wish to make.

Many members of the Convention have supposed, that if we presented a town representative system alone to the people, they would prefer the old Constitution to that, and, therefore, we should gain nothing by it. Others have supposed, that if we presented a district system to the people, they would prefer the old system to that, and, therefore, we should get no amendment of the Constitution; but if we can present the subject so as to let them have a choice between the two systems, it would seem to be very manifest, that we should get rid of the old system, which appears to be objectionable to most people, and should adopt whichever of the other two systems the people prefer. For myself, I have a very strong belief, that the district system would be the best for the Commonwealth, and would receive the greatest favor from the people; but if it is submitted to them, and they prefer the other, no man would be more ready to acquiesce in their decision than myself. I therefore propose to submit the same amendment which I offered in Convention, this morning, and I am willing, that such disposition should be made of it as is most agreeable to the Convention, especially those who wish to be heard upon the subject. In order that it may be brought before the Convention, and be fully understood, and discussed just as much as the members of this body choose, I submit it, and would like to have it go into the Orders of the Day, and to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT. As it provides for an amendment of the Constitution, it will be necessary that it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORTON. If that is the opinion of the Chair, I shall acquiesce in it. I supposed, that as it was merely instructions to the Committee, it did not come within the rule. I am perfectly content that it shall take that course. All I desire, is to have a full and free expression of the Convention, upon the question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the rule on the subject. The fifty-second rule provides that "every order or resolution, which proposes an alteration in the Constitution," shall be considered in Committee of the Whole, before it is debated and finally acted upon in Convention.

Mr. MORTON. I will move then, that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole and printed. I am willing to let it take its course and come up at some future time. I hope, however, it will be at no distant day.

The motion was agreed to.

Report from a Committee.

Mr. SUMNER, for Marshfield, from the Committee on the Bill of Rights, submitted the following Report:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 8, 1853.

The Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution as is contained in the Preamble and the Bill of Rights;

Also, the Memorial of John W. LeBarnes, and sundry petitioners in aid thereof, against any establishment or recommendation of religion;

Also, the petition of J. A. Saxton, and of sundry others, for the protection of fugitive slaves;

Also, the petition of James B. Allen, and of sundry others, for the abolition of imprisonment for debt;

Also, the order of the Convention bearing date May 13th, concerning personal liberty and trial by jury;

Also, the order of May 10th, on the descent of property to aliens;

Also, the order of May 10th, on imprisonment for debt;

Also, the order of June 6th, on the poor debtor's oath;

Also, the order of May 28th, on releases from the payment of honest debts;

Also, the order of May 16th, on the tenure of the Supreme Judicial Court;

Also, the order of May 16th, on the suspension of laws;

Also, the order of May 20th, on the liberty to pursue any business, trade, or employment;

Also, the order of May 13th, on criminal proceedings for libel;

Also, the order of May 12th, on distinctions of color;

Also, the order of May 27th, on a judicial remedy against the Commonwealth;

Have had the same under consideration, and now report to the Convention the Preamble and Bill of Rights, with the following resolutions:—

CHARLES SUMNER, Chairman.

1. Resolved, That the Bill of Rights be amended by adding to the eleventh article, as part of the same, the following words:—

"And every person having a claim against the Commonwealth, ought to have a judicial remedy therefor."

2. Resolved, That the Bill of Rights be amended by inserting, between the eleventh and twelfth articles, the following additional article, being identical with one now in another chapter of the Constitution, and which more appropriately belongs to the Bill of Rights, viz.:—

"VII. The privilege and benefit of the writ of habeas corpus shall be enjoyed in this Commonwealth in the most free, easy, cheap, expeditious and ample manner; and shall not be suspended by the legislature, except upon the most urgent and pressing occasions, and for a limited time, not exceeding twelve months."

3. Resolved, That the Bill of Rights be amended

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT, &c.—STETSON.

[July 8th.

in the last sentence of the twenty-ninth article, by striking out the words "so long as they behave themselves well, and that they," and inserting, "by tenures established by the Constitution, and"; also, by striking out the words "ascertained and established by standing laws," and inserting, "which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office," so that the whole sentence, as amended, shall read as follows: "It is, therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, and of every citizen, that the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court should hold their office by tenures established by the Constitution, and should have honorable salaries, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

4. Resolved, That the Bill of Rights be amended by inserting between the twenty-ninth and thirtieth articles, the following additional article:—"This enumeration of rights shall not impair others retained by the people, and no powers shall ever be assumed by the legislature that are not granted in this Constitution."

Loaning the Credit of the State.

On motion of Mr. STETSON, of Braintree, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Boutwell, for Berlin, in the chair, on the unfinished business, being the subject of Loaning the Credit of the State, the Committee on that subject having reported that it is inexpedient for the Convention to act upon the same.

The question being on agreeing to the Report, Mr. STETSON, proposed to amend the Report by substituting for the conclusion of the same, the following:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended, that hereafter the State shall not loan its credit to any corporation, association, or individual, unless the question shall first be submitted to the people, and a declared majority voting thereon, shall sanction the act.

Mr. STETSON. The other day, this subject was somewhat discussed, and a vote was taken thereon. I spoke upon the question at that time, and I shall endeavor, if possible, not to repeat any remark which I then made. I shall confine my remarks, in the first place, on this occasion, to the question of State sovereignty, having regard to the rights of the people; and in the second place, I shall examine the question of the liability of legislative bodies to be influenced by outside, ulterior influences, self-interest and party considerations, in which, I shall, for illustration, show that legislative bodies, heretofore, have failed to represent the will of the people. And then, Sir, I shall inquire into the question, whether or not, this body is charged with corruption. I understood the gentleman from Boston, who spoke upon this question, the other day, to say that he was opposed to the passage of the amendment, because it relinquished the State sovereignty, by giving it up to the people, and that he was in favor of holding the power of sovereignty in a firm grasp. I will ask that gentleman where he can find, that the people ever delegated to the sovereignty of the State, the power to loan its credit to any corporation, association, or individual.

I contend, that no such doctrine can be pointed out in our Constitution; and the doctrine maintained is an usurped power, whenever exercised without the direct assent of the people.

Mr. ALVORD, for Montague. I rise to a point of order. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is speaking on the amendment that he has proposed, which is precisely the same in substance with the amendment that he proposed several days ago, and which was rejected. I rise to a question of order, whether such an amendment is in order now.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon examination, it is the opinion of the Chair, that the amendment is not in order. When the Convention was in Committee of the Whole, on a former day, the gentleman from Braintree, submitted the following amendment:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that hereafter no loan of the State credit shall be granted to any corporation or individual, unless the question be first submitted to the people.

That amendment was rejected by the Committee. The gentleman from Braintree, now proposes an amendment in the following words:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that hereafter the State shall not loan its credit to any corporation, association, or individual, unless the question shall first be submitted to the people, and a declared majority voting thereon, shall sanction the act.

The Chair is of the opinion, that it comes within the rule, being the same in substance, and is, therefore, not in order. The question recurs on agreeing to the Report of the Committee.

Mr. STETSON. If it will be in order, then, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the Committee refused to agree to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has passed within which the gentleman could move a reconsideration of that vote.

Mr. STETSON. Well, Sir, I suppose I may as well go on and say what I have to say. I was about to remark, that those prerogatives of power were never yielded by the people, in forming a social compact, and never should be submitted to by a people whose basis of government rests upon the pure principles of democracy; and that is what our fathers fought for and secured to us for all time to come. The institution of government is made and formed by men yielding some portion of their natural rights for self-protection, and for the protection of the whole body of the people.

In a democratic form of government, we yield only those rights which are absolutely necessary to form a social compact, in order to maintain a stable and good government for the whole people. Let me read an extract from the Declaration of Rights. It says: "The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not, or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America, in congress assembled." The question then arises, whether this right of the people of this Commonwealth to loan its credit is one of those rights delegated by the people in forming their organic law; and, Sir, I maintain that it is not one of those rights. I will ask any gentleman in this Convention to point out any place in the Constitution of this State, where the people have ever delegated to their representatives any power to loan the credit of the State to any corporation, or individual, or company. I say it is an usurped power, and that I will maintain. The power of loaning the credit of the State, for such purposes, is not one of State sovereignty. The people of Massachusetts have never delegated such power, either by any constitutional provision, or statute law. It is one of those acts which are of doubtful authority. It is clearly one of those acts not necessary for the safety, security, or maintenance of good government. Therefore, when such grants are asked for, a clear case should be made out, that the welfare of the people requires such grants. The question should be submitted to the whole people whether they will, in their capacity of town representation, uphold us; let them have an opportunity to say "yea" or "nay" thereon.

It may be asked, why not refer the question to one legislature, and then to a succeeding one? My answer is, the people have never delegated to their representatives or agents any such power. Such powers are implied, and though they have, heretofore, been exercised by the representatives of this State, it is time the people should express their opinion upon such concentration and usurpation of power.

The delegates, or agents, sent by the sovereign people to the legislature, should represent the rights of the people. Now I ask if there have not been instances in the State legislature, and in the congress of the United States, when the representatives of the people, have passed acts in derogation of the rights of the people, and where we may suppose they were corrupted, in some degree, by outside influences, or interested motives, so that the rights of the people were trodden under foot? There have been instances, and with the permission of the Committee I propose to state two or three, which occurred in our colonial history, and two, among the numerous class of cases which have occurred under our present form of government. The first instance to which I would call the attention of the Committee, was during the administration of John Adams. Those who have read the history of those times, know that a company was formed called the Yazoo Company, which obtained, by attending the legislature of Georgia, and bribing its members, the possession of five millions of acres of land, for a trifling sum of money. I suppose the members of this Convention will see in this bribery of the members of the Georgia legislature, a good reason why we should have a large one. They were bribed out of five millions of acres of land, and the parties obtained possession of it. When it became known to the people of the State, that they had been cheated out of this large domain, they reversed the decision of the legislature, and pronounced the law by which the grant was made, unconstitutional, fraudulent and void. It was not only repealed, but it was burnt by the common hangman, and the record of it expunged from the statute book. Yet, notwithstanding these facts, known to all men, a company of individuals in other States, known as the New England and Mississippi Land Company, purchased this claim and fraudulent title, and presented their petition to congress, asking remuneration for the land. This proposition was brought in under the administration of Jefferson, and exposed and condemned by the instrumentality of John Randolph.

Another case occurred under our colonial history, in the year 1740. A company petitioned the legislature for a bank, called a Land Bank.

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—STETSON.

[July 8th.

The basis upon which this bank was established, was land, and the name arose from the fact, that land was the means by which it was carried on. The process was this: a certain company of speculators and farmers who held land, were associated together, and were to, and did issue bills as money, which represented land, at such prices as the company stipulated, and they were issued to the amount of each stockholder's valuation, without any provision by which they might be redeemed. No provision was made for their redemption. They were to be received as money, at par. It met with general favor, in consequence of the plausibility of the scheme. Hutchinson was then Speaker of the House, and most of the leading men of the day opposed it, with all the power they could command, as a measure fraught with corruption and detrimental to the interest of the colony, yet, notwithstanding every appliance which was brought to bear upon the colonial assembly to put down the iniquitous scheme, it was carried through both Houses. It went through all stages of the assembly, and became a law by a large majority. After the bank was established, it was found that a large majority of the colonial assembly were stockholders in this scheme, while the act was going through the forms of law. Within a year after its existence, they issued £150,000 of currency, which was not worth anything, and the governor finding no other remedy to put a stop to such a system of fraud, applied to the home government, and an act was passed, under King George I., called the Bubble Act. It was made to apply to America, and thus a veto was put upon this iniquitous scheme, which was obtained by fraud and corruption of the colonial assembly, and it put an end to the further issue of bills of credit until the commencement of the revolutionary war.

Another instance of fraud grew out of the establishment of the United States Bank in 1816. The motives of a portion of those who obtained the charter, no doubt, were patriotic and sincere. On the other hand, some members of congress, with outside influences brought to bear, were to obtain a charter for stock-jobbing purposes, in order to enrich themselves and friends. When the bank charter was obtained, it was in the hands of those who committed the greatest frauds at the expense of the public. By the aid of some members of congress, a majority of the board were stock-jobbers, who obtained power for speculative purposes. One of the most notorious was G. Williams, of Baltimore, who obtained eleven hundred shares of stock by signing his name for eleven hundred individuals. He, in consequence, was chosen a director. The stock of the bank, during the year 1817, was run up to $156 per share. In 1818, the bubble burst, and with it, one of its directors, who had discounts to the amount of three and a half millions of dollars. They lost over one and a half millions by that individual. The bank, in 1817, was insolvent, and history will prove it so; and it never, from 1818, down through its whole existence, was able to pay its debts. I know, that by its transfer to the State of Pennsylvania, it shoved off its iniquitous and bad debts upon the shoulders of the State. The stock, in 1818, was down to 110. It is not my purpose to expose the great frauds committed upon the public at this time; my only purpose now, is to say, that the very inception of the bank was fraud, and was the consequence of more fraud and injustice to the people than any act of a legislative assembly of the present century. It is not yet time to write its history. I suppose these are some of the public frauds growing out of legislative action. And are we to suppose these are the only public frauds upon the people? There are hundreds of cases which may be cited, in our history, more or less of an aggravated nature.

And, Sir, I ask it as a privilege to state, that I believe, by the truest construction which can be put upon print, that this body, as respectable as it is, is charged with corruption by one of our own members, and I desire to state what I consider to be the charge. I hold in my hand a paper called the Plymouth Rock, dated June 30, 1853, and in it I find the following article:—

"The discussion this morning, was upon the question of loaning the State credit, and at no time during the session has Whig intrigue and political duplicity stood out in such bold relief. For the honor of the Convention, I wish it were otherwise, but yet I am forced to the conclusion, that much of the debate to-day was influenced by the money of the Western Railroad. Part of the object of the Whigs has been to distract and divide the reform members of the Convention, but in the main it is a strike at the Hoosac Tunnel."

Now, Sir, I do not believe the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Bates,) intended to charge me with corruption; but he has. And I feel somewhat as St. Paul did, when one of his members suffered, the whole body suffered. I feel so, for the members of this body; and I consider, that if I suffer, they suffer. I ask any gentleman who has heard me read that paragraph, if that is not a charge of corruption. I do not believe that my friend upon the right, (Mr. Bates,) intended to do what he has done. But, Sir, that charge has been made by other persons than himself, and members upon this floor have been charged with speaking here, by being fed with the money of the Western Railroad. I ask, if that were the case, would it not be one of the strongest reasons in the world why the legislature should never have the power of loaning the State credit? When it can be charged upon any corporation, that they come here to corrupt the members of this Convention, is it not time that the Constitution should provide, that State aid should not be granted to such or to any corporations?

But, Sir, I fear nothing from the charge at all; and I only need say, that I do not believe a word of it is true. But I believe this, that such charges are made to prejudice the stockholders of the Western Railroad, and to prevent their being in league and intrigue with some members of this Convention. It is done for the purpose of raising capital out of it, in favor of particular objects. But, Sir, if there is any member of this Convention who has received pay for making speeches here, from the hands of the Western Railroad, I trust, in all conscience, he will rise in his place and own up. [Laughter.]

I do not believe that a matter of so much moment as this should ever be left in the hands of those who will log-roll, and who will, without hesitation, use every means in their power to induce the legislature to carry through certain measures in which members may have a personal interest. I believe this measure is one, that, when taken in all its bearings, is of important import.

I believe it is the duty of every true democrat to do all in his power to secure the largest liberty of the people, and to oppose, to the extent of his influence, any and every measure that will have the effect to place a restraint upon the liberties of the people. Sir, this proposition will take away from men that right which they possess by nature, and which they never gave up in the formation of the government. Sir, I repeat, that so far as personal liberty is consistent with the maintenance of government, it should be meted out to every individual; and that no power on earth should be brought to bear to detract from or to take away any of those rights which each individual enjoys and which he has the right to enjoy under the Constitution.

Sir, the true democrat has the law of liberty inscribed upon his heart. Jefferson once said: "A wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another; shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned;—this is the sum of good government. I believe this is the strongest government on earth." And let me refer to the opinions of other distinguished men. Grattan says: "The people who take away the liberty of their fellow subjects, lose their empire." Charles J. Fox once said, that, "he was compelled to own, that the democratic form of government gives a power, of which no other form is capable. Why? Because it incorporates every man with the state; because it makes every individual feel that he is working for himself; that it is his own cause, his own safety, his own dignity—on the face of the earth." Legare said: "The law of liberty must be inscribed in the heart of the citizen. The very first pilgrim that set his foot upon Plymouth Rock, stepped forth a living constitution, armed at all points to perpetuate liberty." The law of liberty is inscribed in the heart of every true democrat.

And I wish now to say, notwithstanding the eloquent appeals which I have heard, from time to time, made upon this floor, to the democracy to preserve the purity of our institutions; yet at the very close of the argument, I have seen those gentlemen propose to vote for a measure which could have no other tendency than to corrupt and destroy that purity. Sir, I appeal to this Convention, if there is any act of mine which has been in opposition to the professions I have made. I know that gentlemen have precedents for such a course, and illustrious precedents, too. And this brings to my mind the fact, that Patrick Henry, a man whose fame was world-wide as an orator, whose rhetoric, whose genius, and whose superior talents, probably accomplished very much in securing to us the adoption of true democratic principles, and the liberty which we possess. But after he went into quiet retirement, he became soured from some cause, and what was the result? Why, Sir, he receded from his old opinions. The eloquence and lofty character of that man was clouded. He set at naught, in the sunset of his declining years, the very principles, which, with great eloquence, he had labored to sustain during the trying period of the Revolution, and cast a cloud over the national fame at the very close of his existence on earth. In 1799, he took the stump against the election of Mr. Jefferson, and what did he do? He belied every republican doctrine which he had maintained during the whole course of his political career.

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — STETSON — MORTON — ALVORD.

[July 8th.

He supported the alien and sedition law of John Adams, whereby the one-man-power was completely established; which gave to the president the right to lay his hands upon the shoulder of any man who had offended him, by not voting as he wanted him to, or in any way, and put him in prison; and which gave him the right to send back, if he should see fit, every foreign emigrant that came to our shores. In the time of the Revolution, his cry was Liberty! Liberty! but now it was Power! Power! Now, Sir, with such an example, it is not a matter of wonder that men of our day should pursue the same course. John Randolph said that he learned his political principles of Patrick Henry; and when he became just old enough to take the stump, Patrick Henry apostatized from that democratic faith, and he took the stump against him; and John Randolph defeated him upon those issues.

Sir, it was in that school that I learned my political principles: principles which I have held during my whole life, and I defy any man to bring the charge against me, that I have preached good republican doctrine, and then turned round and "kicked the pail over." [Laughter.] I defy any man to show me when I have apostatized from the true democratic faith.

But, Sir, I know some gentlemen who are the lesser lights of democracy, but who, nevertheless, preach the true doctrines of democracy outside of this House; who come in here and preach the worst kind of Tory doctrines that ever existed previous to the Revolution. That is a truth which is not to be denied. But, Sir, I come here a true Jefferson democrat, as far as I understand the doctrines of Jefferson. And I am content with that doctrine. I will not, here or elsewhere, advocate any principle which I believe is not true, is not right, is not just to every man in the Commonwealth. I will not submit to any doctrine of mere expediency in this Convention; although I regret to see that there are men here who will maintain that doctrine. Sir, I look upon this concentration of power as a doctrine which, if carried out, will destroy the rights of the people, and take away their liberties. I want this question submitted to the whole people. I want them to have the power to determine whether the credit of the State shall be loaned or not. Any doctrine which will not accord this to the people, is, in my judgment, anti-democratic; it is a doctrine of the concentration of power; a doctrine which, while it professes to accede to the wishes of the people, will not give them an opportunity of expressing their wishes in relation to it; a doctrine of expediency by which they use the people just as they please, while they pretend to accord to their wishes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, although I have not been speaking to the question to which I intended to speak; that is, to the amendment which is before us, I trust I shall be pardoned for what I have said. The main question before us is, whether we will submit this question to the people or not; whether we shall permit them to govern their own affairs in this matter of concentrating the power of government under the dominion of one man; because that is the result of these resolves, as they were originally reported to us. It is whether we shall take away the rights of the people.

Again, this amendment which I propose to insert is not one which conflicts with the right to make provisions for internal improvement by law. It does not affect our right to contract debts or to defend ourselves against invasion or insurrection. It has nothing to do with anything of that sort. It is simply a question whether we will allow the voters of the Commonwealth to deprive themselves of the right to control the State debts, or whether they will delegate this most important right to representatives who may be subject to bribery, and under the control of outside influence.

But, Sir, it was said, in debate, the other day, that this was not a measure demanded by the people, and gentlemen were afraid to meet the issue. Afraid of what? Why, afraid that if this provision were inserted in the Constitution, the Constitution itself would lose 10,000 votes on that account, when it came to be submitted to the people. Now, I want to know if there is any man here who supposes he can overawe us by declaring that he, or any other person, will withhold 10,000 votes from this Constitution, because it may contain a provision that will affect certain localities in the State? Sir, if this is the legislation, if this is the purpose for which we came to this Convention, I say, God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts! If such are the tactics of any party upon this floor; if it is the purpose of any portion of this Convention to effect such ulterior objects by bragging and corruption; and if the Convention are to act under such influences, then I say, good-bye to all our rights—political, moral or civil. But, Sir, I have no fear in this matter. If those persons believe that the people of the Commonwealth are in favor of this measure, why are they not willing to submit it to the will of the sovereign people? Why not provide that the legislature shall submit that question to the people? Sir, I maintain that under the Constitution, as it now stands, the legislature have not the right to loan the credit of the State to any association, individual or corporation, without ascertaining the will of every legal voter in the Commonwealth in relation to it. No man can point out any paragraph in the Constitution under which we live, that confers any such authority; and I say that every departure from that principle of Democracy is one step towards undermining our whole system of democratic republican government. Sir, that is the doctrine for which Jefferson and his party fought; which they obtained, and under which these United States have prospered so well, for the last fifty years.

Sir, if these are the doctrines of conservatism; of conservative central power which we are to adopt, I think it is time to let the people know the exact position we take. I am not afraid to trust the people. I contend that the power of loaning the money or credit of every individual in the Commonwealth is in his own hands. Men, by forming themselves into social compact, do not, and never have yielded any such right, whatever, to the government. Therefore, I hope this Convention will not separate until they have taken away this exciting question, which, otherwise, for all time to come, is to be made an important element in our political contests. Sir, I saw something in relation to this very matter, which was a disgrace to the State, before the legislature closed its session last spring. I was in the city at the time, and I heard fifty or a hundred guns booming away, like the Fourth of July in March. [Laughter.] I wanted to know what was the matter, and I was told that they were burning up powder at the expense of one of the corporations established by the laws of Massachusetts. And what was the reason given for it? Why, that they had carried through the legislature a measure which they deemed to be for their particular interest. And this State, to its everlasting disgrace, permitted one hundred pounds of powder to be burned in this manner, for this reason, by one of her children. They burned all this powder, and then come here, and ask the loan of the State credit to pay for it! Well, Sir, it is all right, I suppose; but I say it is an eternal disgrace to the State, that ever such a proceeding should have been permitted.

But, Sir, I do not propose to delay the Committee upon this subject. I have said nearly all I have to say; but I think that involved in this matter are some of the most important questions which have arisen, or will ever arise, connected with the welfare and prosperity of those who may come after us. I hope that the Convention will submit this question to the people; and if they will not do this simple act of justice, then I think that they are not proper judges of what the people wish for and demand.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton, moved to amend, so as to provide that the State credit shall not be loaned without the consent of the people, and that the liabilities of the State shall not exceed, in the aggregate, the sum of one million of dollars, unless incurred to repel invasion or suppress insurrection.

Mr. ALVORD, for Montague, inquired whether this amendment was not identical with the one heretofore proposed by the gentleman from Braintree, and therefore out of order?

The Chairman ruled that the amendment was in order.

Mr. ALVORD, for Montague. I do not propose to discuss the question raised by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) of the right of the legislature, under the present Constitution, to loan the credit of the State. To me, that seems to be scarcely an open question now; but I would suggest, if the views of the gentleman from Braintree are correct, and, under the present Constitution, the legislature has no such right, then no such amendment, as that proposed by the gentleman from Taunton, is needed. The whole object is accomplished without any action by this Convention. If the views of those who have advocated this measure here, are similar to those of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) I submit to those gentlemen, that they are giving themselves a great deal of unnecessary trouble, and taking up the time of this Convention for no practical object. They have what they want already.

This debate, it seems to me, has proceeded very much upon a false issue. From nearly every speaker who has addressed the Committee, thus far, we have heard of the Hoosac Tunnel, and of little else. This remark may not apply, directly, to the gentleman from Braintree, who last addressed the Committee. He talked to us of the character of Patrick Henry, which had no more to do with the subject before us, than the Hoosac Tunnel, but certainly about as much. In that State paper, sometimes called the programme of the campaign, to which my friend from Brookline, (Mr. Aspinwall,) occasionally calls our at-

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—ALVORD.

[July 8th.]

tention, I find no mention made of the Hoosac Tunnel. In the Democratic State Address, which also has occasionally been called the programme of the campaign, I find no mention made of the Hoosac Tunnel. In no speech, in no article in any newspaper, advocating the calling of this Convention, so far as my recollection extends, is any mention made of the Hoosac Tunnel. I submit that we were not sent to this Convention for the purpose of taking any action, one way or the other, upon that subject. We have other duties to perform, we were sent here for other purposes. To me it seems that the Hoosac Tunnel has no business upon this floor, and I desire to call back the attention of the Committee to the real question at issue here. For many years it has been the policy of Massachusetts to extend its fostering aid and care to the internal improvements of the State, extending it in many ways, by the granting of liberal charters of incorporation, and, when occasion required, by more direct means. When any project came up, which, from its newness and the character of experiment which it presented, made capitalists shy in taking hold of it, and investing the necessary funds, when any project has been of such magnitude as to be beyond the reach of private capital, the State has stepped in, and, by the loan of its credit, has enabled the work to be accomplished. I believe all will agree with me, that, to some little extent, at least, the present unexampled prosperity of Massachusetts, in all material things, is due to these improvements, and that, had the policy of Massachusetts been otherwise, the present position of affairs here might have been very different. The question now before us is nothing more than this. Shall such policy hereafter be prohibited? That is the question and not that of the Hoosac Tunnel. Shall the gate now be shut down, and Massachusetts refuse, from this time forth, ever again to extend its aid to these projects of internal improvement? I know that the proposition, in its terms, is not necessarily a prohibition, but such must be its effect, if it shall be adopted. It is possible to cause the legislature to be fully informed of the merits of any particular project, although it is difficult to do even that. It can only be done at the expense of much labor, time, and money. Witnesses must be brought from a distance, and kept in the city many days, or even weeks. Counsel must be employed, surveys must be made, plans and models must be prepared and presented, and often it is necessary to take a Committee of the legislature, or even a larger portion of that body, to the ground where the improvement is proposed to be made, that they may view it and judge of the merits of the proposed undertaking. Through these means, at much expense, it is possible to cause the legislature to be fully informed of the merits of a proposed improvement. How can the whole people of Massachusetts be so informed? I submit that it is utterly impossible. I know that you may have a hearing before a Committee of the legislature, testimony may be taken, arguments made, and the whole subject presented in a document circulated broad-cast through the State; but even such a document, prepared with the utmost care, and circulated through the State, with the utmost industry, could scarcely reach one-fifth of the voters of the State; and of those whom it might reach, not one in ten would ever read it and inform themselves fully of the merits of the project. So that, necessarily, if this amendment shall prevail, the people must vote upon a question of this kind in comparative ignorance. The result cannot be doubtful. Thus this amendment, though in its terms only a check, is, in fact, a prohibition, and if it is adopted, the gate is shut down for all coming time, to such aids as the State has heretofore granted to works of internal improvement.

Allow me, here, to express my surprise at some developments in this debate. There is probably no member of the Convention who does not favor, to a greater or less extent, appropriations by the general government for national objects, although I know there is great diversity of opinion as to the extent. Every gentleman agrees, that such appropriation should be made for harbors upon our seaboard, for light-houses and other facilities for commerce. Few deny that such appropriations are proper upon the harbors of our great lakes, for the improvement of the navigation of our great lakes and rivers. Indeed, I believe that a large majority go even farther than that, and favor appropriations by the general government, for such great internal improvements as the proposed Pacific Railroad. Congress after congress, intensely democratic, have made appropriations of public lands, in aid of works still more local in their character. I would like to have any gentleman here explain to me the consistency of advocating such appropriations by the general government, and opposing aid by the State, to State improvements. I can well understand how a man might advocate aid by the State, to State improvements, and oppose aid by the general government to national improvements. Such diversity of opinion and action might grow out of the different nature and objects of the two governments, the general government being a confederacy of very limited and restricted powers. But I cannot understand how any man can approve of aid by the general government, to national objects, and oppose aid by the State government to State objects. The State is much nearer to the people, and has a much more direct duty to foster enterprise and improvement. I would like to have gentlemen explain the consistency of their advocacy of the appropriations in the one case, and opposition to them in the other. No gentleman, so far as I am aware, has ever suggested, that the national government should first propose the question to the people, before it extends its aid to the Pacific Railroad, or harbors upon the sea-coast. I would ask if one of our State works of internal improvements, calculated to facilitate the inter-communication of the people of the State, and to aid the trade of the people with each other, and with other States, is not as properly and legitimately an object of State care and aid, as any harbor or river can be of national care and aid? It seems to me that there can be no doubt about this.

Allow me, here, to make another suggestion of a similar nature. We are preparing a Constitution to be submitted to the people. Under that Constitution, as it now stands, county authorities will be authorized to lay out public highways at the public expense, which may be built, in whole or in part, from the county funds, or the expense may be thrown upon the towns through which they run. And yet no gentleman proposes to prohibit the county commissioners from incurring any such expenses without first asking the leave of the people of the county. Why not? Where is the difference in principle? I know that many distinctions may be drawn, between a county road and a railroad, but I think no distinction can be drawn between them as touching this matter. One has for its object, as much as the other, inter-communication, and to facilitate trade between different parts of the State. The objects and purposes of the two are identical, and can any gentleman give me a reason why it is proper that the public money should be used in one case, and improper that it should be so used in the other? I should like an answer to that question. If it is proper to tax the people directly, for a thousand less efficient means of trade and inter-communication, can it be improper to loan the credit of the State, in aid of more important and efficient means of trade and inter-communication?

I have already said, that the past policy of the State in this respect, has undoubtedly done much towards occasioning our present state of prosperity. How much, no man knows. Suppose that our forefathers, in 1780, and those who succeeded them in 1820, had inserted in the Constitution a clause of prohibition such as is now proposed to be incorporated in that instrument, what would have been its effect upon the prosperity of Massachusetts? I will not say that the Western Railroad would never have been built. It might have proved, in time, within the means of private capital. No man can say, with confidence, that it would have been yet built. This much we do know—if it had proved to be within the reach of private capital, the time of its completion would have been very much delayed, and long years would have passed before the great work would have been finished. What would have been the effect upon Massachusetts, had the Western Railroad been thus delayed? Boston would scarcely have contained one hundred and forty thousand people now. The county of Bristol might have scarcely been at this moment in its present state of prosperity. Taunton and Fall River might not, as now, have been overflowing with a busy and prosperous population. Salem and Newburyport might have languished still. It might not have been thus, but no man can say, with any certainty, how great an effect it might have produced. Suppose the early Constitution of New York had contained a similar clause of prohibition. We know that the Erie Canal, and the great system of canals, which has so added prosperity not only to New York but to New England and the West, would not have been completed. What would have been the effect of such a policy upon the city of New York, and what would it have been upon the cities and towns which dot the Hudson? What would have been its effect upon that great line of cities and towns running through the centre of the State, along the canal, from Albany to Buffalo? Under such a policy, what would now have been the condition of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan—to every one of which the Erie Canal has been fruitful in blessings.

Well, Sir, if we can plainly see that such a prohibition in the past, in this State, and in other States, would have been fruitful in mischief, can we know that it will not be fruitful in mischief in the future? If its effects would have been only disastrous in the past, how do we know that they will be anything but disastrous in coming

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—ALVORD—DURGIN.

[July 8th.

time? It is not generally supposed that this country has reached the summit of improvement, and that no such discoveries as have burst upon us one after another during the present century, are to come after us. There has been, during the present century, a succession of discoveries such as have entirely changed the face of things. In the first place, the steam-boat, then the railroad, then the ocean steamer, which was, in fact, another discovery; *then the electric telegraph. And who believes that this is to end here? Who knows but that in the next few years some new discoveries will be made which will as much improve inter-communication above what it now is, as did the discoveries of the steam-boat or railroad improve it above what it was fifty years ago? Those who believe that no such improvements are to be made in the future, have less faith in human progress than I have. And will you put a prohibition into the Constitution of Massachusetts, which will utterly preclude us from participating in the benefit of such discoveries when they shall be made? Will you put in such a prohibition, that until the experiments have been tried in other States, and until others begin to reap the benefit of them, we must stand still, and remain unaided by them? For if you trust to private capital, you trust in vain. Private capital will take hold of nothing new, to any great extent. It must be tried and proved, before private capital will take hold of it upon a large scale. The time may come, within the next few years, when Bristol and Plymouth and Essex and Boston will regret most deeply that they have put a prohibition into the Constitution of Massachusetts, which precludes the State from ever again pursuing a policy which has added so much to its past and present prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, I will notice a single argument which has been urged upon the other side, and then will leave this matter to other and abler hands. It has been urged as a strong argument in favor of the proposed prohibition, that other States have a similar clause in their Constitutions. I agree that some other States have such a clause. New York has been held up as a pattern State, for us to copy. New York has in its Constitution a clause somewhat similar to this. The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) in his address upon this subject the other day, said that the people of New York were tired of the prohibition and were endeavoring to get rid of it. I hold in my hand, Sir, the copy of an act which has just passed both branches of the New York legislature, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of that State. I have but just received it, and have not had time to compare it with the clause which is proposed to be altered. But from a slight examination of it, I can say that it proposes to alter the clause which contains the prohibition; not to abrogate it entirely, but to alter it essentially. I could not tell, from reading it, precisely how much it proposes that the legislature shall be allowed to borrow hereafter; but, I learn by a letter which I have received from a friend, that, under the proposed amendment, money can be borrowed to the amount of ten millions of dollars without obtaining the consent of the people. The clause of the amendment, to which I wish to call the attention of the Convention, is in these words:—

"The provisions of section twelve of this article, requiring every law for borrowing money, to be submitted to the people, shall not apply to the loans authorized by this section."

They had put in a prohibition in New York, and now, almost unanimously, the legislature is endeavoring to strike it out, in part, and substitute a provision which shall, in effect, nullify it so far as it applies to the great system of canals. That is, as I understand it. They have tried the policy of prohibition, and are backing out from it. Shall we copy their early folly, or their later wisdom? We know that the party whose efforts fastened this clause upon the Constitution of New York, and which endeavored to follow out that policy afterwards, by the action of the legislature of the State, was almost ruined by that course. It was the party with which many of us deeply sympathize, the more liberal section of the Democratic party of that State. I trust that we shall take warning by their example, and as they are now, many of them, zealous to get rid of the prohibition, I hope we shall not enact, in our behalf, that which they have found to be so injurious.

Mr. DURGIN, of Wilmington. I do not purpose to inflict a speech, at this time, upon the Committee, but simply to offer a few remarks upon the subject before the Committee. It has been suggested to me, Sir, that there are two great things in this Convention, but I did not really suppose that either of those two great things were present. One of the creatures, the invisible creatures present, is the great Hoosac Tunnel. The second invisible creature is the great Western Railroad. They tell me that these two things are in the Convention, and no mistake. Well, that may be, Sir, they are both here as invisible spirits; that is, the two separate interests are here. And supposing they are here; what then? Who cares? I do not care a fig. I do not know but that they have a right to come here, if they are the creatures of the State. This is the State House, State property, and I suppose they have a right to come. If they behave themselves well, I am glad to see them. It was intimated to me, not a thousand years ago, by a certain individual who has a seat in this Convention, that he rather thought he should go against loaning the State credit, simply from the fact that the Hoosac folks had passed certain resolutions, holding a rod over the Convention. He said he did not love to work under a rod, and that he would not, any way. Therefore, he thought, he should go against loaning the State credit. Well, if the Hoosac-folks have done such a thing as to shake their rod over us, I do not think it will be like Aaron's rod, and swallow us up. If they have done wrong, we will not do wrong because they have. Two wrongs do not very often make a right. I think we had better do right in despite of their wrongs. Then if the Western Railroad comes here, dignified, as it will come, if it comes at all—for they always move with great skill, pomp, and gravity—and urge something against loaning the State credit, let them urge. I shall not go against loaning the State credit, because they urge. I will do right in despite of the great Western Railroad and the Hoosac Tunnel put together—do right though the heavens fall. My friend here, my very aged friend, (Mr. French,) made a remark the other day, and said it was of no use to lock the door after the horse was stolen. If he had said that ten or fifteen years ago, I think there might have been some propriety in it. I think, Sir, the horse, or the horses, have been pretty well taken out of the stable, before this. I see but little force in the argument, in locking the door at this very late day.

Then, again, my friend from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) who certainly amused us very much, and pleased us, and kept us awake—and I was glad of that, for I love to keep awake, and love to keep other people awake—referred to the corruptions in the State of Georgia. He referred to the frauds which have been practised in that State. He told us, in a very eloquent manner, how they had practised there, and how liable legislative bodies were to be imposed upon. I thought that a good deal like the man down in Oldtown, in the State of Maine. There is, in that place, a tribe of Indians, and they sometimes commit depredations on the timber, and, especially, on the ash timber of the country. One old farmer missed some of his ash timber. He saw an Indian, and he said, "Look here, you redskin, I've set a trap on my land, and if you go there and cut an ash tree, you will get caught." The Indian said, "You no catch me, now you tell me." It is so with regard to the gentleman's argument about Georgia. He has shown us where fraud has been practised, and now catch Old Massachusetts, if you can. He, in his eloquence, and in the honesty and simplicity of his heart—for he is all honesty, and very clear and explicit—has warned us, so that, I presume, Old Massachusetts will never be caught in that wicked thing, never.

Mr. Chairman. He likewise spoke against the loaning of the State credit, because, forsooth, that loan might aid certain localities in the State. That is the argument. Well, Mr. Chairman, that thing would never have come into my head, I know, unless he had placed it there. Then, the argument is this—if there was any argument at all in it—that we will not do right, because, forsooth, in doing right, we shall benefit certain localities. Is that it? It is a strange argument to come from that gentleman. That was the force and the gist of his argument; we will not do right, because it will benefit certain localities in Massachusetts. I say, do right; the more localities it benefits, the better. My friend over here, who goes for the district system, (Mr. Schouler,) says so, too.

There are certain questions which come up in my mind, which I wish to ask. In the first place, is the credit system right or wrong, in itself considered? Is the credit system a malum in se, vitally wrong in itself? Who says it? Who avows it? Establish that fact, and I will go against loaning the State credit at once. Sir, if the credit system is wrong in itself, then the whole business world is wrong, decidedly wrong; for nine hundred and ninety-nine portions in a thousand, of the business world, go more or less on the credit system. Therefore, I argue that it is not wrong in itself. Sir, it is the universal opinion that the credit system secures more good than could possibly be gained without it; more good to the world, more good to individuals. This is a universally admitted fact. It has its attending evils, we grant. It has its disadvantages, and it has its advantages; but the advantages are paramount, and, therefore, the credit system exists and is tolerated throughout the world. Who denies it? Can a man deny it? Let us see the man, hoary headed, or bald headed, or with burnished locks, youthful or otherwise. Where is the man?

But, Sir, where credit is given, with suitable

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — DURGIN — COLE.

[July 8th.]

indemnity, if credit it can be called, most certainly there can be no harm, for the indemnity secures against harm. That is exactly the character of the loan of the State credit. Who supposes that the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts is going to lend its credit without the slightest probability, or even more than probability, of a full indemnity? She never has done it, and I hope she never will. Great credit that, if I want to get a thousand dollars, for me to put something worth two thousand dollars into your hands for security, and give you fee simple in it—great credit, that! My friend who last had the floor, (Mr. Alvord,) spoke so admirably, clearly, forcibly, logically and unanswerably, upon the internal improvements of the nation and the State, that I need add nothing upon that subject. He told the truth, and, I must say, that he stole a little of my thunder; but, it was not thunder, alone—there was a little lightning with it, for I think it killed—it is the lightning that kills. "But," says the objector, "who is going to argue against the internal improvements of the nation or the State? It is not against this that we argue, but it is this," say they. "It is against loaning the State credit to build up private corporations. If the State will take it into its own hands, and own the whole affair, that is a very different thing." But, on the other hand, suppose the private corporation, aided by the State loan, should, in its result, develop the resources of the Commonwealth, or any portion of the Commonwealth, that is just what we want. We want to have those resources developed, and if private corporations can go forward and develop them, I say "Amen" to it—let them do it. I do not care how many corporations, private or public, take this ground, and bring about these good results. They should not be frowned down, or scorned out of existence. Now, Sir, to go against the Report of the Committee would be virtually tying up the hands of the legislature; it would be virtually avowing and announcing to the world that we cannot and we will not trust the legislature of Massachusetts. Now, this is a very broad allegation; and in my estimation this is a very delicate announcement to make in regard to the legislature, that it has been in former days so recreant to its trust—it has been so prodigal, so very imprudent, not to say foolish, that it can no longer be trusted. Who will say this? Oh, tell it not in Boston—tell it not in the nineteenth century. Let us see how Massachusetts has advanced. She has grown from infancy to be a giant—from poverty to riches—from comparative ignorance to be a learned and mighty people. And has all this taken place under bad legislation? No, Sir! It has been under good legislation. Now, I do not believe in tying up the hands of the legislature in any such manner. I do not believe that it is courteous; I do not believe it is dignified; I do not believe that it is necessary. On the contrary, there is something severe and odious about it, which I do not very much like.

What great enterprise can we see now before the State? All the opposition seems to be based upon this—that there is one great enterprise, if it be proper to call it a great enterprise, and that is the little Hoosac Tunnel! That seems to terrify the people; and my friend at my right, (Mr. Alvord,) speaks of the great interests that may arise. Now, Sir, I hope they will arise; and if they do arise, for mercy's sake do not smother them in their birth. Let them live and prosper. We have children, all over the State, who have received State aid, and we are not ashamed of them. I think we have reason to be proud of them.

Again, Sir, as security, and as good and valid security against the danger of frauds and of log-rolling, and of all this class of wicked things which have been enumerated by my friend from Braintree—we shall have as a guarantee against this, that there is now, and there will probably continue to be, a large House of Representatives. Suppose you have three hundred and seventy-five or four hundred men on this floor, and attempt to roll a log through such a swamp of men, so to speak—through this forest of living, human beings—do you suppose it will go? I tell you, Mr. Chairman, it is not quite so easy a thing to buy up four hundred men, as it is to buy up seventy-five men in the legislature of Wisconsin. No, Sir! It is a hard game to play, and the men who attempt to play it will surely be beaten. They will lose the game, and they will rue the day they attempted any such thing. Here is one of my strong reasons for a large House of Representatives.

Again, Sir, I go for the Report of the Committee upon this ground. The legislature, after having fully investigated a matter, and heard all the evidence for and against the scheme—all the strong reasons for it and the strong reasons against it—after having deliberated for weeks upon the matter, are certainly more competent to judge in relation to it than the people, who have never heard anything about it—who never will and never can hear anything about it. I am not saying that if every individual could be instructed, and, like members of a jury, could hear all the arguments for and against a thing, and the able pleas of counsel upon both sides, the people would not be competent to decide the question; but they do not, and they never will, take the trouble to look into all these matters and to understand them. If so, we are afraid to trust the people; and I insist upon it that such a declaration is a libel. I am not afraid to trust the people of the Commonwealth; I have confidence in their integrity, and I have confidence in their ability. But if we send this question to them, what will they say? They will say something like this: "We have sent men down to Boston to investigate these great matters. They are to act for us as our representatives, and are to carry out our designs and our wishes; and instead of doing this, they have sent the question back to us." Now I beg gentlemen not to say anything more about sending this thing back to the people. I hope this will not be put into the Constitution anywhere, to refer legislative acts back to the people. The people do not want to be troubled with them, and will not be troubled with them; and if they should undertake to decide, they would be ten times as likely to come to a wrong decision as the legislature would. I am, therefore, in favor of reposing some real confidence in the legislature, because I believe there is integrity and wisdom enough in a body of four hundred men to settle these matters correctly. I do not believe they will come here and perjure themselves—I think they have too much regard for the interests of the Commonwealth to do that, and that they will endeavor to maintain the Constitution inviolate. I believe a great deal in the depravity of man, but I am not prepared to go quite so far as this; this is a step beyond the ordinary depravity of human nature. I hope, therefore, Sir, that the Report of the Committee will be adopted, and that this matter will be suffered to remain just where it is, and let the legislature have the responsibility of this thing rest in their hands, where it belongs.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I did not intend to trespass upon the patience of the Committee at this time, but I rise to express my regrets that the gentleman who represents Montague, (Mr. Alvord,) should have brought up the subject of the action of the State of New York. It was remarked, when this subject was under consideration a few days ago, by my friend who usually sits beside the door opposite, (Mr. Hillard,) that an act had been passed by both branches of the legislature of the State of New York, requiring a modification of the present existing restriction in the laws respecting the granting by the legislature the loan of the credit of the State. This has been referred to again, by my friend from Montague. I rise for the purpose of setting the Committee right upon this one particular, to which I desire to call their attention. The act which has recently been passed by the legislature of the State of New York, refers to what is in the twelfth section of article seven of their Constitution. The ninth section is as follows:—

"The credit of the State shall not, in any manner, be given or loaned to, or in aid of, any individual, association, or corporation."

The Constitution proceeds, in the tenth section, further to make provision that "the State may, to meet casual deficits, or failures in revenues, or for expenses not provided for, contract debts, but such debts, direct and contingent, singly or in the aggregate, shall not at any time exceed one million of dollars; and the moneys arising from the loans creating such debts shall be applied to the purpose for which they were obtained, or to pay the debts so contracted, and to no other purpose whatever."

The eleventh section provides further, as follows:—

"In addition to the above limited power to contract debts, the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or defend the State in war; but the money arising from the contracting of such debts shall be applied to the purpose for which it was raised, or to repay such debts, and to no other purpose whatever."

Now, then, we come to the twelfth section, upon which the recent act has been passed. The Constitution provides, in the twelfth section of article seven, that no money shall be raised or appropriated by the legislature for the purposes of internal improvements, without some restrictions. It is well known that the State of New York constructed the Erie Canal at the public expense; they never granted an appropriation to corporations for the purpose, but it was built as a public work. At first the canal cost eight millions of dollars; and at the time this provision was inserted in the Constitution, a project was in contemplation, and had recently been commenced, to widen their canal; and the first surveys and estimates were, that it would require about the original cost of the canal, viz.: eight millions of dollars. About that time the delegates in convention assembled to revise the Constitution, thought it would be perfectly safe to

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—COLE—DAWES.

[July 8th.

throw about the legislature a restricting clause in relation to raising money for internal improvements. Since that time it has been ascertained that the amount of money that will be required to complete this enlargement of the Erie Canal, will be twenty-four millions of dollars. I think the last estimate was between twenty and twenty-four millions, and this great expenditure is deemed justifiable and warranted in view of the increase of transportation required on that great inland river, that connects the ocean with the western lakes; and the inhabitants of the State begin to realize the importance of having a little more power vested in the legislature to raise money to appropriate for the work of internal improvements. I will read the constitutional provision in relation to the raising of money for internal improvements:—

“Except the debts specified in the tenth and eleventh sections of this article, no debt shall be hereafter contracted by or on behalf of this State, unless such debt shall be authorized by a law for some single work or object, to be distinctly specified therein; and such law shall impose and provide for the collection of a direct annual tax to pay, and sufficient to pay the interest on such debt as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal of such debt within eighteen years from the time of the contracting thereof.”

This refers to the State, appropriating money for its own expenditure in internal improvements, and has no relation whatever to loaning money to corporations. The Constitution further provides:—

“No such law shall take effect until it shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the people, and have received a majority of all the votes for or against it, at such election. On the final passage of such bill in either House of the legislature, the question shall be taken by yeas and nays, to be duly entered on the journals, and shall be ‘shall the bill pass, and ought the same to receive the sanction of the people.’”

Here is a provision by which the delegates in Convention, to revise the Constitution of the State of New York, saw fit to provide for the appropriation of moneys, on the part of the legislature, for internal improvements in the State. And in view of the great amount of money which it will require for widening the canal, the present legislature has passed a law that the legislature may appropriate money for internal improvements without submitting it to the people. But let it be remembered, that while her example is sought, by some gentlemen in this Convention, to influence the minds of its members against restriction, that neither the legislature of the State of New York nor the people generally, have become dissatisfied with the present provisions of the Constitution in relation to the matter of loaning the credit of the State to private associations and corporations. I simply rose for the purpose of setting this thing right before the Committee, and will not detain them longer.

Mr. DAWES, of Adams. I am aware that the Committee is wearied with this subject, but there is a single point to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee, in reference to the second of these resolves. The second is in these words:—

“The legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts which shall singly or in the aggregate, with any previous debt, exceed the sum of one million of dollars, except to repel invasion or suppress insurrection.”

Now, Sir, it is well known that the resources of the Commonwealth are such that the annual current expenses of the State, from year to year, have been met by borrowing money in anticipation of the revenues. The bank tax, a portion of it comes in in April, and a portion in six months from that time. The expenses of the legislature, and other expenses of that kind, are defrayed by anticipating the revenue. Such has been the necessity of every year for many years past, and such it must be so long as the State depends for revenue upon the sources upon which she now depends. Now, the Commonwealth, to-day, is indebted for credit loaned to diverse associations and corporations—all very worthy objects, and which have resulted in great good to the State—she is indebted in the modest sum of $6,391,030,56. If this second resolve should pass there is no possible way by which the Commonwealth can defray her current expenses. She cannot anticipate her revenues as she has in years past. She cannot borrow a dollar, because her hands will be tied. She will be without the means of defraying the expenses of this very Convention, and there will be no possible way for the wheels of the government to move. They cannot, in the expressive language of Senator Niles, be “iled.” That consideration, of itself, is a sufficient objection to this second resolve.

The first resolve is aimed at something else, and if I did entertain views in relation to this Convention and its results, with which I am sometimes charged by our friends of the other side, I should sit perfectly still and oppose no obstacle to the adoption of that resolve. But, Sir, I do desire that the Convention should adopt something of good, which shall be approved of by the people. Therefore, I urge upon the Committee the propriety of considering, seriously, whether at a time when there is considerable excitement in the Commonwealth, when there are various interests awakened, and the people are anxious in regard to enterprises similar to those which have found favor at the hands of the Commonwealth, in times past, whether it be good policy to undertake to obtain a snap judgment in this Convention upon any such project as that,—whether it is the part of good policy, in framing the organic law of the Commonwealth, to undertake, by the Constitution, to lay our hands upon, press down, and put to sleep, such enterprises as that towards which this resolution is aimed?

Now, Sir, I do not wish to reflect upon the motives of the honorable gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) who introduced this resolve. I know he has long entertained views similar to those expressed in the resolves. But, Sir, there is an outside pressure which comes in and takes advantage of the fact that there exist honest sentiments in the minds of many members favorable to these views, and without the existence of which they would never have come here. I submit, that the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) and his friends, though entertaining themselves these views for a long time, are made the instruments of that outside influence, which, if they would consider with that candor which belongs to them, they would, I think, hesitate in pressing this measure upon the Convention.

I do not wish to weary the Committee with any extended remarks upon this subject. I feel confident that I might sit quietly in my seat, and let the Committee take what course they please upon the first resolve, because in the end it could not stop, put to sleep, or cripple the enterprise at which it is aimed. But, Sir, it is a little singular when these people who are associated with this enterprise have not troubled the Convention at all, that others should press upon this Convention from the outside, and seize upon the sentiments honestly entertained by many members and make use of them, in conflict with, and in opposition to, their own hitherto avowed principles, and are willing thus to traffic with the fundamental law of this Commonwealth.

Allusion is made to the Western Railroad and the Hoosac Tunnel. Gentlemen of this Convention have tried to suppress those two features of the case, and to debate this question as if they had no interest in it. The gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) the other day, in opening this discussion, said that had it not been for certain projects now existing in this Commonwealth, the Report of this Committee never would have been made. I think he was well answered by some one at the time, that had it not been for a certain other corporation which he represents, when not upon this floor, there never would have been an occasion for this Report, and the idea would never have been introduced into this Convention. Well, now, those parties, finding themselves thus situated in this Commonwealth, having drawn their life blood from the Commonwealth, having received their nourishment, their aliment, their support from the Commonwealth, all parts of which have cheerfully rendered their aid, when another portion of the State asks at the hands of the legislature, to be allowed to participate in these benefits, endeavors to put them off. Now I submit, whether it be not a matter of good policy to let that controversy, existing and going on between different corporations within the limits of the State, go on, and let it be carried on in the legitimate field to which it belongs, and not allow it to be brought in here?

Why, Sir, the gentlemen who advocate in this Convention the introduction of such a clause as this into the Constitution, on almost all occasions, claim to be seriously, and I have no doubt, honestly, opposed to monopolies, and opposed to the influence of corporations. Yet, Sir, the policy of Massachusetts has reared up corporations of great power, and those corporations are knocking at the door of this Convention and asking it to throw obstacles in the way of all checks and all competition upon them, and are making use, in this Convention, of the very gentlemen who are thus honestly opposed to all monopoly, to aid them in this undertaking. If I may be permitted to speak out plain, and call things by their right names, the Western Railroad Corporation, the greatest of all corporations in this Commonwealth, having received its birth, its nourishment, its growth, its present prosperity, all at the hands of the Commonwealth, and having now the Commonwealth's credit to the amount of $3,999,555 56, is undertaking to throw obstacles into this Convention to obstruct all enterprises which will compete with them in that business which, they say, the Commonwealth has given exclusively to them.

Sir, these men who are opposed to monopolies in this Commonwealth, are called upon, in this

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — DAWES.

[July 8th.]

state of things, to see to it, that such corporations as that do not accomplish, by these indirect means, the very thing which has been predicted of them by these very men. Why, Sir, it was once said by a very sagacious politician of Massachusetts, that the Western Railroad, within ten years from the time it went into operation, would be the governor of Massachusetts. It was thought at that time, a very foolish and vain remark.

I recollect, no longer ago than 1849, when I was somewhat conversant with the doings of that road, that it came to the knowledge of members of the legislature that complaints were made of the Western Railroad, that in certain localities they refused to transport the products of the soil of the very towns through which they passed, at any price which fell short of absolute prohibition, because they wished themselves to control the market price of those products and purchase them at their own price. I remember that an individual in 1849 introduced into the House of Representatives, an inquiry, whether the Western Railroad, of which this Commonwealth is a part owner, had not, for the purposes of its own gain, pursued such a course. That legislature ordered an inquiry, and referred the matter to a committee. The committee served a notice upon the president of the railroad company, a distinguished individual, now deceased, to attend before them. The president appeared before the committee with a bland and pleasant countenance, and inquired what the matter was. The charge made against the Western Railroad was read to him. Says he, what do you want? We want to know whether the charge is true. "Well, it is true, and what are you going to do about it? The Western Railroad has a right to set such a price as it pleases, upon the freight it carries, and if it be for the interest of the Western Railroad to put such a price upon the transportation of the products of the soil, which the producers ask us to carry over our road, which shall enable us to purchase it at our own price, whose business is it?"

Then was realized, in the Commonwealth, the prediction made ten years before, by a most sagacious politician of Massachusetts, that the Western Railroad would be governor of Massachusetts. I know it was said to that president at that time, "You manage very well with the power in your hands; true, you are the governor of Massachusetts, and there might be worse ones." I do not mean to say that the Western Railroad is peculiarly wicked in that respect. It is the nature of all institutions, which have it in their power, so to act as will advance their interests. I do not think that road abuses its trust more than any other railroad. But, Sir, it is a great corporation, having its arms stretching across the whole Commonwealth, and having the State as its partner, and having her scrip in the market, which she gave for the very stock she has in that road; and that road so situated has a power which no other corporation in Massachusetts has, or can have. And although I would not hurt a hair of its head, or depreciate one iota from the blessings which it has conferred upon Massachusetts, yet I candidly submit, whether it is not time for those of us who dread the power of corporations, to look after such institutions as this in the Commonwealth? Whether it is not time, instead of helping them on in the attempt to put down competition, and to stifle all budding enterprises in this Commonwealth which do not flow through their own channels, to restrain themselves from lending their hands to any such work as this?

Now, Sir, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has lent its aid not only to the Western Railroad, but to all manner of institutions all over the State. The Commonwealth to-day is issuing its scrip to build the Insane Asylum, which is now beautifying the town of Taunton, which the gentleman over the way, (Mr. Morton,) represents, which institution is to scatter its benign influences over the whole community. But if this second resolve, which has been offered by the gentleman from Taunton, had been in the Constitution at that time, it would have been impossible for the Commonwealth to have laid the corner stone of that institution.

Having secured that and kindred enterprises—and the Western Railroad having secured the aid of the Commonwealth in its great work, all now join hands and come up here, because a little corporation up in the north-western corner of the State is asking, humbly and modestly, of the legislature for a little aid from the Commonwealth, though put off from time to time by the good judgment of that body—I say these very recipients now come up here to this Convention with a project not heard of when the matter of calling the Convention was discussed before the people—not broached before the people at all, but raised after the Convention was decided upon—raised after the delegates to the Convention were chosen—brought up here through these divers influences, for the purpose of preventing the loan of the State credit to this corporation. Why, Sir, during the discussion upon the project which has given birth to this proposition in the Convention—while that discussion was going on in the Senate of Massachusetts this idea was first broached, so far as I know. While that discussion was going on, I recollect to have heard a remark something like this: "Let us postpone this matter for this session; let us put it off for this legislature, and we will get a provision inserted into the Constitution next May, that will put an end to the proceeding." Well, Sir, it may be done, but I have confidence to believe that it will not be done by this Convention.

Sir, gentlemen cannot say that this was one of the purposes for which this Convention was called. It was called for higher and holier purposes than to minister to the private ends or purposes of any men or set of men in this Commonwealth. But, Sir, if this Convention shall so far forget the purposes for which we were sent here as to make this body subservient to such a purpose, there is a power behind us, and greater than this Convention, upon which we must throw ourselves, and we will rest satisfied with the verdict.

But we are asked with a good deal of complaisance, why we are not willing to submit such a question as that to the people? Well, Sir, suppose we do submit it to the people, what is the result? We are to contend, single handed and alone, against a corporation in the field with ten or twelve millions in their control, whose shareholders are scattered all over the Commonwealth, and can be reached by some one in the centre by a net-work, as it were, and whose money flows like water, when the interest of the corporation requires it. Why, Sir, we have found it necessary to protect the voters of Massachusetts against the moneyed influence of your manufacturing and commercial institutions. Yet, here is a great mammoth corporation holding a moneyed influence which is not equalled by any manufacturing or commercial company in the Commonwealth. In the amount of capital which it can command at a moment's warning, in the zeal and enterprise of those who manage it, and in all the interests connected with it, there is not the like in the Commonwealth. And we are asked, whether we are willing to go to the polls with such an interest arrayed against us! And we are asked, too, by some gentlemen who talk a great deal about the influence of money upon the voters of the Commonwealth. Now, Sir, I bring no charges against any individual or corporation. I do not think the Western Railroad Company would be any more likely to use their money for corrupt purposes than any other corporation in its circumstances would; but, nevertheless, there are odds against us which none know the power of better than those from outside this Convention who are urging us to adopt this measure.

But, I will leave this matter to the Convention. I do not pretend that I have no personal interest in the matter, or that my constituents are not aroused and intensely excited upon the subject. Sir, my constituents are a law-abiding people. They will abide by the law of the Commonwealth whatever it is; but they will not, in my opinion, sit quietly down and suffer fetters to be placed upon them which shall bind down, for all time, the resources of that section of the Commonwealth, while the other portions of it are enjoying the facilities of those railroads which have been constructed by the aid of the Commonwealth itself.

It is known very well to the members of this Convention, that, to a great extent, the difficulties that surround the subject of the basis of representation, which has occupied the Convention now for three weeks, grew out of the fact that these railroads and other internal improvements have developed certain portions of the Commonwealth more than others; that the city of Boston has been augmented, and others around it; many of them have been brought into existence, and all of them have been built up by this policy, upon the part of the State, and now they come and ask that other portions of the State shall not enjoy the same benefits. But, let Massachusetts stop this policy; let her shut down the gate and say that hereafter no more of her aid, her countenance, her fostering care shall be extended to any of these enterprises, and the Commonwealth will continue to grow one-sided; one portion withering and growing weaker, and the other portion waxing strong and powerful, until these difficulties, which are now matters of imagination and speculation, will become realities. But, let Massachusetts be equal aid just to all portions of the Commonwealth; let her stimulate the enterprises and develop the resources in all her counties, in all her borders; let her summon up the latent energies of all her people in every portion of her territory, and there will be diffused over her an equality of representation compelled from necessity—brought into existence by this policy. Why, Sir, if the good county of Franklin, which has been so jealously guarded upon this floor, had enjoyed the benefit of this policy for the last ten years; if her resources had been developed

Friday.]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—HOPKINSON—DAWES.

[July 8th.

under the fostering care of the State as have some of the more favored counties, there would have been in this Convention no difficulty, no complaint about the difference between the application of your system of representation to Franklin and Worcester.

Sir, that is the only true policy which fosters every portion of the Commonwealth alike. That father of a family who nourishes, protects and guards one member of his household to the exclusion of the others, is false and infidel. And that State which does not look to all its interests alike, but suffers itself to become a respecter of persons or parts, is no Commonwealth.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. I regret to feel obliged to trouble the Committee with further remarks, so late in the day, upon a subject which has been a good deal discussed in this Convention. I did not have the good fortune to hear the debate which took place upon another occasion upon this subject; and when it was brought before the Committee, this afternoon, not having heard that former debate, and not having expected that it would be brought up at this time, I had resolved to sit still and not say a word—certainly at this stage of the debate. And I should not have departed from that resolution but for some remarks which fell from the gentleman who last addressed the Committee, (Mr. Dawes).

The tenor of the remarks of that gentleman, although it was not expressed in so many words, was to produce the impression upon those who heard him, that the opposition which members of this Convention make to the Report of the Committee and the advocacy of the proposed restriction in the Constitution, arises entirely in consequence of a pressure from without the Convention, and that pressure originating in a moneyed corporation. Now, Sir, what is this imputation? Here are four hundred men, selected from the various parts of the Commonwealth, each individual because he had a reputation that could command the confidence of his fellow citizens, either justly or unjustly. Then, when we are summoned to act upon a matter of the highest concernment to the whole Commonwealth, to wit: the fundamental law of the land; and when a proposition is pending before the Convention, whether it be decided affirmatively or negatively—is a matter of almost as high importance as any that can be brought before us—it is assumed that members of the Convention, about one-half of whom I understand, on a former occasion, voted one way and the other half the other, instead of looking to that high concernment which the importance of the subject involved, are actuated entirely—are governed solely, by a pressure from without—by a moneyed corporation bringing its army and bearing its forces down upon us. That is the assumption, and now I ask you, gentlemen of the Convention, who pleads guilty to the charge? Is there a danger that one-half the members of the Convention are capable of being influenced and actuated by such a power as this? Who was it that brought forward this proposition? Was the chairman of this Committee influenced by any motives of this kind? Have those who have spoken upon this subject been influenced by any outside pressure of this description?

Mr. WILSON, of Shelburne, (interrupting). Do I understand the gentleman from Boston to say that the chairman of this Committee has brought forward any measure of this kind?

Mr. HOPKINSON. I know precisely what I said, and that it is in exact conformity with the fact. I inquired if the gentleman who brought in this proposition and who was made chairman of this Committee, was one of the men bought up by this corporation? Now, I appeal to the record to support me in saying that the chairman of this Committee was the gentleman who moved the order on this subject, and, therefore, I stated what was strictly true. I did not say, what is apparent to every member of the Convention who reads the Report of that Committee, that the Committee brought in a Report adverse to the proposition contained in the amendment. Nor did I say whether the chairman of the Committee voted for the Report in Committee, or whether he voted against it and was overruled by a majority of the Committee. That would not be in order; nor would it be material to my purpose to make such an inquiry. But when we are told that this subject would never have been moved in the Convention—that the proposition to restrict the action of the legislature upon this subject, would never have been brought in here, but for an outside pressure, bolstered up by a moneyed corporation, whose object it was to prevent a certain project from being accomplished, then I think it is proper to inquire who it is that has been brought into subserviency to this great moneyed corporation? I do not mean to say that the gentleman to whose language I am alluding, (Mr. Dawes,) would mean to make such an imputation upon any member of the Convention. Knowing, as I do, the fairness of that gentleman, I believe that in the hasty manner in which he addressed the Convention, desiring, as he said, and as I believe, not to weary the attention of members, he gave utterance to language which would bear a construction which he did not design. I have no doubt that he would deny the imputation that there was any large number of the members of this Convention who could be bought up, or influenced, or carried away, in their judgments, by any such means; but, nevertheless, the tenor and import of the language used by him would seem to imply such an imputation.

Mr. DAWES, of Adams, (interrupting). Did the gentleman from Boston understand me as imputing any improper motives to any member of this Convention? If he did, he certainly misunderstood me, or I was very unfortunate in my selection of language. I intended only to say that there existed in the minds of many of the members of this Convention an opinion in coincidence with this measure; that men outside of the Convention had sought to take advantage of this fact; and that these gentlemen were being unwittingly made the instruments for carrying out that end. But that any member of this Convention has been approached by this outside influence, I certainly never said. I have too high an opinion of every member of this Convention to whisper such a thing in relation to them. But, Sir, I think gentlemen do yield to this outside pressure when they are not aware of it. We are influenced when we do not perceive it. That is what I intended to say, and I hope, if I have said otherwise, this will be considered as a correction.

Mr. HOPKINSON, (resuming). I did say that from my acquaintance with my friend from Adams, and from the fairness I know him to possess, I had no doubt he would deny any such imputation; but I did understand him to say that this measure would not have been moved here, but for an external pressure arising from the influence of a moneyed corporation, and from the manner in which he spoke, his language seemed to me to carry with it the idea that the weight of this outside pressure had had much to do in bringing the minds of many of the members of the Convention to the conclusions they entertain; but if I had not already said, in advance, that I did not suppose he intended any such thing; if I needed to be corrected upon that point, I certainly should accept the explanation of that gentleman. All I wish to say, in connection with this matter, is, that it seems to me that the tone and tenor of the remarks which have been made upon the other side of the question, have borne the construction, in many instances, which I have mentioned; and I did not think it ought to be passed by without notice. This question is one which once divided the people of the Commonwealth almost equally, and once, I believe, almost entirely put down the party which advocated a liberal loan of the State credit. But it is one which I trust may still be debated upon its merits, and upon which gentlemen differing in opinion, may be supposed to act from conscientious motives. And in the next place, I deny that this question was introduced here in consequence of the matters which have been alluded to. It is a question that has agitated the Commonwealth for a great number of years in past times. Many men thought that it was beyond the pale of government to enter into business relations with corporations or individuals to carry on enterprises of commerce. A great number of intelligent persons seriously entertain doubts upon the subject.

Permit me, Sir, here to allude to a remark made by the gentleman who so ably and fairly debated this question to day, I mean the gentleman from Montague:—If it be unconstitutional, if it be beyond the pale of the government to enter into these business relations, as gentlemen call them, then there needs nothing to be said here, because the advocates of the system have got it already. In my mind, that is not an answer to the argument. In the first place, I believe it is constitutional; but I speak now in the name of those who seriously entertain the belief that it is unconstitutional. Suppose it to be, then, a question of doubtful constitutionality; in the first place, I believe that it has been so long the practice of the Commonwealth—it has gone so far that it will be established, whether it was right or wrong in the beginning, and of consequence, when it comes up now in the court of last resort, this practice will go very far to establish it. But further than that, if it were ever so unconstitutional; if it were really the case that it were not constitutional, how do we stand? It has been assumed to be constitutional, for the advocates of the practice have so represented it, and upon the faith of their assurances, men have received the bonds of the State, which have been put forth; and, Sir, I know that I do not address a single man here who, if he were told to-morrow that the whole proceeding was unconstitutional, would not spurn the very idea of repudiating the obligations thus incurred. He would say at once, if we are wrong, let us retrace our steps for the future; but by all means, let us keep the faith of Massachusetts inviolate. Therefore, I think the reply of the gentleman on the point of unconstitutionality is not calculated to influence this Convention.

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT, &c. — WALKER — HOPKINSON.

[July 9th.

But I say, admitting its constitutionality, and I do admit it, and I believe it will be sustained by the courts of last resort, admitting the constitutionality, I maintain that it was a questionable policy. It was much discussed, and I do not hesitate to say it overthrew the political party by which the system was established. They had commenced, in a single case, and to a limited extent, and that formed a precedent for claiming similar aid in cases of a like nature, and the system extended until it became general; and the financial affairs of the Commonwealth came to be placed in a position of some danger, if not of immediate embarrassment. Having gone so far, it was expected and demanded, that other enterprises should be aided and fostered in a similar manner, and new projects were continually being brought forward, and new enterprises projected, until the public mind became alarmed precisely as the public mind in the State of New York became alarmed; and while in New York, the people, by a large majority, voted to put in the restriction here spoken of, the legislature of Massachusetts, for a long series of years, entirely abstained from the exercise of any such power. I believe that is correct historically in regard to this matter. It was fortunate that the State in so embarking and assuming mutual interest with so many companies, has done it with so much discretion that little ground for apprehension existed, lest by reason of failure on the part of the companies, resort for payment would be had to the treasury of the State.

Mr. BEACH, of Springfield, proposed, if the gentleman would give way, to move an adjournment.

Mr. HOPKINSON yielded the floor for that purpose, and

On motion, by Mr. BEACH, the Convention then, at five minutes past six o'clock, adjourned.

SATURDAY, July 9, 1853.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at ten o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Hour of Meeting.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk, moved that when the Convention adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Report of the Committee on the Qualification of Voters.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin, opposed the motion, and asked for a count.

The question being put, there were—ayes, 39; noes, 34. No quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, there is a quorum present. Gentlemen are requested to vote.

Mr. WALKER. I would like to state why it is that I desire that the Convention shall go into Committee upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to do so until it is ascertained that a quorum is present.

The question was again put on the motion of the gentleman from North Brookfield, that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and it was, upon a division—ayes, 98; noes, 14—decided in the affirmative, and the Convention thereupon resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Aspinwall, of Brookline, in the Chair, and proceeded to consider the Report, which was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 7, 1853.

The Committee on Qualifications of Voters, to whom was referred an order of the 19th of May, in regard to the expediency of so amending the Constitution as to provide that no person who shall make or become, directly or indirectly, interested in any bet or wager depending upon the result of any election, shall have a right to vote in such election, or be qualified to hold any office for which he shall be a candidate at such election; also, the expediency of so amending the Constitution as to exclude from the right of suffrage, and the right to hold any office of profit or trust, all persons who may be convicted of bribery, larceny, or other infamous crime; also, all persons who, forcibly, or by promises of reward, shall attempt to induce any voter to refrain from voting, &c.; also, the order of June 18th, on the expediency of providing that no voter, during the time of holding any election at which he is entitled to vote, shall be compelled to perform military duty, attend court as a suitor, juror, or witness, &c.; also, the order of May 31, in regard to the expediency of requiring that all persons who may be admitted to the right of suffrage after the year 1856, shall be able to read the Constitution of the Commonwealth, printed in the English language; also, the petition of Harriet K. Hunt, that she may be excused from paying taxes, or allowed to vote; also, the petition of Wendell Phillips and others, that woman may be heard at the bar of this Convention in support of her rights, report, that it is inexpedient for this Convention to take any action in relation to the same.

AMASA WALKER, Chairman.

The question being on agreeing to the Report.

After some remarks by Mr. Walker, on motion by Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway, the Committee rose, and, by their chairman, reported the resolution to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The Report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Reconsideration.

Mr. WHITE, of Quincy, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolves on the subject of the Basis of the House of Representatives were ordered to a second reading, and that that motion be laid upon the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT. Under the Rules, the motion will go upon the Orders of the Day.

Hour of Adjournment.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that the Rule which requires that the adjournment shall be at one o'clock, be so modified as to make the hour of adjournment two o'clock for this day only.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes, 76; noes, 36—decided in the affirmative.

Presentation of a Petition.

Mr. EAMES, of Washington, presented the petition of Otis F. R. Waite, and eleven others, inhabitants of Pittsfield, for the preservation of town representation.

On motion of Mr. EAMES, the said petition was read, and ordered to lie upon the table.

Closing of Debate.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway, moved that debate in Committee of the Whole on the subject of Loaning the Credit of the State, cease at the expiration of one hour after the Convention shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on that subject.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Boutwell, for Berlin, in the Chair, and renewed the consideration of the unfinished business of that Committee yesterday, namely, the Report of the Committee on the subject of Loaning the Credit of the State.

The pending question being on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Taunton, to strike out the words, "it is inexpedient to act thereon," and to insert the following:—

The Constitution ought to be so amended as to provide that—

1st. The legislature shall not have power hereafter, directly or indirectly, to grant or loan the credit of the State, or create any inability on behalf of the State in aid of any individual, corporation or association. But the legislature may submit to the people a proposition to make any such loan or grant, which, if adopted by a majority of all the legal voters voting thereon, shall authorize the same.

2d. The legislature shall not, hereafter, in any manner, create any debt or debts, which shall singly or in the aggregate, with any pre-existing debts hereafter created, exceed the sum of one million of dollars, except to repel invasion or suppress insurrection.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston, resumed and concluded his remarks, which were interrupted by the adjournment yesterday.

The amendment moved by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) provides, in the first clause, that the legislature shall not be empowered to loan the credit of the State to another party. The second clause provides that the legislature shall not create any debts. I suppose it was the understanding of the mover of the amendment that these were two distinct cases; that loaning the credit of the State to an individual or corporation was not creating a debt. This distinction appears to me to be sound in matter of phraseology, and that the language used will effect the purpose designed by the mover. Whether there is a distinction in expediency is another matter. But this being the design of the mover, I am strongly inclined, from the legal character and ability of the gentleman who made the motion, to think that the words carry out that intention. I am satisfied that any other form of phraseology should be substituted which will precisely and directly effect that object. The suggestion was made in the Committee yesterday, that if the second resolution was adopted, it would be impossible for the State to carry on the government by those temporary loans which they have been in the habit of effecting for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the year in anticipation of its income. Satisfied that the gentleman who made the motion can take care of it, I propose not to dwell upon that distinction. When the Committee rose yesterday, I was endeavoring to show that it was not the fact that this question was introduced and maintained here having reference to a particular object to be effected, that it was not maintained by the force of external pressure influencing members here in their seats. I had the honor to show that it was an old question, that it had at various times been discussed, and had been a mooted point at times when the State was nearly divided upon that subject. I had the honor to submit that it was one of the leading causes which led to the defeat of the party then in power, and that a general impression prevailed that the policy of loaning the credit of the State to individuals or corporations had been carried to an alarming extent. I also stated, that the same result had followed the same policy in the State of New York, and in that State, notwithstanding the brilliant results of the internal improvements which had been undertaken and carried on, that the people had become so alarmed that this very restriction, or substantially the same, had been incorporated into their fundamental law.

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — HOPKINSON.

[July 9th.

I would say further, that this policy has not only been carried to an extent creating apprehensions in this State and New York, but it has been carried to an extent followed by still more disastrous results in other States, by force of which States have improvidently run in debt. The State of Mississippi was driven to what was, in the opinion of many, a disgraceful repudiation, and although that repudiation was based upon some technical objection as to form, yet, I submit, no honorable man would say that the State of Massachusetts, even if they could find some technical flaw in the proceedings, would think of depriving a confiding debtor of his just due. In Pennsylvania, Indiana, and I believe in Maryland, the same policy drove them to a suspension of the payment of interest due from them upon their debts. It was this series of events which pressed upon the attention of the country. It went to such an extent that made it uncomfortable and mortifying to every American to travel abroad at one time, and meet the taunts and jeers which he heard upon every side, at the credit and faith of this country. I say not that these were well founded. In comparison with many of the states of Europe, our honor, even in this darkest hour in our history, would have been bright and glorious, yet such was the impression made upon the minds of the people, both at home and abroad, that that state of things existed, known to every traveller who was abroad at the time. Now, my purpose is not, by this argument, to show that there should be no power to loan the credit of the State, but it is to meet the precise charge here brought up, that this was a question existing only because it affected a local issue, at this time, in one part of the State. No. It is a higher question and rises above all temporary considerations. It is a measure of great doubt, at least, as to its utility and expediency, one which has divided the country and will divide it again, and therefore it does not call for the interposition of any such external pressure to introduce it here. Nothing could be more gratuitous than the idea that it comes here only by force of a particular issue. The force of this public sentiment arrested the policy in Massachusetts, and hushed it for years. No person, for a long series of years, would think of violating what, for the time, seemed to be the settled policy of Massachusetts against incurring that kind of liability again, and it is only until a recent period that the question has been re-agitated. I regret, therefore, when we come to this question, that we cannot look upon its merits alone, that we cannot rise entirely above all such considerations, and have sufficient self-respect to decide the question upon our consciences, upon our duty as patriots and statesmen. I would fain place the debate above every peculiar and local interest of time and place. But after the question has been introduced as it was yesterday; after what has been said, I do feel at liberty to answer some of the remarks there made as briefly and as hastily as possible, and I hope not to exceed more than half of the time allotted to me by the Rules. It is distinctly asserted here, that the Western Railroad corporation is here acting and moving in this question, and without that there is very little else. It is asserted that she stands, like a monster, very much like the fabled monster of the deep, with her arms embracing the whole Commonwealth, governing and controlling it. The Arabian Night's has no fiction more gross. The flights of imagination which have been exerted upon this subject, if bent in another direction, would have made the sublimest poet of the age. What are the facts? The fact was that when this subject was introduced into the legislature it was not opposed before the Committee by the Western Railroad at all. Then the gentlemen very ingeniously argued from their not appearing before the Committee that they of course assented to it. When it came up the second time they opposed it, and took a different course. They appeared by their regular counsel, and stated such reasons as they thought bore upon the question before the Committee. The same party who inferred their consent from their not appearing, now charged them with improper interference by appearing. Who do you suppose spent the most money upon that subject. The petitioners or the remonstrants? The gentleman for Montague, (Mr. Alvord,) with great fairness says, that it costs a great deal of money to carry such a measure through, that they have to employ counsel, summon witnesses, to attend meetings of the legislature, necessarily requiring the expenditure of a great deal of money. Do they object that upon the other side there was a hearing also? Do they object that there was not, in the language of the gentleman from Adams, (Mr. Dawes,) a snap judgment sprung upon the legislature by an ex parte hearing? Do they object that there was an appearance there, also. Why, if it was to be carried upon money, I venture to say there have been ten dollars spent by the petitioners, where one was spent by the remonstrants. All very proper, of course. What I have to say, is this. If it was proper that there should be such a hearing by interested parties upon one side, it does not lie well in their mouths to object that the other side appeared also, and submitted their reasons to the Committee. The remonstrants did not hang in effigy men who did their duty, for the purpose of deterring others from doing the like duty. They did not proclaim their triumph by the booming of the cannon, when one vote was taken in one branch of the legislature, for the purpose of influencing the vote in the other branch. They appeared, by their counsel, and they had a hearing. They did right in so doing. They were not amenable to the charge of squandering the money of the State in an improper manner. Not content with raising an impression here against a soulless body, as they have been pleased to term it, pursuing the even tenor of its way, gentlemen are pleased to call up a hasty remark of a gentleman who now sleeps in an honored grave, and bring it before this Convention, and for what purpose? For the purpose of influencing our action here upon a great question of fundamental law, to affect the destinies of the present generation, and perhaps many generations to come. I had many opportunities of knowing the gentleman to whom allusion has been made. I know his history well. From a poor boy, drawing a hand-cart, in the city of Boston, he rose, by honorable enterprise and industry, to take a high rank among the merchants and business men of the land. He became the president of the Western Railroad Company. Like other self-made, self-educated, and self-taught men, he came up with the color upon him of his preceding life, and he carried out into action the indomitable energy which he possessed. Being uneducated in youth, he sometimes spoke without the refinement and courtesies which belong to men of more liberal education. But that he had the stamp of honor upon him—that he was a man—that he was above all petty and low intrigue to carry any purpose, every man who had the honor of his acquaintance will testify. To suppose that that individual, with his enlightened judgment and skill in such matters, ever intended to adopt the policy on the Western Railroad which would limit the business of the community through which it lay, which would curtail the growth of the country upon whose prosperity his corporation essentially depended, to suppose that he was capable of that policy, is entirely to forget the character of the man. Therefore I submit, that, to introduce a hasty remark of his (whether it was ever spoken I do not know, or whether the gentleman speaks from his own knowledge, or only from rumor, I do not understand) upon an occasion like this; to introduce such a remark, is entirely unworthy of the subject and the occasion. Gentlemen have argued that we must not deal with this question, because there is a local issue depending or to be affected by it; that this will detract from the votes which may be given in favor of the doings of this Convention, and therefore it is better to let it alone. I confess I cannot fully understand this argument. I suppose when we go to the people with the results of our labors, we shall separate the subjects that are submitted to them as much as possible, as far as in the nature of the case they are separable, and that we shall submit distinct propositions to be voted upon. Will gentlemen say that the people, in a fit of indigna-

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—HOPKINSON.

[July 9th.]

tion, may reject the whole, because they do not like some one proposition? I hope better for the intelligence of the community. I suppose if we submit this proposition to the people, they can accept or reject it, and it will not affect the result upon any other question which will be submitted to them. But the argument strikes me as having other bearings than this. Is it supposed here, in this sanctuary of the people's rights—for if I have thought sometimes in the initiatory proceedings of this Convention we a little magnified our office, I have yet a very exalted opinion of our position here—in this chosen depository of the people's rights, for the time being, where such influences have much less force, we are incapable of acting upon a matter which may involve a few millions of dollars, in a pecuniary point of view, without being controlled by such influences, may we not well fear to trust such power to the legislature? If it can so disturb us, I should fear it in the legislature, as a great disturbing force, an enormous irregular planet, introduced into the solar system of politics and statesmanship, calculated to turn aside from their regular orbits every other planet. I should say at once, that it affords the strongest possible argument why we should put down the gate. Every person knows that a question of this importance takes strong hold of the legislature. It is vain to disguise it. Importunity will carry many things through the legislature. If a measure cannot be carried to-day, it comes up to-morrow. It abides its time, and awaits its opportunity.

It then weds itself to some other project in some other part of the State, and, putting the influence of the two together, they hope to carry both. I speak of this as the general history of legislation, and not of the particular issue which has been alluded to before. The gentleman from Brintree, (Mr. Stetson,) showed yesterday, very conclusively, that such "jobs"—that is a term which it is very proper to apply to them—have been done in the legislatures of other States besides Massachusetts. I do not think we need to go to other States, however, to find illustrations enough of the history of such measures.

It is a dangerous power to give to the legislature, to permit them to run the State in debt. I would trust my agent, or clerk, or servant, with money or property of any kind, sooner than I would give him that power. That is the last thing, the very highest confidence that I would repose in an agent, to trust him to run me in debt. If I trusted him with my funds, and he squandered them, or made a misapplication of them, I might lose them, and that would be all. If I trusted him with property to dispose of, or to manage in any way, I might lose the proceeds of that, but that would be all. But if I trusted him with the power of using my name and of running in debt on my account, without restriction, I should put in his hands my own independence and honor. That is the very trust we are called upon to give to the legislature.

And it is dangerous, also; because, when it is granted to one individual or corporation, you will be called upon to grant it to another, and another, and another, and thus on, until we shall be entirely unable, honorably, to extricate ourselves. The arguments which have been presented here, prove this. We are told, on the one hand, that we have loaned the credit of the State once or twice, therefore we must go on and loan it again. Upon that principle, where are we to stop? We are told that, here is a little corporation, wishing to carry out an humble object, and asking a little aid to develop its business, away in one corner of the State. Is that so? Is it this small and insignificant amount which is asked for? If it is, then it does not rise to the dignity of those general questions, those enlarged State claims which demand the use of the State credit. If aid is granted in such a case, another little corner will be found which has not had enough. By and by, the Cape will want a loan to enable it to drain its marshes, or to build a railroad over its sands, to aid in enlarging its prosperity. And when a little is given there, another corner will come up and ask for it. Thus we go on and find ourselves, at last, merged into one great mercantile firm, uniting with every other firm and interest, for the purpose of developing its prosperity.

That is the argument employed on one side of the question, in one of its phases. If it is of that trifling local character, then the loan of the credit of the State should not be made. And if the former grants were wrong, and should not have been made, let us be wise in time and pause here,—

"Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer."

But, turning the argument to the other side, we are told that two millions is too vast an amount to expect to obtain from individual enterprise for the purpose of carrying out a scheme in one corner of the State, and therefore there is a claim on account of the greatness of the enterprise, for the assistance of the State! I think this argument equally unfounded in fact with the other. Is two millions too large a capital to be hoped for from any private source? What has Boston done, a thousand miles distant? Has not private capital from Boston principally built two great railroads across the State of Michigan, costing millions? Has it not opened two great railroads across Vermont? What has private capital done in New York? Has it not built one great railroad, from Albany to Buffalo, and another from New York to Lake Erie? The Erie road failed under State direction, and it was only carried through when it had been abandoned by the State to a private corporation. Now, with these two great railroads, one costing $20,000,000, and the other $30,000,000, it is proposed to construct another; and the surveys are being made, and capital is the very last thing which they apprehend difficulty in raising to make another road, splitting the triangle between those two great lines up to Lake Erie, and costing $20,000,000 more. Yet we are told that two millions of dollars is too large a sum to be obtained from private capitalists in Massachusetts. No, Sir; show where there is an exigency for it, show where that money can be properly expended in any deserving public enterprise, and twenty-four hours is sufficient to raise the capital to accomplish such a purpose.

But, Sir, we are told that the Western Railroad is a great monster, already dangerous to the liberties of the State, and soon to become the governor of the Commonwealth in fact, and without election. And what is the remedy which is proposed? Why, to build up another just such monster, by the side of it to hold it in check. This great corporation, in whose board of direction the State is largely represented, and with its immense wealth, is to be held in check by another monster, in which the State is not represented at all, and thus our liberties are to be saved! This is at variance with all experience and all history on that subject. In England, in New York, everywhere—we know that if you have two roads, side by side, they become like other great institutions, private or corporate. They will not prey upon each other, they will not devour each other; they will find it is easier to prey upon the public than upon each other; and, instead of two such dangerous monsters of ten millions each, holding each other in check, you will have one of twenty millions. This is so, invariably. No two roads will long run a race of competition with each other. After a time they will be sure to combine. If the managers will not do it this year, the stockholders will the next year put in those that will. The idea of putting one against the other to check it, is shown by all experience to be only doubling the momentum and power which you try to get rid of; and the result is, inasmuch as one can do the business cheaper than two, that instead of being benefited by the competition, you enhance the price for the service done.

But it would be out of order to go into the merits of an enterprise which seems to come in here to disturb our deliberations. The question is not whether this or that measure is expedient; but, rising above that, it is whether the legislature shall have power to contract debts without the consent of the people of the State.

It is argued very strenuously here, that such a restriction would control and entirely defeat all internal improvements in Massachusetts. But what is that argument; what does it amount to? Simply and mainly to this—that you are to set the legislature to do a thing which the people would never consent to have them do; that you are to call into action a power to lend the credit of the State, when it would be utterly in vain to think of getting the people at large to consent to it. Is that the way to carry out the will of the people? What is the reason given for this? Why is it that we are called upon to put the servant above his master, and say that the agent shall be empowered to contract a debt notwithstanding the principal will never consent to it?

It is said it is difficult to get the people to understand these subjects. That may be true with regard to a little matter away up in the corner of the State; but I utterly deny, that, as to great and important objects of a general nature, which are the only objects for which the credit of the State should be asked, that the people cannot be made to understand them. I say that the people can be made to act understandingly upon them; and I take issue with those who say that they cannot. If it is some remote object in the corner of the State, the people may not understand it; but if it is a great enterprise which bears upon the welfare and prosperity of the State,—and such an object only has a right to come to the State for aid,—any such great enterprise, the people can be made to understand. Now, it is here seriously contended that even the servants of the people, the agents of the people, the trustees of the people, or whatever you please to call them, when here acting in a legislative capacity, shall not be even required to say, "By your leave," to the people, when they put their hands into the treasury of the Commonwealth. Then, Sir, as a fit corollary to this—and I confess it surprised me somewhat—it is said that if we do adopt any such

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—HOPKINSON—SUMNER.

[July 9th.

measure here, they will appeal to the higher power, to the people, with this question, which it is said they cannot understand! Why, does not the gentleman know, when he holds that argument, that he is the very party that says, you shall not submit this question to the people, and that the motion of the gentleman from Taunton, which he opposes, is nothing more nor less than an attempt to take the will of the people on this subject? If you do not adopt some measure in this Convention, how are you to get the opinion of the people with regard to it? When are the people to act upon it? If you submit that proposition to the people, they will be able to act upon it; and if they like it, they will say so; and if they dislike it, they will say so; and then we shall stand where we do now. With what propriety, then, are we threatened with an appeal to the people? An appeal to the people! We thank you. Give it to us. "Keep the word of promise," not only "to the ear," but in the act and performance, and do not "break it to the hope," as soon as you have given it to us. Go to the people. That is what we ask; that is precisely what the other side say we shall not have. The whole argument of the opponents of the restriction goes upon the ground that, if this question is submitted to the people, they would adopt it. Otherwise, it will be of no harm; the people will reject it, and the gentleman gets all he wants. In answer to that, my opinion is that the people are tired of having their servants running them in debt. This will be adopted if submitted to the people, and that is what they fear. While they talk about submitting it to the people, they act in a way to take it away from the people, with all the force they have, and with a degree of eloquence that it would be vain for me to attempt to rival. There is a manifest difference between the two propositions embraced in the amendment, in their dangerous character and tendency. One of the propositions concerns running in debt. But if a man sees fit to lend his money or use the resources he has on hand, he can do so; but he is likely to look pretty sharply upon the mode and manner of the appropriation. When, on the other hand, a man comes to see that he can run in debt without any expectation of paying, he is much more liable to be reckless. There is that difference between a mere speculator and the man of plain, fair dealing. The one lends money and takes property for security, and he is very likely to make himself safe. The other indorses his name, never expecting to be called upon to pay. That is the speculator upon the chances of another man's ability to pay. That is the ground upon which most persons fail, and the ground upon which States become insolvent. This matter of a government running in debt and having such a debt accumulating as England has, the gold to pay which would sink a navy, is of the same character. And does anybody ever expect that debt to be paid? That government has run in debt till there is a class of persons holding government scrip, who become a class of pensioners upon the industry of the people. No man should ever sign a note with the expectation that he will not have it to pay. He ought to know that he can, if called upon, be ready to pay, and not to guess that somebody will pay it and he will not be called upon to pay. If this is sound policy for men of business, dealing with their own friends, it is, for much stronger reasons, sound policy for men who hold in their hands, as trustees, the property of other men. The legislature are the trustees of the property of the Commonwealth. They ought, therefore, to treat it as trustees. There can be no doubt that a court of chancery would decree that a trustee who should make such use of trust property would be held responsible for it.

For these reasons, it appears to me highly inexpedient to give the legislature the power of contracting debts, on behalf of the people, to aid other parties; and a limitation of the power to contract debts directly, by borrowing for the expenses of the government, I think highly expedient, as a constitutional provision. For in all these cases it is best not to embark too widely in loaning the credit of the State. The money which is expended, must ultimately come out of the pockets of the people, and the sooner we apply the test the better.

Therefore, I would have these restrictions; and I approve of the second resolution for that reason, as well as for the stronger reason, in my mind, that it is inexpedient to embark the credit of the State to individuals or corporations in this or that corner of the State, simply because it may promote local prosperity.

I have taken up more time than I intended to, and I will bring my remarks to a close. I ought, perhaps, to apologize to those who were not here yesterday—to those who were here and heard the occasion of it, I need make no apology—I ought, perhaps, to apologize for introducing the subject of the Western Railroad Corporation, or any other local interest. I would not have alluded to it except in defence. Before it was broached, I had hopes that we should all rise above any considerations of that sort, and go to the people with a statesmanlike vote upon this question. There are other reasons why I desired not to say a word on this subject. I happen to be connected, officially, with a corporation which is supposed to have some interest in this matter. I never owned a share in the Western Railroad—I wish I did own a good many; but I am connected with a corporation making a line with that, which has been supposed to have some special interest in this matter of loaning the credit of the State. Those who are acquainted with the circumstances know that that corporation has not seen fit to interfere with this affair. Whatever may be the opinions of gentlemen who are connected with that corporation, as a corporation it has entirely abstained from entering at all into this question. I believe that at this day the people at large have an interest against this thing ten fold stronger than that of the Western Railroad Corporation or any other corporation. I do not pretend to say that I am free from influences in relation to it any more than gentlemen upon the other side, or they more than I; but I have endeavored to lay aside all private interests and all pecuniary considerations. I am inclined to think that the gentlemen on the other side are less moved by the particular case which they have introduced here than they imagine. They probably mistook their own feelings when they said that they were afraid that this little question, affecting a small amount of property, influenced them or anybody else, so that they cannot take a statesmanlike view of the subject. Thanking the Committee for their attention, I will now leave the subject to other hands.

Mr. SUMNER, for Otis. Although the gentleman who last addressed the Convention has occupied more than the half hour which he proposed to occupy, I hope there is still time enough left to enable me to present what few suggestions I have to offer in relation to this question. I have no doubt of the honest purpose and intent of the gentleman who has brought forward this proposition for the purpose of ingrafting it into the Constitution. But, Sir, I submit that it is not one of those propositions—not one of those necessary subjects proper to be placed in the organic law of the State. In forming a Constitution we are, in the first place, to have a declaration of rights and a frame of government, prescribing, in general terms, the powers and duties of the legislative, of the executive, and of the judicial branches of the government, and the necessary concomitants connected with these branches; and with these requisites fulfilled, we shall make a Constitution complete, without embracing such subjects as this. This is one of those subjects which, I believe, we may with safety leave to the legislature, and no remark which I have heard yet made, leads me to suppose that there can be any necessity for any provision in relation to the matter. The whole subject, I think, may more properly be left to the legislature. If it is said, as by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that the subject will be introduced here as a topic for the action of the legislature; and that we may have legislatures who will not appreciate the subject properly and act accordingly; I will reply that I have no fears that subsequent legislatures will not always have in them men of forecast, genius and independence—men who, like the gentleman from Braintree, who addressed us yesterday, (Mr. Stetson,) will never "cave in" nor dodge the question, when matters of this character are before them. Though he may not be here, others like him, I trust, will be here. I am happy to say that in relation to this topic, I have no personal interest whatever. In the excitement which has been created by rival corporations, and in the local feeling which may prevail in some localities in this State, in regard to obtaining the credit of the State, I have no connection whatever. I have been able to stand here and view the subject presented solely as an abstract principle, and pass upon it with my sober judgment, however imperfect that may be, impartially and unbiased.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I had supposed, for one, that it had become somewhat the settled policy of the State not to loan its credit. I had supposed that when, in 1841, upon one of the strongest cases which could have been presented, the legislature refused to grant the credit of the State, for the time being, it was certainly laid down as a principle that they would no longer give such aid. But, after all, we are in a world of change, and such are the interests of this Commonwealth, in every point of view, commercial, manufacturing, agricultural, and, above all, the great railroad interest, that circumstances may arise—a case of magnitude may come up, which will be deserving of patronage. It may be a case of lesser magnitude, but alike deserving of patronage; for I do not subscribe to the principle which the gentleman advocates, that it is only the magnificent projects which are introduced into the legislature that are to receive countenance and assistance from the State, while all of lesser concerns are to be excluded. Hence, I should impose no fetters on the legislature; I would bind

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — SUMNER — MORTON.

[July 9th.]

them by no restrictions in relation to this subject. I would trust the matter confidently in the hands of the legislature and of the executive; for, as I apprehend, the veto power will be left as a check upon the legislature, and we may entertain no great fears as to this and other kindred subjects.

Reference has been made, in the course of this debate, to the example of the State of New York, and of other States. I suspect, Mr. Chairman, that we shall gain very little by any such references. There is a vast difference between the State of New York and the State of Massachusetts, and this difference runs all along through the entire line of comparison between the two States. Although the States lie adjoining each other, their features are all different. Their origin also is different. We are of old England, English; they are of the Dutch, Dutchy—with an admixture of Scotch, Irish, and French, and noblest, perhaps, of all, of Yankees. In their cities, in their towns, and in their counties—in all the features of the two States, they are different. What would be the proper financial, commercial, and governmental policy of one State, would not be the proper policy of the other. New York has a great city, with little or no political influence in the administration of her State affairs; we have a great city, whose influence stretches its great palm over the whole extent of the Commonwealth, more beneficently, in some respects, than is appreciated, in other respects with an oppressiveness deserving to be condemned. So unlike are the States of New York and Massachusetts, that when precedents or examples touching the subject under consideration are brought up here from the State of New York, in relation to fixing in your Constitution a provision, restrictive or otherwise, I not only deny their application to anything within our borders, but I protest against them. There is one thing, however, in relation to the policy of the State of New York, that is worthy of imitation. She looks to herself in all her legislation; in all her progress she looks to her own resources, to her own originality, to her own power, and she guides herself accordingly. Sir, that policy of the State of New York, is a policy to be commended to the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It is said that "the poet paints with language, and the painter speaks with works." The noble Empire State "paints" with the glorious exhibition of her magnificent territory, and "speaks" in the beautiful picture of her thriving millions, and their progress—speaks, also, in the sagacity and wisdom of her statesmen. She has her own laws and her own legislation; and she looks to her own resources, to her own elements, to her own strength, and governs herself and progresses accordingly. Massachusetts should do the same; she should lead and not tamely follow. I repeat, there is no call whatever for our adopting such a provision as is proposed, in our Constitution. Let the legislature take care of the exigencies of the several cases as they shall arise. What are we doing? We are occupying ourselves at the present moment by going into the arena which has just been occupied by the general court, and picking up in that arena a matter over which there has been a hot conflict between two rival corporations, and between the citizens of different sections in the Commonwealth. We are not here under favorable circumstances to legislate by constitutional enactment upon a matter of that kind. The subject is yet too warm—the cinders are yet too hot—the ploughshares over which our legislature have just trodden, are yet too heated for us to follow them, and handle the same subject which they have just handled, and incorporate a provision in relation to it, into the organic law of the State. I know it is said by some gentlemen with great effect, "why not let the matter go to the people?" Sir, there are enough of other matters which must go out to the people; we must send out to them the propositions which will produce enough of dispute and conflict and controversy. Unnecessary propositions let us avoid. It will be enough for them to consider the Bill of Rights which will be presented to them—enough for them to consider the plurality question—enough for them to consider the changes which will be made in your representation, and in the great variety of subjects which must be acted upon by them, enough in all conscience, I submit, without troubling them with this unnecessary matter.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this question, having been submitted to a Committee of the Convention, who have examined it patiently and fully in all its details; I think we ought to be content to abide by the result to which they have arrived. I believe, by so doing, we shall hereafter have the assurance that with that contentment was the greater gain.

The hour to which debate upon this subject in Committee of the Whole, was limited, having expired, the question was stated to be on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Taunton.

Mr. MORTON said he wished to make a slight modification of his amendment, so as to avoid possible misconstruction, without changing the meaning in the least. It was to insert the word "hereafter." It was so modified.

Mr. BUCK, of Lanesborough, asked for a division of the question, so that it might be taken separately on each of the two resolutions embraced in the amendment.

The question was taken on the first branch of the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

The question was taken on the second branch of the amendment, and it was also decided in the negative.

So the amendment did not prevail.

The Report was then agreed to, and on motion by Mr. CUSHMAN, of Bernardston, the Committee rose, and by their chairman reported the same to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The question being on concurring in the Report of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, demanded the previous question.

Mr. MORTON. That motion, I believe, is not debatable to any considerable extent.

The PRESIDENT. No, Sir; debate upon it does not embrace the merits of the main question.

Mr. MORTON. In the limited range allowed to the discussion of the subject, I shall trouble the Convention with but few remarks. And I must be allowed to say that I am somewhat surprised that the proposition for the previous question should be made at this time, when it is well known to the gentleman who moved the previous question, and to others, that amendments are to be proposed. I hope it is not out of order for me to say, that I stated before the question was taken in Committee of the Whole, that it was my purpose to move my amendment in the Convention. Now I ask the Convention, if it is not a matter of right, or at least of parliamentary courtesy, that those who desire to propose amendments, should have an opportunity to do so, afforded them. Therefore, I must hope that the Convention will not think proper, at this time, to order the previous question and thereby preclude gentlemen from having an opportunity to offer amendments, which, it is perfectly well known to the Convention—to many of its members, if not all—it is their purpose to offer.

The PRESIDENT. The previous question has been demanded, and the question is, shall the main question be now put? The demand for the previous question was sustained, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WEEKS, of Harwich, moved that when the question was taken, it should be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion was agreed to, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIRD inquired, if it was in order to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. There has been a decision of the Convention upon the gentleman's motion. He cannot now withdraw it, unless by general consent. The Chair understands that no objection is made. The gentleman, therefore, has leave to withdraw his demand for the previous question.

It was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I propose, now, Sir, to submit the amendment which was offered by me in Committee of the Whole, and seeing the impatience of the Convention, to settle this question, I shall endeavor, in making a very few remarks, to be as concise as I can in conveying my ideas on this subject.

It has been suggested, in relation to this matter, that it is uncalled for by the people. On that point I take issue with the gentlemen on the other side. I contend that this subject has engaged the attention of the people for the last fifteen or twenty years, and I hope it will not be considered as being out of order or indecorous, for me to say, that it has been one of the cardinal points in the creed of the democratic party from the beginning; and has been used as one of their standing arguments, on all occasions. It was embodied in written addresses to the people, and was discussed in all primary assemblies, where political subjects were brought forward. There are many gentlemen who endeavored to influence the public mind in regard to this matter. I believe in 1839 it was one of the principal causes of changing the majority.

We all heard of the improvidence and folly of granting the credit of the State to private corporations, and the lien and mortgage which it fixed upon the whole State. I was one who advocated it. I believe it was a doctrine which prevailed throughout the Commonwealth. I advocated it in all sincerity, and I will not come here now and acknowledge that I used it merely as an electioneering argument. I will add that I brought it forward here under the implied instructions of my constituents.

Now, since gentlemen have seen fit to go into

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — MORTON.

[July 9th.

local allusions, I beg leave to say that but for temporary influences, or for the agitation of certain questions before this Convention, I could not entertain a doubt, that this proposition would pass almost without opposition.

It has been intimated that we are under the influence of certain great corporations in this Commonwealth. I wish to rebut anything of that kind, and am sorry to say, that I am not without fear, that there was some reason why this should occur to the minds of gentlemen who make the charge.

Mr. DAWES, of Adams. I rise for the purpose of an explanation. I do not know that the gentleman from Taunton alludes to me, but the gentleman who preceded him, alluded to me in the same connection, and now I suppose the gentleman from Taunton did so.

Mr. MORTON. It is quite probable.

Mr. DAWES. Had the gentleman been here when I spoke, he would not have supposed I had any personal allusions to himself. I did say that I believed this to be the sentiment of the gentleman from Taunton; but that there were other gentlemen who could not claim the same credit for consistency as the gentleman from Taunton.

Mr. MORTON. I did not hear the gentleman from Adams, upon this subject, but I understood it was maintained by some gentlemen in my absence—that those who were in favor of this restriction in the Constitution were under some secret influences of which they were not aware. Now, as gentlemen have entertained different views, I beg to say that no feeling of interest can have the slightest influence upon my mind. I do not own a single dollar's worth of stock in any railway in the world. I do not know a single stockholder in the Western Railroad, or in the proposed northern route. No man of either party has made any suggestion to me on the subject, and I have no wishes or preferences in relation to either, which can have the slightest influence on my mind. I beg leave to say, that when I came here, I brought with me a resolution which I had prepared, with an intention to offer it at an early day. But I conferred with the friends of the northern railway, and lest it might possibly have some influence upon their application then pending before the legislature, I withheld it till the legislature adjourned. With this explanation I wish to proceed to the examination of the subject.

The real question before us is, whether we shall grant to the legislature the power to pledge the credit of the State, or whether we shall retain it in the hands of the people. That is the substance of the matter. Now, I do not agree with my friend from Braintree. I have no doubt that in the general powers of the legislature, the power to pledge the credit of the State is included. But now the whole subject is before us for revision; and the question is, whether we shall vest in the legislature this power, or retain it in our own hands, and exercise it ourselves. If it is necessary for the proper administration of the affairs of the government, that it should be granted to the legislature, then it ought to be granted. If not, then we ought to withhold it.

Sir, I contend, in the first place, that there is no necessity for this grant. When the grant was originally made to the Western Railroad, I was not in favor of it; but, whether it was right or wrong, it is inexpedient to make any such grants in future. It might have been necessary then, but it is not necessary now. I cannot agree with my friend who said that we are indebted for these grants to the establishment of the Western Railroad. I believe that all past experience has shown, that these things are better carried on by private enterprise than by the use of the public credit; and I have no doubt that the wealth of Boston would have carried through your Western Railroad better than it was done by the use of the State credit.

Things, however, have very much changed of late years. We have had vast accumulations of wealth, and with satisfactory security any amount of money can be obtained, but no man can expect to effect large loans at less than the legal rate of interest, unless the security is extraordinarily good. Either the applicants for State aid will give good security, or they will give doubtful security. If they give good security they can obtain loans at any time, and to any amount; if the security is doubtful, then the State ought, certainly, not to loan its credit. I hope that no one will attempt to advocate such a principle; and, Sir, we all know, that private persons will discover the value of any security much better, and much more readily than any legislative assembly of four hundred men can do. In this view, therefore, I contend, in the outset, that there is no necessity for making this grant; and not only do I contend that it is unnecessary, but that it is a dangerous power to grant—a power that is so liable to abuse, that it should never be exercised without the greatest necessity. If any project offers a doubtful or uncertain security, then the Commonwealth ought not to invest anything in it. If it is good and sufficient, then there is an abundance of private capital to carry it through without application for the loan of the public credit. Nothing is more easy than to get up these plausible projects; and a body of men not feeling that their own personal interest is at stake, are very apt to be led away by specious arguments. I therefore hold, that this is a power which no legislator ought to desire to possess, because a man under such circumstances is so liable to be imposed upon, that he should feel under constant apprehensions that by his vote he might divest himself and others, of property in which, for the time being, he felt little interest, and when he supposed he was only voting for a harmless grant of the credit of the State.

Again, Sir, there is another argument which is not without weight upon my mind. I think that the adoption of this proposition will remove what might otherwise become a source of disgrace to our Commonwealth. If the legislature have not the power to grant the credit of the State, you will not find applications made to that effect. You will not have lobby members watching their opportunity to take legislators by the button and ask them to vote in this or that mode, on such and such a question. I think that the accumulation of lobby influence which has arisen to such an astonishing degree in this Commonwealth, has, of itself, sufficient weight to induce us to take away one of the chief temptations to resort to it; that we should shut the door against it, that we may hear no more of it; and, while I do not wish to impute any improper motives to any gentleman, we all know what means have been resorted to by applicants for aid from the State. Excursions, and parties, and dinners, and eloquent speeches, have been resorted to in times past, as we all well know, and if not from any dishonest motives, at least for the purpose of influencing the members of legislative bodies in some measure. Whether all these things have been proper or improper, it cannot be denied that they have had an influence upon the reputation of the Commonwealth which is not to its advantage; nor that they have been the means of carrying measures through the legislature which I regret should have been adopted by the good old State of Massachusetts. If we can by any means remove the causes of these imputations we are bound to do so.

But, Mr. President, we have had some experience upon this subject. It is rather a recent thing that this plan of raising money has been resorted to. It is but a few years since the thing first started; and we find it has been practiced, more or less, in a majority of the great States of this Union. This facility of accomplishing great objects by the use of State credit captivated the minds of persons in legislative bodies, and we find, in a great number of the States, that the legislatures run their States recklessly into debt, and even went so far, in some instances, that these States could not meet the interest upon their public debts, and attempted that which was a disgrace to them, throughout America, as well as throughout Europe—repudiation. Now, it is against the liability to these disasters that I wish to shut the door. It has been argued that the State of Massachusetts is too wise and too prudent to suffer herself to become involved in such embarrassments. I hope, Sir, that we are wise and prudent; I believe that we are; I pride myself upon it; and in order that we may retain our reputation for wisdom, and prudence, and purity, I would remove all temptation to what may lead to a contrary result.

It is said that we have loaned our credit, again and again, and that we have not suffered from the experiment. That is no proof that we may not suffer by a repetition of the same thing. It is also said, by some, that we are liable for the debts of some corporations whose stock is not very high in the market. Whether that is so, or not, I cannot say; but we ought to guard against any such possibility in future. Because we have been successful heretofore, it does not follow that we shall always be so, or that we may not be taken in by some parties. It would indeed be remarkable, if, pursuing this line of policy, we should not. In making these remarks, I have not the slightest idea of making any allusion to any particular investment or grant which has been heretofore made; I have no opinion to give in regard to any of them; all I contend for, is, that if we make grants to one company or corporation, we shall have to do so to another; and it is beyond the wisdom of man so to act in all these cases, that we shall not, in some of them, be deceived. In consequence of the course which has been pursued here, and also in consequence of the influence which that course of conduct has had upon the prevailing party, I would desire to see a change in this respect. I believe it is now about a dozen years since any such grant was made.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Taunton, but with his permission, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. MORTON. I yield to the gentleman for Erving.

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — MORTON.

[July 9th.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I wish to ask the gentleman, whether he means to convey the impression, that there is any danger of the State suffering loss from any loans that have been already made?

Mr. MORTON. I thought I was very explicit upon that point. I said, that I believed that a member of this body had so intimated, but that I did not know whether his remark was well or ill-founded; but that, so far as I knew at present, I was not aware of any danger.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I rose merely to ask a question, but, with the permission of the gentleman, I wish to say, that I have taken the pains to examine, personally, in regard to every one of the loans, and, so far as I can see, there is no probability nor any possibility of any such danger. I have the opinion of the State Auditor upon the subject.

Mr. MORTON. I am glad to hear that the gentleman for Erving is so well satisfied that there is no danger. I hope it may be so. It gives me pleasure to hear him say that he has examined into the matter, and come to that result. I did not intend to found my argument on the supposition that there was any danger, but meant only to argue, that if we continue these grants, we shall be in danger, because there can be no doubt that local influence will have a bearing upon grants of this description, and, if you make them, you cannot be certain that you are always free from risk; and, if you make a grant in one section of the Commonwealth, claims will arise, and be brought forward from other quarters of the State, which it will be exceedingly difficult to resist. How much wiser is it, in the outset, to decide that we will not, through the legislature, make these grants.

I was about to say, Sir, in continuation of these remarks, that in consequence of the discussion and agitation of this subject throughout the community, and the embarrassment which other States have been brought into, by this loaning of State credit, that nearly or quite every State, that has recently formed or revised its Constitution, has inserted a provision quite or nearly similar to this. I requested a friend to look over the Constitutions of the different States, with a view to ascertain in how many States that was the case. He did so, and informed me that he found the Constitutions of nineteen out of thirty-one States, containing the provision. Upon investigating the matter myself, I found that they were not repudiating States only that had involved themselves in difficulty and embarrassment, but they were States as prudent and wise as ourselves, and some of them brought up and educated by us. Our daughter, Maine, had a provision of this kind in her Constitution. Experience has led these various States to adopt that provision, and is it unworthy of us to follow their example? I trust not. We have, near us and far from us, instances of this kind. There is the little, prudent, but much-abused State of Rhode Island, and I am delighted to say a word or two in her defence, because I believe she is unjustly judged of by the community at large, in relation to her civil and religious character and institutions. I know of no more moral or religious population, than that of a large portion of that State. The wise and prudent State of Rhode Island, which, I believe, has but seventy members in her House of Representatives, and which transacts her legislative business in a session of five days instead of five months, thought it wise and best to insert into her Constitution that provision.

The great State of New York, too, embarked beyond precedent in internal improvements, and which has had success unequalled by any portion of the world; that great State, with its immense resources, thought fit to adopt a provision precisely in principle like the one which has been offered here; that is, that a grant of the State credit should not be made without the question being first submitted to the people. And what has been the result of that? The gentleman for Otis, (Mr. Sumner,) referred to that State, and praised her wisdom upon certain subjects. I will defend her wisdom upon this subject as an example worthy of our imitation. That provision has saved millions to that State, and it has removed, from her a degree of infamy which never attached to any other State in the Union. Notwithstanding the constitutional provision, the legislature, desirous of going on with her public works, set it at defiance, and made a grant of loan of nine or ten millions of dollars, and in the expenditure of that money, corruption between the government and the agents, who undertook to disburse it, was unexampled. But, thanks to Providence, it was all resisted, and stayed by the firmness and independence of the judiciary. A more valuable instance of the importance of the judicial power and of the independence of the judiciary, never existed in the world. And in justice to many friends who may differ from me, by and by, upon another subject, I wish to say, in this connection, that those judges were elected by the people, and yet they stood up in opposition to the majority of that legislature, and resisted the most nefarious project that ever was set on foot. Now they have come back to the right source, and are looking to the people. They have come back to where I wish that we should come in forming this constitutional provision—to the people themselves. They have determined to ask the people for those ten millions of dollars, and I have no doubt the people will grant it, and I hope they will take care that it is not a source of corruption by being improperly expended. As careful as they may be, I believe that seven or eight millions of dollars in the hands of private individuals would accomplish more than ten millions in the hands of the State.

But I do not wish to take advantage of the indulgence of the Convention and trespass upon them beyond what is reasonable. I wish it distinctly understood that this provision does not prevent grants from being made to corporations or individuals. It only retains the power of making those grants in the hands of the people. My friend for Montague, (Mr. Alvord,) who has set an example of dignity and moderation in the discussion of this subject worthy the imitation of older men, maintains that the people never will make any such grants, and that such a provision will be fatal to any future project. Now, I have some confidence in the people, and the example of New York shows that they may be trusted. If the people are there willing to expend ten millions of dollars upon their improvements, I have no doubt, and can there be any doubt, if you bring forward a proposition here that shall interest the whole community, and be a general benefit to every portion of the State, that the people will give their consent.

Mr. President, I desired, though it is not very important, to avail myself of the illustration brought forward by my friend from Charlemont, (Mr. Foster,) though not personally acquainted with him, I take the liberty of calling him my friend, without any fear that he will not reciprocate the favor, for, from the benignity of his countenance and the kindness of his heart, and his general aim to accomplish that which he deems right and good, I cannot doubt that his heart is filled with benevolence, and that he will be delighted to acknowledge every one of the human family not only as friends, but brothers. I say I desire to avail myself of the illustration which he brought forward, although I do not exactly recall it. It was something like this: it seemed to carry the idea that the Commonwealth was a great rich parent, and that the corporations in the Commonwealth, numerous as they are, were her children. I suppose, in some sense, that is true. He went on to illustrate his view of the subject by suggesting that the parent had given something to "A" and something to "B," and so on with half a dozen children, and now, all at once, it was going to shut down the gate, and deprive the youngest children of their share. The illustration was something like this: he had given "A" something to buy a ticket in the lottery, and so on nearly through the alphabet, and finally, the youngest comes up and says: "You have made these grants to my older brothers, now let me have my share." But, says the parent: "You may lose it or draw a blank." He replies: "All my brothers before me drew prizes—enough to pay expenses, and have not lost anything." But, says the parent: "I do not like the principle, and besides, some of the tickets have not been drawn yet, and I am not certain that they will draw prizes." "O, but the man who sold me the tickets warranted them to draw prizes." The parent says: "I do not like the principle, and I am sorry I ever made the grants to your elder brothers, and I think it is my duty to stop here, and not lead you into the temptation of getting money by lottery tickets; but I should rather encourage you to gain your living by honest industry." Now, Sir, I think the illustration very much in my favor.

I propose to leave the first proposition and say a word or two in relation to the other. I hope, therefore, we shall proceed and restrict this power of loaning the State credit, and, taking it away from the legislature, leave it with the people. In their wisdom and discretion in this and other acts, I have the highest confidence, and with them I think the power is much safer than in other hands.

The second proposition is entirely different from the first. The first prohibits the granting of the credit of the State to individuals or corporations, and the second prohibits the legislature from running into debt beyond the sum of one million of dollars. Neither of them have reference to what now exists, but both are prospective. I think the management of the pecuniary affairs of a State and nation is one of the most difficult connected with the government. Its exercise leads to more corruption, and holds out more temptation, than the exercise of any other power. I see the effect of it in our general government, and what reason have we to suppose that the same will not be the case with our State government? You hear of the Galphin case, and of the Gardner peculation, and a thousand things of that kind, which never would take place, if the money thus thrown away had to be raised by a direct tax upon the people, so that every man could see exactly the number of dollars he paid for the support of the government. Then they would be careful to see what disposition was made of it.

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—HALLETT.

[July 9th.

My object in offering this amendment is, that the legislature, in their administration of the government, shall be constrained to resort to the taxing power for their support. It is merely to require them, when they make an expenditure, to lay a tax to pay it. I will not now discuss the subject, which I have much at heart, in relation to direct and indirect taxation. But I wish to compel the legislature, when they make a grant, to make a provision for the payment of it, and a margin of one million of dollars is quite sufficient to enable them, at all times, to anticipate their expenditures. If we place that check upon their action, we shall have the assurance that they will not make a grant, without at the same time making a provision to meet it; and in this view, it will commend itself to the consideration of the members of this Convention.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I would not have said anything upon this resolution had it not been presented precisely in the form in which it now comes before us. Let us lift this question out of the local considerations and interests which surround it. Let us withdraw it from the conflict of rival corporations. What have we to do with them? The moment you begin to talk of corporations in this Commonwealth, you talk about an empire within an empire. You talk about associations which that Report from the Secretary of State, now upon your table, shows has an invested capital of $400,000,000; compared with which, the revenues and credit of the State, I had almost said the property of the State, is as nothing in the balance. And now, to-day, begins in this Convention that conflict, which is the conflict of modern times—a conflict between the people and incorporated wealth. It proposes precisely that change in the Constitution which must be looked at by every man who would maintain republican governments, and who would do so by observing the progress in governments from that age when land was the ruling and despotic power, to the present time, when incorporated wealth is the ruling power. The question comes to us, in this Convention, who are the principals, and who are the agents, in contributing to the establishment of this great incorporated power of wealth? The people are the principals in government, and the legislature is the agent, and nothing but an agent. The Constitution is the power of attorney of that agent. Now, Sir, we stand here to-day acting as if we were the whole people, about to make a power of attorney—the Constitution—for our agent, the legislature. That is our position, and the question put to us is simply this: Will you authorize this agent, without restriction, to use the credit of the State, or will you say that your agent shall come back to the people, and ask them whether it shall use their credit or not? What is the credit of the State? It is the power of taxation, and that is the whole of it. What does taxation apply to? To the property of the whole State. Who owns the property of the State? The individual citizens, the people. Then how does the question stand? Shall the agent take the property of the individual citizens of this Commonwealth, and pledge it without their consent? That is the question.

The illustration of the gentleman from Charlemont, (Mr. Foster,) alluded to by the gentleman who preceded me, (Mr. Morton,) was, that the parent himself was to decide—as between his elder and younger sons—whether he would loan money to the child or not. That might well do in family affairs, because the parent himself judges. But you propose that there shall be an intervening power to say whether the parent shall loan the money or not, without consulting the parent at all. Will you say that the legislature of Massachusetts may, without any restriction, take the credit of this Commonwealth, and loan it to whom they please, and to any amount they please? That is the proposition, if you reject the amendment which is upon the table.

Why, Sir, if you want projects of this kind, there are enough of them besides the Hoosac Tunnel and the Western Railroad.

There is the project of the dykes to transform the salt marshes of Cape Cod into luxuriant meadows, and that child has in vain asked for a very small loan from its parent, who is so lavish of his money and credit upon railroads that ruin poor Cape Cod. If you have no generosity but for railroads, then Cape Cod has her railroad to Provincetown for which she should demand her share of State credit. Let the people decide.

The question is this: will you so leave this matter that some great power, some great corporation, may come into the legislature and draw to itself the credit of the State for its own purposes and benefit, while at the same time you will throw out all the smaller interests which come here struggling to get their share of it?

And who is to judge of this? The people? No, you say the people shall not judge. You say that the legislature shall judge; and who are the legislature? Why, men elected by these very corporations, whose object it is to carry through a particular project—chosen when the people are asleep upon the subject, and know not the purpose for which their representatives are elected. They will have a majority of the legislature, and that majority can pledge the credit of the State for ten, twenty, thirty millions, or for any amount of money they may think proper. And what is the effect of pledging the credit of the State? Is it not to mortgage every farm in the Commonwealth? I know the idea has been ridiculed that the farms of the Commonwealth are mortgaged, but I ask if that is not the practical result? What is the credit of the State? It is a pledge to redeem money. It is an indorsement of the note of a corporation. It is precisely the same as indorsing a note of hand given by an individual in trade. When the question of the payment, either of principal or interest, comes up, the indorser is as much bound for it as is the maker who gives it. If he hesitates, his credit fails. Now will Massachusetts hesitate upon such an occasion? Why, Sir, if the occasion should arrive when it were required to put all the farms in the Commonwealth up at auction to redeem the credit of the State, I undertake to say there is not a man who owns an acre of land in the Commonwealth, who would not say: "Sell my farm, but save my honor. Let not Massachusetts repudiate." Sir, for whatever amount you pledge the credit of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, she is bound to redeem that amount, if it should ever become necessary for it to be redeemed, even should it involve every dollar of taxable property owned by every citizen in the Commonwealth.

Now is not this a matter of some importance? You say the credit will always be safely used. Well, Sir, who is the better judge of what is safest and best? Are the representatives in the legislature, who come here under influences about which the people know nothing, or are the people themselves? That is the proposition. You cannot escape from the principle laid down here, which holds the credit of the people subject to the will of the people, and therefore, we ought to say it shall not go beyond their power. Sir, I have considered every grant of this description, from that to the Western Railroad down, as in its origin, absolutely unconstitutional. And why? Because there never was one particle of power or authority in the Constitution to authorize it. When the Constitution was made in 1780, and when it was revised in 1820, nobody dreamed of such a thing as a loan of the State credit. It is a modern invention, and therefore there was not a word put into the Constitution about it. The legislature, it is said, may pass wholesome and necessary laws, and under that clause they have sought to find the authority for granting these loans. The question has never been brought before the Supreme Court, whether these loans were constitutional or not, and therefore you have not had even an adjudication upon the subject. I think if the question had come before the learned gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) who preceded me, and who has so ably argued this question, when he was in the possession of judicial power, he would have come to the conclusion that there was no authority under the Constitution for making these grants.

But now you have got a new construction put upon the Constitution by usage. And what is it? The legislature have gone on and made these grants. It at one time pledged the credit of the State for $7,000,000. Gentlemen have said it was all safe, and perhaps it is all safe. I have nothing to say against these corporations. I am rejoiced at their prosperity. But I am looking at the principle. I do not wish to incur the risk again. We have incurred it once. Sir, that risk was pointed out in 1839, by a good many of my friends who are now so anxious to have the credit of the State scattered all over the State. I wish to go back to the fundamental principles upon which the democratic party stood in 1839. I am rejoiced to find men who were of a different opinion then, coming now to stand upon that principle. And shall we now depart from that which has become the governing principle of nineteen of the States of this Union? When, moreover, it is now admitted to be sound doctrine, by many who were opposed to the principle in 1839 and 1840?

Now, when we are making a Constitution, shall we hesitate to incorporate this principle in it? Is there any danger in putting it there? I maintain that it is our duty to put it there, because a practice has grown up—a construction has been put upon the Constitution, and sanctioned by usage, by which the legislature may grant the loan of

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — HALLETT.

[July 9th.

the credit of the State, without any limitation or restriction whatever. Well, Sir, that being the usage under the Constitution, and a proposition having been introduced here to limit that usage in future, and voted down by the Convention, what is the result? It is directly saying, by the Convention, that the legislature is at liberty to make unlimited loans of the credit of the State. Now, Sir, if this is the object, I say, put it boldly into the Constitution, and do not have an evasive construction of public welfare upon this point. If you mean to say that the legislature shall not loan the credit of the State without the consent of the people, then put such a provision into the Constitution and say so. But if you mean to reject that proposition, then put into the Constitution a provision that the legislature shall have power to loan the credit of the State to corporations for purposes of internal improvement, or for any purpose you may see fit to authorize. Say that, and I am content, if it is the judgment of the majority, for if I cannot get all I want in this Constitution, I will go for what I do get. Put that to the people and you will not evade the question. The people will have the opportunity either of accepting it or rejecting it. If they accept it, then the legislature will have full power over the subject, but if they reject it, then you may know that they mean to restrain the legislature in the exercise of this power. But if you evade it, if you lay it upon the table, if you refuse to put any provision in the Constitution with reference to it, then you say to the legislature: "Go on, and we will not allow the people to say you shall not go on."

Then, Mr. President, one other point. Why do gentlemen object to this proposition? Why does my friend for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) object? Why do our friends on the line of the Hoosac Tunnel, which I hope will go through, one of these days, come here and make this a local question? What do we propose to do? Do we propose to prohibit the credit of the State from being loaned? Certainly not. We propose that when a corporation need such a loan, that they shall come to the legislature, and if they make out a reasonable case, the legislature will submit the question to the people, and if it can command a majority of their votes, the credit of the State will be granted. Make such a provision, and you will have such a power in your Constitution as you want to enable the legislature to submit the question to the people; for I hold, and I think your judiciary would hold, that under the existing form of government, with the limitations which are placed upon each department of your government, the legislature has no right to submit a proposition of loaning credit to a corporation, to the people. But if you put this proposition into the Constitution, you put it in the power of the legislature to bring the question directly before the people.

Now, is there one man in this Convention who is prepared to say that a loan of $3,000,000 ought to be given to any corporation in this Commonwealth, unless a majority of the people of the Commonwealth are in favor of it? I do not believe one man will say that. Well, then, if he admits that no loan of the State credit ought to be given against the consent of a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, why does he hesitate to ask their consent? Why does he hesitate to provide that it shall be put in a form in which it shall be submitted directly to the people? Is not that bringing the question directly to the point? If gentlemen will reject that proposition, is it not virtually saying: "I have a project to secure the credit of the State, which I dare not submit to the people, for fear they will reject it, and I will therefore go and lobby with the legislature and see if I cannot get it from them?" Is not that the position of gentlemen who will not put this provision in the Constitution? Why not provide to put each question that may come up, distinctly to the people, if the legislature deem it of sufficient importance? Let any corporation that has a great public object, say, here is a proposition which we submit to the legislature and ask them to submit it to the people. Then if they do submit it and a majority of the people vote in favor of it, such a corporation will have the support of the people to the utmost extent, and its power will be greater, infinitely greater for the public good, than if a loan were obtained under the doubtful authority of the legislature, as it now stands.

Then in relation to this matter before the legislature, how much more time will be spent if you leave the question an open one on its merits, to go to the people, than to leave it for a lobby contest in the legislature. By the existing practice you invite applications from all quarters. You make your legislature a mere stock-jobbing board, for the purpose of dealing out stock to the associations which come there for their particular projects, because every man will maintain, and I shall maintain this doctrine—that if you authorize the legislature to grant the credit of the State to one project, you are bound to grant it to all, with reasonably fair claims. You have no right to stop any where short of that. You have no right to lend $3,000,000 to tunnel the Hoosac Mountain, in order to draw away the trade of the coasting vessels of barren Cape Cod—you have no right to destroy the little that remains of the heavy freighting business of Cape Cod, from which hundreds have already been driven, solely by the operation of the Western Railroad, unless you also give $300,000 to run a railroad down to the extreme point of Cape Cod, to meet the landing of the Pilgrims. You ought at least to do that, in justice to that industrious people whose business you have already helped to take away. Claims will come here from all over the Commonwealth, of so nearly equal justice, that if you grant one you must grant all, or you will be partial and unjust.

But if you put this proposition into the Constitution, what do you do? You impose a limitation upon applicants, as well as upon the legislature; you give some sort of protection to the legislature from the applications that will otherwise be made. When they bring forward a project which carries with it any considerable force, it will be submitted by the legislature to the people, and if it is an object of manifest general interest or importance, they will go for it; but if they find it is for a merely local purpose, to build up one section of the State at the expense of another, they will reject it, and there will be an end of it.

Now, Mr. President, I say that upon every rule which should govern legislation and which should govern fundamental law, this provision ought to go into the Constitution; upon every rule of expediency it ought to be placed there, not for the benefit or disadvantage of this corporation which comes here and asks so large a share of the credit of the State, nor for the benefit or disadvantage of that other corporation which, after having had one-half of the share of the credit of the State already, comes here and complains that another corporation wants the other half. Not for the benefit of any of these corporations, but for the benefit of the whole people of this Commonwealth, should you fix some limit to these grants. Then you will stand upon a principle that is uniform in its action, and which the people will approve. But if you say to the people of the Commonwealth that you will not allow them the privilege of deciding whether they will restrict the legislature in regard to the use of their own credit, they may well complain that you did not give them the power of expressing an opinion upon a question of the greatest interest to them.

Now a word in regard to these examples in other States. We might leave the Constitution as we found it if we had not been called upon to amend it; but being called upon to amend it, let us look at what has been done in other States. And what is the example of the great State of New York? The gentleman from Taunton has referred to a judicial decision which was made there against the attempted action of the legislature to create a loan of nine millions to the Erie Canal, in violation of the Constitution. But the work for which the aid of the State was asked, was one of great public importance—one in which the State alone was interested, and doubtless the people will, in some constitutional form, or by an amendment of the Constitution, sanction the loan of the credit of the State for that purpose. And that is precisely what the result would be in Massachusetts, if a project of any great public interest should be submitted to the people. The people of the State of New York wanted their own canal enlarged. The legislature had no power to grant any aid upon the credit of the State, beyond the revenues derived from certain sources, but they undertook to make the grant in violation of the Constitution. They passed a law for that purpose, without the consent of the people, and the judiciary of that State declared that law null and void. And let me say to the gentleman from Taunton—(Mr. Morton,) and I want him to bear that fact in mind by-and-by,—that the judiciary which made that decision was an elective judiciary, not one which had the power of holding their tenure of office for life, but an elective judiciary, independent of mere executive appointment. What has been the result in New York in this respect? Why, Sir, it has preserved its Constitution; it has vindicated the independence and purity of its judiciary, and it has secured its great internal improvement in a constitutional and proper manner. It is true that, by these means, it has been delayed for some two years, but what is two years in the life-time of a State compared with the question whether that State should carry on its operations in a constitutional and lawful manner?

Let us, then, establish that principle. Let us not approve or reject any of these claims, but let us say what we are called upon to say, that if any great work comes before the legislature, with claims upon the credit of the people, the legislature shall submit the question to the people, and if they say aye, the credit of the State shall be loaned, but if they say no, it shall not. It seems to me that is the least we can do in the position in which the question now stands.

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—STEVENSON—DANA.

[July 9th.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Boston. I desire to ask the Chair whether it is now in order to move a substitute for the resolve reported from the Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT. It is not, at this time. A substitute is already pending, offered by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton).

Mr. STEVENSON. Then I give notice that if the amendment of the gentleman from Taunton fails, I shall offer a substitute for that resolve. I desire to give this notice in order to avoid the previous question.

As the question stands before the Convention now, it seems to me to be this: Will you allow your government to aid, by the use of the credit of the State of Massachusetts, a great public undertaking? According to the views of some gentlemen here, we will deny that power, and withhold it entirely. Will you agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Taunton—as I understand it—and confer upon your legislature a power only to be exercised by an appeal to the people?

I think the power ought to rest in the government itself, to aid in great public undertakings, to aid in the prosecution of works of internal improvements, when it can be shown that the general interests of the community would be promoted in the prosecution of those works; because, as was well said by the gentleman from Greenfield, you are making an appeal from a tribunal itself which has the opportunity to make a thorough investigation, to another tribunal, which has not the power of making such investigation, and hearing the evidence upon the merits of which each case ought to rest. This power is to be exercised in individual cases. The merits of these cases rest upon, and must be developed by, evidence which the majority of the voters of this Commonwealth cannot and will not investigate—which the legislature can obtain for itself. Each of these laws, if laws are proposed upon this subject, will rest upon the result of the investigation which voters are not prepared to make. For that reason, I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton). Neither could I vote for a proposition which should take from the government the power of aiding in the prosecution of public works, after it shall be shown that it is palpably important for the interests of the people that these public works should be promoted. The first proposition leaves the power, as stated by the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) entirely with the legislature. I am ready to leave it there. I agree with the gentlemen who have addressed the Committee upon the subject, that this is a power which it may be very desirable sometimes to exercise. It is the abuse of the power which leads gentlemen here to ask the Convention to propose to the people that they shall take away that power. If we can find some little ground where we can leave the power in the legislature, and then render its abuse improper, that would be the ground upon which I should like to stand. We all know that there is a vast difference in the minds of men in regard to loaning the credit of the State, and loaning the actual moneys of the State. There is a vast difference, not only in the minds of men in regard to their public acts in that direction, but there is also in the conduct of their private business. You shall go to one commission merchant and pay him a commission for making you an actual advance of money for your purposes, and you shall go to another commission merchant and pay him a commission for making you an actual advance of money for your purposes. One you call a speculator, because he takes pay for a mere risk that he runs, and the other you do not call a speculator, because he does not use the means in his hands for profit. The amendment which I desire to offer, and which I suppose is not in order, is this. I propose that the Constitution should take from the legislature the power to loan the credit of the State, but leave in their hands the power to loan the moneys of the State, in aid of any great public undertaking, provided that the same bill should lay a tax to replenish the treasury for a like amount. What would be its practical operation? As I look at it, the real practical operation of such a proposition as that, would be this—that where there was a clear case, which could be fully made out, and which would justify the legislature in granting aid, such aid would be granted, and it would be done on account of the fact that the legislature individually, and committees of the legislature would believe, and have a right to believe, that the people would approve the course they would take, because the work was to be of general and public interest, and it would prevent the loaning of the credit of the State to the creation of a State debt, in cases where it could not be clearly and fully justified. It would prevent, therefore, the abuse of power; it would leave the power to be exercised in a clear case, and it would withhold the power in a doubtful case. I wish, if the amendment of the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) does not prevail, to propose an amendment in the form I have suggested.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. It is with a great deal of diffidence that I venture to address the Convention upon a question of finance, because, if there is anything in the world of which I am ignorant, it is the subject of finance. Fortunately, my ignorance upon that point is balanced by ignorance upon another, the merits of the Western Railroad and the Hoosac Tunnel, and this balance of ignorances, I hope, may qualify me to say something upon this question. I feel no particular interest in this debate upon the Western Railroad and the Hoosac Tunnel, and I confess that whenever I have heard gentlemen in this debate speaking of these works, I have taken up an interesting pamphlet and have begun to read. It seems to me that this question ought to be decided upon general principles, and those general principles do not relate to finances, but they relate to the very theory of government. They have been so met by the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) and many others who have spoken here. The question now before the Convention is, whether we shall go on as we have done, and leave it to the legislature to say whether the credit of the State shall be lent or not. I wish to use the word "loan" out of respect to the Committee, but I would rather refer it to a Committee on the Advancement of Learning, to say whether there is such a verb in the English language. I am not quite certain about it, but out of respect to the Committee I will say "loan." The question is, whether the loaning of the credit of the State shall be left to the legislature or referred by the legislature to the people. The proposition is undoubtedly true that the people have a right to decide, if they choose, all these questions. The real question here is, whether this is one of those things that the people wish to decide; whether it is one of those cases which it is judicious that the people should decide, or whether it can best be decided by the legislature. It is very frequently said upon this floor by gentlemen, that they are willing to trust the people. I hope we are willing to do so. I hope so, because as I happen to be a member of that respectable body called the people, I wish to see them complimented, but I do not wish myself to be the complimenter. The real question is, whether these particular cases are the cases upon which the people in Massachusetts, I mean the 200,000 voters of the Commonwealth—I believe we have something like that number—can better decide than the tribunals can decide. There are some questions which the people can decide best, and there are some questions which the tribunals can best decide. I should be very willing to submit the question to the people, whether there shall be capital punishment. But I submit to every gentleman upon this floor, whether he would be willing to submit the question to the people, whether each particular man ought to be hung or not. I understand that these questions of loaning the credit of the State are each to be decided upon its own circumstances. I would submit very willingly to the people to say, whether the credit of the State should ever be loaned or not. The question whether the credit of the State shall be loaned in this particular case, would be a great deal like taking a case from a court and jury and submitting the question whether a particular man should be punished or not in a particular case. It argues no disrespect to the people to say, that I prefer that the question should be lodged with the court and jury to determine how the law should be applied in each particular case, although the people might decide the question generally. I do not understand that the question is, shall the credit of the State never be loaned, or shall it always be loaned. Either of these propositions the people could well pass upon. The real question is, when shall the credit of the State be loaned? I suppose that circumstances will decide each case. You wish to know in the first place the state of the finances of the Commonwealth. In the second place you wish to know what the project is for which they wish the credit of the State. You wish to know the prospects of this corporation. What does the corporation propose to do? What great object has it to answer? What security is the corporation to give, and what is its nature? How good is it? When is the work to be built and under what circumstances, and by what instrumentalities? These are questions of fact and circumstances, which must be developed by careful examination, and thoroughly understood, before any man can pass upon them. I submit to gentlemen of this Convention to take them home to their own judgments. Could you pronounce now upon the question of loaning the credit of the State without a careful examination? I should wish to see the directors of the corporation before a committee, who may examine them under oath. I should wish to know exactly what kind of security they offered to the whole Commonwealth

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—DANA.

[July 9th.

—I wish to know how and when they purpose to accomplish their object. Until I have got all these facts and under the most solemn sanction of an oath, I could not vote intelligently to loan the credit of the State, nor could I vote intelligently to refuse the credit of the State. I think it very likely were these questions to go to the people that they might generally refuse. Our judgment in a mass is good upon great propositions, but I submit, with the utmost respect for ourselves, that we are not the tribunal for deciding questions which involve complicated details and circumstances to be ascertained with a great deal of care and research, and not to be determined upon without great application of time. The tribunal we have established, the legislature, is the best adapted for that purpose.

Another reason which leads me to believe it is better that all these questions, in each particular case, should be decided by the legislature is, that one great point is to bring home responsibility. I honestly believe if you were to provide that the legislature should not decide these questions, but simply pass them through to the people, that the sense of responsibility in the legislature would be impaired if not lost. I have never had an opportunity of being a member of a legislative body—I have heard something about them, and have sometimes seen them at a distance, but I submit to the judgment of members of this Convention, who have been in the legislature, whether the result would not be very much like this. Here is a powerful corporation or powerful section of the country that comes to the legislature for a loan of the credit of the State. As it now stands, the responsibility is with the legislature, and when the yeas and nays are taken, and when you vote as a member of the legislature, you vote finally, whether the credit of the State shall be loaned or not. If the enterprise turn out badly the responsibility is traced home by the yeas and nays to you, me, and every man. Now, suppose the legislature did not decide finally, and your powerful corporation or section of the country asks permission of the legislature to go to the people. The legislature become the mere door-keeper, and the corporation comes up and asks admission to go through to the people. It claims the right to do so. I can imagine how they might press upon the legislature a scheme of appropriation and say to the legislature, you are not the people, you are not the law-making power, you are put forth as an advance guard to look at things and see that nothing frivolous or scandalous goes to the public. The people is the tribunal and we wish to go to them. It is evident with how much force these considerations might be pressed upon each member of the legislature. I wish to know whether any legislature can stand between the corporation or section of the country and such arguments as these. I do not mean to say such arguments as I have presented here so imperfectly, but such arguments as might be presented, with greater power, in actual cases, to the legislature, and where each man is taken by the button and privately told, my dear Sir, we do not mean to make you responsible; we only desire you to say to your constituents that it was a question which it was best to leave to the people. Let me suggest another consideration here, and that is the veto power in the governor. I believe that to be not only a strong conservative and popular, but an essential power. Under what responsibility does he exercise that power now? While it will not be unconstitutional to loan the credit of the State,—although in the opinion of my friend for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) it will always be so,—where does the governor stand?

Then where does the governor stand? He stands to watch over the action of the legislature, to see that nothing grossly partial, nothing that hazards the finances of the State shall be done by the legislature. He signs the bill if he approves it, and now becomes responsible for that bill for ever. And if the credit of this State is to be loaned to the Hoosac Tunnel, or any other tunnel, or the Hoosac anything else, the governor is responsible for that, and his name goes down to posterity with it; and if it turns out to have been an improvident loan, he must bear the blame of it. But what will the governor have to do under the proposed plan? Why he has simply to say whether that question shall go to the people or not. And what is his veto responsibility good for then, in such a case? Will he exercise it? I speak under the correction, for I am in the presence, of three governors, and I wish to know how they would like to exercise the power. The legislature have said here is a case for the people; and the governor would say, it is constitutional, the people are to pass upon it, and why should I say the people shall not pass upon it? I beg the Convention to consider that no governor would say that the people shall not pass upon it. For when no constitutional question is at stake, what is the governor but the servant of the people? I venture to say that no governor would exercise the veto power in such a case. Every law has these two great guards, the responsibility of the legislature and the responsibility of the governor. Then what do you gain instead of it? You gain the necessity of submitting to two hundred thousand voters a proposition, the merits of which depend upon its details, and those are to be submitted to two hundred thousand voters. And how are these details obtained? You get them thoroughly in legislation. But if the legislature come to feel that they are mere door-keepers you will not get them thoroughly. No, Sir. Consider that. The moment you make this change the reports of committees will be less valuable than now, and the controlling power of the legislature will be less valuable; the votes in the legislature and the debates will be less valuable, and the people will have inferior means of information; and the question, the merits of which depends upon its details, will go before the two hundred thousand voters, and they will vote upon the details and that is all. And often these are sectional questions. Now is not that the least of all desirable to put to the people of the State, the decision of a sectional question? I should regret to see put to the people of the State a question which lay, or which was supposed to lie, between the interests of the sands of Cape Cod, where the affections of the gentleman for Wilbraham are, and the hills of Berkshire. I submit that sectional questions are most fairly decided by tribunals, and not so well decided, not decided with so much coolness and calmness by the people in masses. For if one of these sectional questions should arise in connection with a general election in this State, the result of the election would be most unfortunate; most unfortunate, not only on that issue, but on all issues. Imagine a contest between Berkshire and Cape Cod thrown into the issue of a state election. What would the popular vote be good for? It would all turn on the question between the sands and the rocks, and that would be the whole of it. I think sectional questions are bad questions to put to the people at excited popular elections.

The delegate for Wilbraham says that if money is given to aid one corporation it should be given to all. Does not that apply to the question which is to go to the people as well as to the legislature? If the legislature ought to give to one because it has given to another, so ought the people. It applies to one as well as to the other.

Reference has been frequently made to the action of the legislature of New York, and I will detain the Convention for a moment to refer to that subject. The legislature of the State of New York granted the loan of the State credit to widen the Erie Canal. Was not that measure a proper one in itself? Certainly it was, only it was not constitutional. Because the people of New York, in their alarm lest they should get into debt and repudiation, had taken away the power of the legislature to act without referring to the people. But the legislature did grant the credit of the State; and the matter went to the supreme court and the court said that the act was unconstitutional. Then they went back to a new legislature and got the same thing done in another form after a delay of two years. So that the amount of the New York precedent is, that a very proper act, which every-body believes to be proper, the loaning of the credit of the State to widen her canal, was delayed two years on a matter of form.

If the legislature had decided one way and the people another, then the benefit of the constitutional provision would be seen; but as the legislature and the people agreed in their act precisely in that particular case, the provision of the Constitution simply caused a delay of two years.

Mr. HALLETT. The gentleman will allow me to say that that question is still pending; it has not been finally disposed of.

Mr. DANA. So I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. HALLETT. The people indicated by the choice of their rulers what they would have done. It is recommended by their governor and the question is now pending, but it is the very question which is to come to the people for confirmation.

Mr. DANA. I would ask the gentleman whether he does not suppose that the people will approve of the bill finally?

Mr. HALLETT. I presume they will; because it is a question which they have already passed upon in another form.

Mr. DANA. Then the result is precisely as I stated. It only caused two years' delay.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. It is only one year since it was passed.

Mr. DANA. But it will be two before the law can go into effect.

Mr. HALLETT. That act was in reference to their canal project, from which all their proceeds, and income to support the government are derived. Our proposition is for the approval of a loan from which we shall receive no proceeds.

Mr. DANA. That is a matter of detail. As to the proposition of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Stevenson,) I shall be somewhat diffident in speaking of it, because he is decidedly a financier, and I am most decidedly not. But I understand him to say, that the best security is, that the State shall not loan its credit, but may loan its money. Now, if a State must get the money elsewhere, in order to lend it, the result is the same in the end. He says that is not his plan. Then the result is, they must get it by taxation. And, if they get it by taxation, it strikes me that the taxation would operate very unequally; because it would have to fall on one period of time, so as to make the tax far greater at that time than another. I may be wrong, but it appears to me there are some objections, if the money is to be raised in one limited period of time, because there will not be such a distribution of the tax as ought to be made. I speak, however, under correction, as I profess to know nothing on the subject.

Saturday.]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—GRAY.

[July 9th.

I return to the main question. It is my belief, and I submit it to the judgment of the Convention, that if you adopt this very plausible system of referring these questions to the people, you lose the benefit, in the first place, of the legislative responsibility. You lose the benefit of the gubernatorial responsibility, and you submit to the people a question, which, because of its sectional character usually, and because its merits turn upon its details always, is one upon which the people are little qualified to judge, and one upon which, I am inclined to think, the people by no means desire to decide.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I should not have been willing to take the floor, when the floor is very naturally so much in demand, except, that as my name is to be called to give a vote on this question, I would like to give a reason for that vote. I feel compelled to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Taunton. In the first place, Sir,—and I am glad that the fact is so,—I have been anticipated by the remarks of the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana). He has well set forth the doctrine, I think, that by adopting an expedient of this kind, we destroy responsibility. I take the theory of our government to be this: that if we were a small community in the cabin of the Mayflower, or in the little town of Plymouth, we should meet together probably, not a larger number of persons than there are at this Convention, and govern ourselves in that primary meeting. Because, then, Sir, those who govern could discuss, could confer, and could deliberate. But, Sir, when we are multiplied—and I speak now of those eligible to office and capable of discharging its duties—to two hundred thousand, and when we are spread over some hundred square miles of territory, such deliberation becomes impossible. And what do we do? We appoint those who can deliberate, and confer, and act for us. Well, now, Sir, admit that the people—and I am far from denying it—could be dwarfed and crowded into this hall—and the great poet of England speaks of a body in a lower region, where they compressed themselves together into a meeting of tens and hundreds of thousands, in a hall—I am not going to say, that if all the legal voters could come here, and bring themselves within these walls, they would not do the business better than we, or than any legislature can do it. But that is not the case. You propose to call upon the people to act, while, however wise each of them may be, individually, they have no chance to confer with each other. How often does the gentleman from Greenfield, whose doctrine I have heard referred to, and with which I agree, how often does he see me, and what else could he do, in his mortal lifetime, if he was obliged to come and consult with me, and with all my constituents, on public measures? In order to remedy this evil, we give it, not to a single assembly of men, but we have two bodies to be a check upon each other. And then we establish a strong, one-man power, that is the veto, democratic as we are, to check these two assemblies; and that is the substitute for the action of the people where it is impossible for the action of the people to be had. Now, in that case, the responsibility is in each man, not alone under his oath, but with his obligations to his constituents; and, if he be a man, he feels it.

But, Sir, I do not think my friend for Manchester, who anticipated much that I should otherwise have said, carried the doctrine out. He showed, truly, that the responsibility of the agent is destroyed. Now we go to the responsibility of the principal, to the people. Well, I do not say that is destroyed, but it is weakened. For what is the proposition? The legislature will say: all we are asked to do, is to submit this project to the people; we merely give the party a hearing, therefore the responsibility is not here. The people will say, even under these circumstances, that the legislature have indorsed this proposition; they have thought it worthy to be recommended deliberately to us; they have looked at the details, and they alone could look at them thoroughly, and, therefore, there is the responsibility in adopting it. To sum up in one word, I agree with my friend for Manchester, and I think he would have agreed with me, had he gone one or two steps farther in his reasoning, for it is sustained in principle. There is another reason, which I have not heard urged by any one, and that is, that this security, as it stands, is fallacious. It is not said that the appeal is to be final. Suppose we take the question of the Hoosac Tunnel. And I beg leave to say, I am entirely uncommitted upon that question. I was applied to, to sign a remonstrance on one occasion, but I refused because I did not know enough about it. I am alike ignorant and impartial with regard to it, and I beg pardon for alluding to it. But is that appeal to be final? Suppose that the Western Railroad question had been put in 1836, and the people had been called to decide upon it. What would have been the consequence? Would the numerous and zealous friends of that road have rested there, if the question had been decided against them? No, Sir. They would have put the question again to the people, the next year. You may depend that where there is power enough to control the majority of the legislature, to induce them to give the credit of the State, there would be power enough to keep up an agitation among the people. If I was a popular orator, and I wanted to agitate the people, I would go to them every year, and continue to bring the subject before them, and by my importunity, and for many other reasons, I think the project would finally go. I think the project, with the aid of the talent of a popular man, would finally be carried, and when a vote has once been taken by the people, we go to the legislature with it. Would any such legislature, after such a vote in favor of it, resist it? Would they resist the voice of the people, after it had been pronounced deliberately? Would they consider it anything else than an instruction to them? But, suppose the legislature refuse to grant the credit of the State to any great project, and the refusal is sanctioned by the people collectively?

Gentlemen are mistaken if they suppose that the people would be freed from taxation by that. Single towns will come and ask for power to tax their people in their respective towns. The thing has been done, however objectionable it is, and it may be done again. And an attempt has been made to do it far oftener than it has been done. Now, if gentlemen are to tie up the hands of the legislature, they will, to be consistent, go one step farther and restrict cities and towns also, and not leave the city of Boston to be controlled in favor of any project which is not a wise one. Of course I refer to no project now existing.

Now, Sir, I beg leave to say, that if gentlemen think that a simple majority of the legislature ought not to be intrusted with power to loan the credit of the State, and that it is wise to impose some restriction upon them—if they feel alarmed at intrusting even their own chosen agents with unlimited power over the property of the State, I say that the proper restriction is of a different kind, and if such a restriction shall find favor with the Convention generally, I am not prepared to say that I shall oppose it. So far as I know, however, that has not yet been proposed; and what I would suggest, is to require something more than a simple majority vote in one legislature, or in one or two successive legislatures. That would remove all the responsibility from the people, and it would leave it resting in full force upon the shoulders of the legislature. The responsibility would no longer be, as I am afraid it would be if the proposition of my friend from Taunton prevails, thrown from the shoulders of the legislature upon the shoulders of the people. It would, in that case be suspended, as the lawyers say, in the clouds, and would be nowhere; but I say we ought to leave it in the legislature, and restrict them by requiring more than a majority vote.

Again, Sir, if we apply a sum as a maximum, either one million or any number of millions of dollars, that may do very well for a restriction; but I have some doubts about the propriety of the amendment of my friend and colleague, because I think, as was suggested by the gentleman for Manchester, that it throws all the burden upon the present generation. That operates as more of a restriction than we wish to impose; for, Sir, that the legislature will ever lay a direct tax to the amount of a million of dollars for any purpose, in any one year, is what I believe no man expects to see. I suppose the Convention is hardly prepared to make the restriction total, and to say that the legislature shall in no case loan the State credit; but that would be more consistent than this amendment.

I will now come back to the first amendment, for a moment; and I remark, further, that I think the security which is supposed to be afforded by that amendment will be fallacious, for two reasons. First, you leave the towns at liberty to tax their inhabitants to the last dollar, and if the friends of these projects are shut out from prosecuting them by the aid of the State treasury, they will go to the town treasuries; and it is our duty to protect the rights of the people from oppressive taxation; we ought to guard

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—BUTLER—HOPKINSON—GILES—HATHAWAY.

[July 9th.]

that point, I think, if this amendment should be adopted. But secondly, and I think this reason is of some considerable force, if you say that they must go to the people with their applications, you weaken the responsibility resting upon the legislature, for their decision will not be final, and they can go to the people year after year, and thus the community will be kept in a constant agitation upon these subjects.

I have one more objection, Mr. President. The gentleman for Wilbraham said that he thought it was a sound doctrine, that the legislature had not the right now to appeal to the towns or the people, to sanction the passage of laws generally. Well, Sir, I think that is a very sound doctrine; but it is hard to say, upon a general instrument like the Constitution—it is hard to say, after acts are done by the legislature—whether such acts can be so brought under the terms of that instrument that the judiciary cannot vote against them, or set them one side. I think, with the gentleman for Wilbraham, that is wrong in principle, but the opposite side has sometimes been taken by respectable authority. But if we sanction that course in the Constitution, I will suggest that we may insert a provision making that expressed, which the gentleman for Wilbraham thinks is now clearly implied.

If the provision before us is adopted, the legislature will resort to the people upon every occasion; and the first thing that the legislature will do, when a measure comes up which tries their sense of responsibility, and of which they doubt the popularity, will be to throw it off upon the people. I therefore think, that we ought to follow the Report of the Committee, and if we vary from it, that there should be a restriction of a different kind from any that has yet been proposed, and somewhat like those which I have suggested.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. Anxious that this matter should be brought to a close, and having heard two very able speeches for and against, a considerable time having been taken up on this amendment, and the whole matter having been fully discussed in Committee of the Whole, I feel it to be my duty, even at the risk of provoking a call for the yeas and nays, now to move the previous question.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I wish to make a single verbal modification to the amendment, if it is in order.

The PRESIDENT. It can be done by general consent.

Mr. MORTON. I simply wish to add the words "hereafter created" after the word "debt," so that the clause shall read as follows:—

The legislature shall not, hereafter, in any manner, create any debt or debts, which shall singly or in the aggregate with any preexisting debt hereafter created, exceed the sum of one million of dollars, except to repel invasion or suppress insurrection.

No objection being made, the amendment was modified accordingly.

Mr. HOPKINSON. I rise to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Lowell, whether he will not gain the object that he has in view, and yet take a course which will be more satisfactory to the Convention, by modifying his motion so that it shall be a motion that the question be now taken, or that it be taken at a specified time a few minutes hence. This would give gentlemen an opportunity, after the present amendment shall be rejected—provided it shall be rejected—to move other amendments without debate. I know that there are several other plans which gentlemen would like to propose and have them acted upon without discussion; but if the motion for the previous question should be sustained, no other amendment can be offered after the one now pending shall be disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER. In accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Boston, I will modify my motion so that the question be now taken after such amendments as may be proposed without debate.

Mr. GILES, of Boston. I should like to have about five or ten minutes to present my views upon this question; for I think it has not been presented in its true light.

Mr. BUTLER. I will then modify my motion so that the question be taken at ten minutes before one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STETSON called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. Morton, of Taunton; and they were ordered.

Mr. GILES. I will endeavor to keep myself within the limit that I have mentioned. I am in favor of some restriction upon the granting of the State credit; but I am not able to accede to the proposition of the gentleman from Taunton, as that now stands; and I will present my views in the shortest possible space to the Convention. I believe, Mr. President, that great public improvements are to be made. That is a fact; but in this country where there is a call for so many of these improvements, and where the supply of capital is limited, another proposition is equally the fact; and that is, that these improvements are to be made upon credit. The question then arises, upon whose credit—that of the State, that of the Union, that of your towns, that of your corporations, or that of your individual citizens? They are to be made—they are to be made upon credit; and they are to earn enough to pay for making them, to give those interested in them a profit, and at the same time to bless the whole community. Now let us take a short view of the history of internal improvements in this country. First they were favored by the government of the Union, but to an extent which many deemed an abuse, and those who had the influence put a stop to that. The States then took it up, and they carried their favor and patronage of these enterprises to an extent which was, in fact, an abuse, and the consequences we know. The result was what has been stated; clauses were introduced into the Constitutions of something like nineteen or twenty of the States, prohibiting, or limiting, the exercise of this power. What was the next step? Your cities, towns, and villages, which had a local interest in these enterprises, came to your legislatures and asked for liberty to tax themselves, and they got it. They have taxed themselves to such an extent, that in many of your towns and cities the citizens have moved away because they would not submit to such taxation. That was deemed an abuse. Then what shall we do? I accede to the proposition of the gentleman from Manchester, and that of my colleague who preceded me, that these cases are cases to be determined upon their own merits, which merits must be investigated by some body or tribunal competent to judge upon them; yet I do not accede entirely to the conclusions which they draw from that fact. If the State may enter into the business of patronizing these public enterprises in the same manner that individual capitalists would do, their conclusion would be just; but I hold that the State never should enter into such enterprises upon such grounds, even if it does know that the enterprise is safe, is of a public character, is demanded by the people, and is good in a business or financial sense. To authorize the State to tax the citizens, or to appropriate the money of the citizens which has already been raised, two things more are wanted, and of those two things, the State at large is as capable of judging as the legislature. Those two things are these: first, that the exigency is of an extraordinary character; and second, that the demand for capital is so great as to take it out of the means of private capitalists. Now, whether the exigency is of an extraordinary character in its public influence and importance, and is also extraordinary in the extent of means demanded, the people at large are as well able to judge as the legislature. But, Sir, I object to sending things back to the people, which the people have sent us here to decide. I do not like to see agents who are appointed to do any business, turn about to their principals and say: "the business is not done, but it is in a condition for you to do." I was happy, therefore, to hear my colleague indicate his approval of the proposition, that in all bills granting the credit of the State to corporations or to individuals, more than a majority vote should be required. I would require that as the cheapest, the most efficient, and the most just limit; for while I am in favor of the principle of the present amendment, I cannot consent to the form in which it now stands. The legislature should first examine each case, and be convinced that it is a good business transaction, and a sound public enterprise; they should also be convinced, to such a degree, at any rate, as to secure a two-thirds vote, that it is a public exigency of an extraordinary character—that it will demand more than ordinary means, and that it will operate beneficially in its consequences upon the whole State, to an extent that ought to satisfy every individual voter, and every man interested in the public prosperity, of the propriety of granting the public credit.

I would say, then, that the limit which I desire to see—and I most ardently desire it—to this granting of the public credit of the State, would be the requirement of a two-thirds or three-quarters vote of both branches of the legislature. If any project and its friends can obtain that number, it ought to gain the people, and if the people assent, they will receive the benefit of it, and they will see that the credit is redeemed. Credit, private or public, is based upon capital, upon intelligence, upon enterprise, and above all, upon character. We have all of those, except capital. That we have limited. Credit is the breath of life to enterprise, and this country is full of enterprise. I would not lay the hand of ice and death upon that trait of our national character in any form. I would sustain, but I would guide it, and I would limit it within the sound, second thought and judgment of every tribunal called upon to act upon questions of granting the credit of the people.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, the proposition of the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr.

Saturday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — HATHAWAY.

[July 9th.

Morton,) does not exactly suit me, and still I shall vote for it. The reason why it does not satisfy me is, that it does not go far enough. I would limit the power of the legislature without reference to the people. I would limit the power of the legislature entirely, as to granting the credit of the State to any individual, association or corporate enterprise. I would not by any means put the question to the people, whether they approve of it or not. The reason why I would do this is, because of the abuse of this power, in loaning the State credit, which has been seen and felt in other States.

Permit me to say in reply to the gentleman from Boston upon my left, (Mr. Stevenson,) that the reason why we want a Constitution is, to prevent the abuse of power by the legislature of the people, and the people themselves, of minorities and individuals. 'Those who have looked into the history of repudiation of State debts in this country, know something about the reasons why repudiation has taken place in various Western and South-western States. I know there has been a great abuse in the exercise of power, by the legislatures of various States in this Union, in reference not only to the loaning of State credit, but in authorizing, under color of law, the loaning of the credit of municipal corporations. I would go further than the gentleman from Taunton goes, and would not permit the citizens of a municipal corporation, as a corporation, to loan the credit of such corporation, whether it be a county or a town, for the encouragement of any enterprise or project of any private individual, or any corporation, where such corporation was other than the municipal corporation, that shall undertake to loan its credit. I would further, not even permit the legislature to grant to town or county, that power. And the reasons for it, Sir, I would give, if the time at which the debate, on this matter is to close, would permit—

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Sir, I will take another opportunity, if it shall present itself in the course of the session of the Convention, to present these reasons.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) the yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas, 104; nays, 137.

They are as follows:—

YEAS.

Abbott, Alfred A.
Abbott, Josiah G.
Allen, Parsons
Austin, George
Ayres, Samuel
Barrows, Joseph
Bartlett, Russel
Beach, Erasmus D.
Beal, John
Beebe, James M.
Bliss, Gad O.
Breed, Hiram N.
Brewster, Osmyn
Briggs, George N.
Bronson, Asa
Brown, Hiram C.
Brownell, Frederick
Buck, Asahel
Bumpus, Cephas C.
Chapin Daniel E.
Childs, Josiah
Churchill, J. McKean
Cogswell, Nathaniel
Cole, Lansing J.
Cole, Sumner
Copeland, Benjamin F.
Crane, George B.
Crowell, Seth
Crowninshield, F. B.
Davis, Solomon
Dean, Silas
Deming, Elijah S.
Denton, Augustus
Doane, James C.
Dunham, Bradish
Earle, John M.
Easland, Peter
Fitch, Ezekiel W.
Fowle, Samuel
Gardner, Henry J.
Gilbert, Wanton C.
Gooch, Daniel W.
Gooding, Leonard
Goulding, Dalton
Hallett, B. F.
Hammond, A. B.

Hapgood, Seth
Haskell, George
Hathaway, Elnathan P.
Heard, Charles
Hersey, Henry
Hobart, Aaron
Hobart, Henry
Hopkinson, Thomas
Hubbard, William J.
Jackson, Samuel
James, William
Jenkins, John
Johnson, John
Knight, Hiram
Knight, Jefferson
Lawton, Job G., Jr.
Leland, Alden
Lincoln, Abishai
Littlefield, Tristram
Mixer, Samuel
Morton, Elbridge G.
Morton, Marcus
Morton, Marcus, Jr.
Nayson, Jonathan
Newman, Charles
Nichols, William
Norton, Alfred
Oliver, Henry K.
Orcutt, Nathan
Orne, Benjamin S.
Parker, Adolphus G.
Parker, Joel
Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
Perkins, Noah C.
Rantoul, Robert
Richardson, Daniel
Sargent, John
Simmons, Perez
Simonds, John W.
Stevens, Granville
Stiles, Gideon
Stetson, Caleb
Talbot, Thomas
Taylor, Ralph
Tilton, Horatio W.
Turner, David P.
Tyler, William
Wales, Bradford L.
Wallis, Freeland
Walker, Samuel
Ward, Andrew H.
Weeks, Cyrus
Wilbur, Daniel
Wilbur, Joseph
Williams, Henry
Williams, J. B.
Wilson, Willard
Wlod, Otis

NAYS.

Adams, Benjamin P.
Adams, Shubael P.
Aldrich, P. Emory
Alley, John B.
Allis, Josiah
Alvord, D. W.
Aspinwall, William
Baker, Hillel
Ballard, Alvah
Ball, George S.
Bancroft, Alpheus
Barrett, Marcus
Bates, Eliakim A.
Bates, Moses, Jr.
Bennett, William, Jr.
Bigelow, Edward B.
Bird, Francis W.
Bishop, Henry W.
Boutwell, George S.
Booth, William S.
Boutwell, Sewell
Braman, Milton P.
Brimley, Francis
Brown, Hammond
Bryant, Patrick
Butler, Benjamin F.
Cady, Henry
Chandler, Amariah
Chapin, Henry
Clark, Ransom
Cleverly, William
Cook, Charles E.
Cooledge, Henry F.
Crittenden, Simeon
Cross, Joseph W.
Cummings, Joseph
Curtis, Wilbur
Cushman, Henry W.
Cutler, Simeon N.
Dana, Richard H., Jr.
Dawes, Henry L.
Day, Gilman
Dennison, Hiram S.
Duncan, Samuel
Durgin, John M.
Eames, Philip
Eaton, Calvin D.
Eaton, Lilley
Edwards, Elisha
Edwards, Samuel
Ely, Joseph M.
Fay, Sullivan
Fisk, Lyman
Foster, Aaron
Foster, Abram
Freeman, James M.
French, Samuel
Gale, Luther
Gates, Elbridge
Giles, Charles G.
Giles, Joel
Goulding, Jason
Graves, John W.
Gray, John C.
Green, Jabez
Greene, William B.
Griswold, Josiah W.
Griswold, Whiting
Hapgood, Lyman W.
Harmon, Phineas
Hawkes, Stephen E.
Hayden, Isaac
Heath, Ezra, 2d
Hinsdale, William
Hobbs, Edwin
Holder, Nathaniel
Hood, George
Hoyt, Henry K.
Jacobs, John
Kellogg, Giles C.
Kendall, Isaac
Kingman, Joseph
Knight, Joseph
Knowlton, William H.
Ladd, John S.
Langdon, Wilber C.
Lawrence, Luther
Loomis, E. Justin
Marvin, Abijah P.
Mason, Charles
Merritt, Simeon
Monroe, James L.
Moore, James M.
Nash, Hiram
Nute, Andrew T.
Ober, Joseph E.
Osgood, Charles
Packer, E. Wing
Paine, Benjamin
Paine, Henry
Park, John G.
Parris, Jonathan
Parsons, Samuel C.
PHELPS, Charles
Pierce, Henry
Pomroy, Jeremiah
Pool, James M.
Reed, Sampson
Richardson, Nathan
Richardson, Samuel H.

Ring, Elkanah, Jr.
Rockwood, Joseph M.
Sanderson, Amasa
Sanderson, Chester
Sherril, John
Schouler, William
Sikes, Chester
Sleeper, John S.
Souther, John
Spooner, Samuel W.
Stevens, William
Stevenson, J. Thomas
Sumner, Increase
Thomas, John W.

Thompson, Charles
Train, Charles R.
Underwood, Orison
Viles, Joel
Wheeler, William F.
White, Benjamin
White, George
Whitney, Daniel S.
Whitney, James S.
Wilder, Joel
Wilkins, John H.
Wilson, Henry
Winn, Jonathan B.

ABSENT.

Allen, Charles
Allen, James B.
Allen, Joel C.
Appleton, William
Andrews, Robert
Atwood, David C.
Banks, Nathaniel P., Jr.
Bartlett, Sidney
Bell, Luther V.
Bennett, Zephaniah
Bigelow, Jacob
Blagden, George W.
Bliss, William C.
Bradbury, Ebenezer
Bradford, William J. A.
Brown, Adolphus F.
Brown, Alpheus R.
Brown, Artemas
Brownell, Joseph
Bullen, Amos H.
Bullock, Rufus
Burlingame, Anson
Carter, Timothy W.
Caruthers, William
Case, Isaac
Chapin, Chester W.
Choate, Rufus
Clarke, Alpheus B.
Clark, Henry
Clarke, Stillman
Clark, Salah
Coggin, Jacob
Conkey, Ithamar
Cressy, Oliver S.
Crockett, George W.
Crosby, Leander
Cushman, Thomas
Davis, Charles G.
Davis, Ebenezer
Davis, Isaac
Davis, John
Davis, Robert T.
Dehon, William
DeWitt, Alexander
Dorman, Moses
Easton, James, 2d
Ely, Homer
Eustis, William T.
Farwell, A. G.
Fellows, James K.
Fiske, Emery
Fowler, Samuel P.
French, Charles A.
French, Charles H.
French, Rodney
Frothingham, R'd, Jr.
Gardner, Johnson
Gilbert, Washington
Gould, Robert
Gourgass, F. R.
Greenleaf, Simon
Hadley, Samuel P.
Hale, Artemas
Hale, Nathan
Hall, Charles B.
Haskins, William
Hayward, George
Henry, Samuel
Hewes, James
Hewes, William H.
Heywood, Levi
Hillard, George S.
Hooper, Foster
Houghton, Samuel
Howard, Martin
Howland, Abraham H.
Hunt, Charles E.
Hunt, William
Huntington, Asahel
Huntington, Charles P.
Huntington, George H.
Hurlburt, Samuel A.
Hurlbut, Moses C.
Hyde, Benjamin D.
Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
Jenks, Samuel H.
Kellogg, Martin R.
Keyes, Edward L.
Kinsman, Henry W.
Kimball, Joseph
Knowlton, Charles L.
Knowlton, J. S. C.
Knox, Albert
Kuhn, George H.
Ladd, Gardner P.
Lincoln, Fred. W., Jr.
Little, Otis
Livermore, Isaac
Lord, Otis P.
Lothrop, Samuel K.
Loud, Samuel P.
Lowell, John A.
Marble, William P.
Marcy, Laban
Marvin, Theophilus R.
Meader, Reuben
Miller, Seth, Jr.
Morey, George
Morss, Joseph B.
Morton, William S.
Noyes, Daniel
Paige, James W.
Parker, Samuel D.
Partridge, John
Parsons, Thomas A.
Payson, Thomas E.
Peabody, George
Peabody, Nathaniel
Penniman, John
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Jesse
Perkins, Jonathan C.
Phinney, Sylvanus B.
Plunkett, William C.
Powers, Peter
Preston, Jonathan
Prince, F. O.
Putnam, George
Putnam, John A.
Rawson, Silas
Read, James
Rice, David
Richards, Luther
Rockwell, Julius
Rogers, John
Ross, David S.
Royce, James C.
Sampson, George R.
Sheldon, Luther
Sherman, Charles

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — THOMPSON — HALLETT — WILSON — MORTON.

[July 11th.]

Smith, Matthew
Sprague, Melzar
Stacy, Eben H.
Stevens, Charles G.
Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Storrow, Charles S.
Strong, Alfred L.
Stutson, William
Sumner, Charles
Swain, Alanson
Taber, Isaac C.
Taft, Arnold
Thayer, Joseph
Thayer, Willard, 2d
Tileston, Edmund P.
Tilton, Abraham
Tower, Ephraim
Turner, David
Tyler, John S.

Upham, Charles W.
Upton, George B.
Vinton, George A.
Walcott, Samuel B.
Wallace, Frederick T.
Walker, Amasa
Warner, Marshal
Warner, Samuel, Jr.
Waters, Asa H.
Weston, Gershom B.
Wetmore, Thomas
Wilkinson, Ezra
Wilson, Milo
Winslow, Levi M.
Wood, Charles C.
Wood, Nathaniel
Woods, Josiah B.
Wood, William H.
Wright, Ezekiel

Absent and not voting, 178.

So the amendment did not prevail.

Mr. GILES, of Boston, moved to amend so as to provide that no loan shall be granted, without a two-thirds vote of each branch of the legislature.

The amendment was adopted—ayes, 114; noes, 76.

The resolves, as amended, were then ordered to a second reading. And, on motion, the Convention adjourned until Monday morning, at ten o'clock.

MONDAY, July 11, 1853.

The Convention assembled, pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at ten o'clock.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. COGSWELL.

The Journal of Saturday was read.

Reconsideration.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolves on the subject of loaning the credit of the State were ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston, inquired of the Chair whether these resolves would not be susceptible of amendment when they came up upon their second reading.

The PRESIDENT replied that such would be the case.

Mr. GRAY said, that being the case, he could see no necessity for reconsidering the vote by which they were ordered to a second reading. He had no intention, however, to oppose the gentleman's motion.

Mr. THOMPSON said he would prefer to have the question come up upon the motion to reconsider, as that would open the whole subject and gentlemen would have an opportunity to express their views; and if the motion prevailed, there would be an opportunity to amend at that stage of the proceeding when amendments were more usually made.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal, and will come up to-morrow for consideration.

Resolution.

Mr. HALLETT submitted the following resolution, which was read, and, on his motion, referred to a select committee of five, to be appointed by the Chair:—

Resolved, That the Constitution ought to provide, in addition to the remedies now recognized therein for all injuries to person and property, that a remedy shall be given to the legal representatives of any deceased person whose death was caused by the negligence or misconduct of a railroad corporation, in the same manner as for like injuries resulting in disability and not in death.

Orders of the Day.

On motion by Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day, the first item on which was the motion of the gentleman from Quincy, (Mr. White,) to reconsider the vote by which the resolves on the subject of the House of Representatives were finally passed.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, said motion was laid upon the table.

The next item on the Orders of the Day was the resolve on the subject of general laws for corporations.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. At the request of a gentleman who is now absent and who expects to be here to-morrow, I will move that this resolution, relating to general laws for corporations, be passed over until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The next item, being the resolve to amend section 2, chapter 5, of the Constitution, by striking out the words "University of Cambridge," on its second reading, was taken up.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, suggested that it would be better to pass this by until the subject of the University of Cambridge, concerning which a proposition was pending, or under consideration by a committee, had been acted upon.

The resolve was passed by with unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, moved that the remaining item on the Orders of the Day, viz.: the resolve on the subject of loaning the State credit, be laid upon the table, with the view of going into Committee of the Whole on the resolves on the subject of the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

The Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, the Convention then resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Hallett, for Wilbraham, in the chair, and proceeded to consider the resolves on the subject of the Judiciary. They were read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by substituting for the second article of the third chapter, the following:—

The governor and the two branches of the legislature, respectively, shall not hereafter be authorized to propose questions to justices of the supreme judicial court, and require their opinions thereon.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by substituting for the last two clauses of the thirteenth article of the first section of the second chapter, the following:—

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a supreme judicial court, and such other courts as the legislature may from time to time establish.

The justices of the supreme judicial court shall receive honorable salaries, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the third chapter of the Constitution by substituting for the fifth article in said chapter, the following:—

The legislature shall have power to make laws regulating marriage, divorce, and alimony, but shall in no case decree a divorce, or hear and determine any causes touching the validity of the marriage contract.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make any further amendment in the first, second, and fifth articles of the third chapter of the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved to amend the last resolution, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert the following:—

That it is proper and expedient so to amend the Constitution as to provide that the justices of the supreme judicial court shall be appointed for the term of ten years, and the justices of such inferior courts as are or may be established by law, for the term of seven years; said justices to be eligible to reappointment, but in no case to continue in office after attaining seventy years of age.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I do not rise to detain the Committee with a lengthy speech, but to suggest a mode of proceeding, which I hope will meet with the approbation of the whole Committee. The Report of the Judiciary Committee presents three distinct propositions, upon separate and distinct subjects. I hope they are propositions which will at once command the support of the whole Committee. I wish now merely to suggest whether it would not now be expedient to take up and dispose of those different resolves by themselves, and leave the other one, in reference to the tenure of the office of the judges, which is the more important one, and about which, probably, there will be not only a greater diversity of opinion, but much more discussion, to be acted upon afterwards. I hope, therefore, that we shall take up the resolves in their order, and dispose of them in some way or other, and then have the distinct proposition in reference to the tenure of office of the several judges brought up by itself. If this suggestion meets the approbation of the Committee of the Whole, I should be pleased to explain, in a very few words, the reasons upon which the Committee founded their first three resolves, and leave the other subject open for discussion hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that that can only be done by unanimous consent, or by the withdrawal, by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) of his amendment. As it stands, the question being upon the adoption of the Report of the Committee, the amendment is strictly first in order.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I would suggest whether my friend from Taunton, or any other gentleman, could not call for a division of the question which is before the Committee? If it were a single question I should not doubt that the decision of the Chair is correct, and which, as a general decision, I do not object to at all.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I am inclined to think that the view of the Chair is the only correct one. But it is proper, if the Committee choose to pursue that course, to receive all the amendments which may be offered, and then consider them as they may come up in connection with the several resolves to which they are offered. I hope, from the distinct nature of these several resolves, and the facility with which they can be disposed of, that there will be a general consent to consider them separately.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I suggest that it would be as well to take up and consider each

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—MORTON—FRENCH—WARNER.

[July 11th.

one separately, and when we reach the last resolve, the amendment which I have offered can be taken up in that connection. By the general practice in this body, that course has been pursued, and I hope we shall do so now.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent, and if there is no objection to that order of proceeding, the Chair will consider that course to be in order, and the Committee will proceed with the consideration of the several resolves as they stand, and defer the consideration of the amendment of the gentleman from Natick until they reach the last resolve.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I suppose it will be expected of me that I should make some explanation of the reasons which induced the Committee to report these resolves. From the nature of the resolutions, I think very little explanation will be required. However, with the permission of the Chair and of the Committee, I will proceed very briefly to explain those reasons as far as the first resolve is concerned.

It will be recollected that the present Constitution provides that the legislature or the executive may call upon the supreme court for their opinion on questions of law, or matters of great importance and interest. This provision the Committee thought ought to be expunged from the Constitution, and the substitute just read, placed in its stead—that is, that the power should be taken from the legislature and from the executive of calling upon the supreme court for their opinion in the cases referred to.

There were several reasons which induced the Committee to come to that conclusion. In the first place, you provide that the several departments of government—the executive, judicial and legislative—shall be kept entirely distinct, and that the officers belonging to one department shall never exercise the powers belonging to the others. This is deemed an important provision, and it is one which is contained not only in the Constitution of this State, but in those of several other States of this Union, and in the Constitution of the United States. Wherever free governments exist, it is deemed important that these several departments should be kept entirely separate and independent of each other. The object of the introduction of this provision is to carry out that principle. The provision of the Constitution as it now stands, is inconsistent with the other clause of the Constitution, because it authorizes one branch to call upon another for their opinion in relation to matters which come before the first branch, and therefore we thought that there should be a change made in that respect, so that there should be no interference whatever between one branch of the government and the others.

Another reason which operated strongly upon the minds of the Committee, was that the courts of the Commonwealth, and above all the highest court, ought never to be made liable to be drawn into the vortex of politics, and that it should be so removed from all political transactions, that the whole community might be satisfied, that in appealing to them, they were appealing to a tribunal so constituted, as to be as far removed from such influences, as it is possible to remove them, in the nature of things. The judiciary is now exposed to be drawn into the discussion of great and important interests which excite the community. The experience of our legislature shows, that upon many occasions the opinion of the court has been asked upon subjects greatly exciting either to a section, or to the whole, of the Commonwealth. The importance of avoiding such a discussion on the part of the court, presented itself as one worthy of the consideration of this Convention.

Again, there was another consideration, which is the last one I shall mention in relation to this resolve. The court is liable to be called upon to decide questions of law, without there being a full and proper hearing of both sides of them,—to decide questions of law, affecting private rights, without the parties who may be affected by them, having an opportunity of being heard in relation to those rights. Any one who has had as much experience as I have had upon the subject, can fully appreciate the importance of having all questions, which the court are called upon to decide, discussed by individuals having diverse interests to be affected by the decision. Therefore, it seemed to the Committee highly inexpedient that the court should be placed in such a situation; for the reason, that their decision might deeply affect the rights of individuals, without their having an opportunity to be heard.

One word more, and I will relieve the attention of the Committee. It is important, as we all agree, that every person in the community should have the right of a fair and impartial trial, and it is important to the peace and happiness of the community that every one should be satisfied, whether the case be decided for or against him, that he has had a fair and perfect trial, as far as it is possible for him to have. In this view of the case, I hope the resolve will recommend itself to the favor of the Committee, and that it will be adopted.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. This Report of the Committee has reference to the second section of the third chapter of the Constitution of Massachusetts, which is as follows:—

“Each branch of the legislature, as well as the governor and council, shall have authority to require the opinions of the justices of the supreme judicial court, upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions.”

I have had occasion to know that in one case, at least, this provision has been beneficial to the whole State. There was a time when the standard of the qualification of voters was different in almost every town in the State, and it arose out of the different constructions, which different parts of the State put upon a constitutional provision, and it seems to me that there should be some mode provided, by which the selectmen should be able to ascertain what the Constitution requires, so that they might know how to perform their duties. Now the different boards of selectmen have disagreed, and if doctors disagree who is to decide? One board followed one counsel, and another board followed another; and there was no uniformity of opinion or action throughout the State; and the board of selectmen were liable to be prosecuted for mal-administration, when they were discharging their duties according to the best light which they could obtain. What could be done? Here was this provision of the Constitution, and the application of it, according to the understanding of the different boards of selectmen. The decision of the judges of the supreme court was taken upon the question, and uniformity of action followed. Now I put it to the Committee, if that was not a case in which this provision was not beneficial. Why shall we strike it out of the Constitution? It certainly cannot do any injury by remaining in the Constitution. I believe other cases have occurred where recourse has been had to the opinion of the judges of the supreme court, besides the one which I have specified. That was a case in which it was important that there should be an uniformity of action throughout the State. The boards of selectmen, could not, from all the counsel they could get, hit upon a plan of action in which they felt themselves safe. One board adopted one plan, and another board another; but when the opinion of the supreme court was taken, they had a rule by which they could safely be governed, and there has been no diversity of opinion or action since, upon that question. Why then should this article be expunged? It certainly has been beneficial, and it has never worked any harm, as far as I, or anybody else, know. Cases may arise where the people may be placed in the same embarrassing position they were then in.

I hope this Report of the Committee will not be adopted. I think it is for the interests of the whole State that this provision should be retained.

Mr. WARNER, of Wrentham. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the pending resolve.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WARNER. Then I move to strike out from the Report of the Committee, the whole of the first resolve.

I do not design to say more than a single word in explanation of the motion, or rather with the view of assigning the reasons why I make it.

I quite agree with the gentleman from Berkley, (Mr. French,) that the supreme court of the State can render no better service to the Commonwealth than in answering such questions as may be propounded to them by the legislature. The questions which that court have already answered, which have been thus propounded, have been of great service, in my judgment, to the selectmen in the county of Essex, as well as of much service in various other respects. Fully believing this, I have moved that the clause as it is in the present Constitution, shall be retained, and I hope that it will be retained.

Mr. MORTON, Jr., of Andover. I rise to ask whether this motion is in order. The question before the Committee is on the acceptance of the Report from the Committee to which this subject was referred. The motion at present, is merely to strike out; and I would suggest that if the question is taken on the adoption or rejection of the Report, that would be the most proper course. If it is rejected, then the motion to strike out is wholly unnecessary. It would certainly be in order to perfect the proposition by any amendment, before the motion to strike out can be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman is in the nature of an amendment to the resolution, and is therefore in order.

Mr. MORTON. A motion to strike out and insert would be in order; but I do not understand the gentleman from Wrentham as proposing to substitute anything in the place of that which he proposes to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out is in order.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. It does not ap-

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — HOOPER — LORD — GRAY — EARLE — FROTHINGHAM.

[July 11th.]

pear to me as making any difference at all, because the question before was on the adoption of the resolution. If the motion to strike out be adopted, it would only be equivalent to a rejection, and if it is rejected, why of course, it is stricken out.

Mr. WARNER. I do not see, on second consideration, that any material object will be gained by my motion. If it is rejected, it will, of course, be equivalent to the adoption of a motion to strike it out. I therefore withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I do not see the necessity of this resolution, provided the last resolution as reported by the Committee should be adopted. I understand that the second article of chapter third, of the present Constitution confers this power positively, without which the supreme court would have no right to report any such decisions. This article expressly gives them the power. If, therefore, this last resolve should be adopted, what necessity would there be for introducing the article. It has merely a negative effect, in saying that this power shall not be exercised; and for this I conceive that there is no necessity when there is no authority given for its exercise.

In regard to the second article, I am in favor of abolishing it. In common with the gentleman from Berkley, I am inclined to think that these decisions have not unfrequently relieved municipal officers from positions of embarrassment; and they have now the power of settling all these questions without the necessity of parties having recourse to protracted and expensive litigation. I have heard of no injury resulting from the exercise of this power, and therefore hope that it may be retained.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in making this Report, the Committee to which this matter was referred were unanimous in regard to its propriety. I did not hear all the remarks of the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) this morning; and it is possible that he may have given all the reasons which influenced the Committee in recommending its adoption. There was one reason, however, which operated very strongly on my mind, and I believe it operated with equal force upon the minds of the Committee, and which I did not hear that gentleman refer to. That reason was this: that the retention of this provision in the Constitution permits the legislative or executive department of the government to put, in many important instances, the whole responsibility of their action upon the judicial department, while a fundamental provision of the Constitution is, that these several departments shall be independent of each other, and that neither of them shall undertake to exercise the powers of the other. But, Sir, as the thing is now, it seems to me to be liable, also, to this further objection—that it is very little different from permitting the judiciary to control the legislative and executive powers. We have now a law-officer, an attorney-general, and I hope from the experience we have had of the advantage of such an officer, the Commonwealth will sustain the office. That officer is the proper person to whom application should be made in all cases of doubt or uncertainty. The attorney-general—although it was contended for a long time that we could get along without such an officer—is the proper officer to give opinions upon doubtful questions of law. If it is important for the governor in many cases to have the opinion of the supreme court to regulate his action, the same importance equally attaches to many other important offices. Take the office of sheriff, for example. We all know that sheriffs have urgent and difficult duties to perform, involving great liability and responsibility. They must very often act to the peril of themselves and their sureties upon their bonds; and they cannot take the opinion of the supreme court so as to protect themselves. And so I might enumerate other officers to whom it is important that there should be some protection; and if the legislature and the executive may have an ex parte hearing before the supreme court, why not administrative officers.

The article in the Constitution as it now stands, it seems to me, infringes upon another principle, which I regret, as peculiarly important, and that is, that every department of a government; and every officer of a government, should act upon his or their own responsibility.

I did not anticipate that this subject was coming up this morning, and am not so fully prepared to meet it as I would wish; but the reasons I have given had weight upon my mind, and perhaps I would not have repeated them had I supposed that the chairman of the Committee, to whose mind also I know they appeared in a strong light, had stated them here. I regret that the subject should have come up at this time, because it appears to me, that there are very few of the members of the Committee here which made this Report.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. If it had not been for what my friend from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) has just observed, that the greater part of the Committee to which this subject was referred are absent, I would have felt some delicacy in standing up to defend their Report; one in which I understand they concurred unanimously. I had hoped that under these circumstances, the Report would be unanimously concurred in.

The gentleman from Salem has anticipated one important branch of the argument—that which proposes to have an attorney-general, and to make him elective by the whole people, and which, I suppose, is very likely to be the result of the doings of this Convention. I merely mention this to show that we may have such an office; that it was an important office; and that as such, we might presume it would be filled by a competent man. Such an officer is the proper adviser of the governor and his council, or of the legislature, in all cases of doubt or contest. I know that it has been convenient to have recourse to the supreme court; but that was partly because there was no other source to which to go. But the objections which we have heard here appear to me to be very grave objections, and I have no doubt that they had their weight with the Committee. In the first place, I think it is by no means proper to take the opinion of the judges of the supreme court on questions which have not been argued before them. If we provide for taking their opinion, I think we ought also to provide that such opinion shall only be taken after argument before them by counsel learned in the law. I recollect the first instance in my day—a very important instance too—in which the opinion of the judges of the supreme court was taken. The question and the times were both exciting. It was a question as to granting the militia in compliance with the wish of the general government. It was a question of great difficulty, and the court was requested to answer it, and they put the militia in opposition to the general government. I am not now going into that question. I am not going to say which party was right or which was wrong; but this I do say, that, having read and heard the arguments on that question more than once on both sides, if those judges had heard the question argued by able counsel, they might or might not have come to the same decision; but I cannot but think they would have given many different reasons for their decision. Whether that decision was correct or not, it placed the State and the government in a very delicate position towards each other. This was an actual case.

Now I will refer to a supposed case. Suppose that the governor of the Commonwealth, and the legislature, at their last session, had seen fit to repeal the act authorizing the calling of this Convention, would any friend to the judiciary have felt it proper to call for an opinion of the supreme court as to the constitutionality of such a law? I think, therefore, and, as a friend to the judiciary, I will say it, that they should not be called upon to decide—I will not say on ex parte statements but—without argument on important and exciting questions, these being the questions of all others, most likely to be pressed upon them for their opinion.

And, Sir, there is this other objection. No man can tell, when a question is proposed, how far the decision may affect private rights; and nothing is more likely than that the judges should give an opinion when required by either of the other branches of the government, that they may give such an opinion as they may be called upon to revise in their judicial capacity on a question of private rights. That appears to me to be a clear case. With all the questions of right on the one hand, there is nothing on the other but that of having a legal functionary to whom the executive and legislative branches of the government may have recourse. I think, when we have our attorney-general, we have such a functionary; and for these reasons and many others that strike one, I think we had better let the Report stand as it is.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I concur entirely in the object intended to be effected by this resolution; but I think it may be better accomplished by simply striking out the existing provision of the Constitution; and that it is not necessary to substitute what is here proposed. I therefore propose to amend the resolve by striking out the words "substituting for" in the second line, and inserting instead the words "striking out;" and also to strike out the words "the following," and the whole of the second section of the resolve; so that when thus amended, it will read:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by striking out the second article of the third chapter.

That leaves the proposition simply one to strike out, without inserting what it is proposed to insert, taking away the authority without saying anything about whether you shall exercise it or not.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I was about to make the motion which has just

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — SUMNER — BRIGGS.

[July 11th.

been made by the gentleman from Worcester, for I am in favor of the object designed by the Report, and it struck me that that was the simplest way to accomplish it.

Mr. SUMNER, for Otis. I do not think that striking out the proposition immediately before us is of much consequence in any respect. The object aimed at by the resolution, as I conceive it, is to present to the Convention a distinct proposition; and the form in which that proposition is presented, is perhaps not of a great deal of consequence, because, as has been suggested, there will be a revision of all our amendments, and of phraseology. When that revision takes place, the proper words and phrases will be supplied for the purpose of embodying all the different provisions of the Constitution in a proper form. I do not conceive, therefore, that it is of any great consequence, whether the proposition to amend prevails or not.

I wish to say, neither anything to favor it nor to oppose it, but I have a single word to offer in relation to the proposition itself. I hope it will prevail. I did not suppose that upon this question there was any great diversity of sentiment in this Convention; for, although it may have been, as I have no doubt it was at the time of the formation of our Constitution, in 1780, an exceedingly proper, and, if you please, important provision, and one that should have been incorporated into that Constitution,—although it may have been important and necessary that the different branches of the government should call upon the judges of the supreme court for authority upon important matters—in the language of the Constitution: “upon solemn occasions,”—yet I had supposed that at this period of time, after seventy years had elapsed, that that necessity, or that expediency had, to a very great extent, passed away; because, in relation to the foundation, and the entire edifice, so to speak, of our government, our governmental policy, in the variety of questions which are connected with it, have, to a very great extent, been perfected within that time, so that no necessity, no “solemn occasion,” in the language of the Constitution, can hardly be conceived of which would render it imperatively necessary to call upon the judges of the supreme court for their ex parte—for after all it must be an ex parte opinion—upon any subject that may arise. Their opinion must be given without argument, without any presentation of a case to them, and without the discussion which is always necessary in settling an important case upon a “solemn occasion.” That there is now any necessity for any such provision in the Constitution, I greatly doubt. And I repeat that I had supposed this opinion had, to a very great extent, obtained throughout the Commonwealth. Indeed, I happen to know, that in a great many instances, not the most solemn that could occur, subjects have come up in the different branches of the government, and propositions have gone out for the opinion of the supreme court, which could not, in any sense, be said to be important or solemn in their character, and which did not at all, in my judgment, come under the spirit of the provision in the Constitution. The legislature themselves have said that it was not proper as a general thing to go to the judiciary for opinions upon these subjects. I do hold that it is preeminently true, as has been suggested by other gentlemen who have preceded me, that it is a direct violation of that clause of the Bill of Rights, which provides that the different branches of the government shall be kept distinct from each other.

Now, under the provisions of the Constitution, as it now stands, it is competent for either of the different branches of the legislature, or for the governor and council, to go to the judiciary with any question which may occur to them as one desirable to be settled. If they deem it expedient they may go to them with questions which may be intermixed with political matters; intermixed, it may be, with some exciting topic which is creating a fever in the country. I believe the history of our government in regard to this subject, will show that some propositions of this kind have been made if they have not finally been submitted to the judiciary. To prevent such an occurrence in the future I would go for an amendment to the Constitution like that now proposed.

It has been stated that the Committee who have had in charge the subject of the judiciary, of which I happen to be one, were entirely unanimous in that opinion upon this subject, and it seems to me that when the subject is properly and candidly viewed in all its aspects, that there will be as great unanimity in the Convention in favor of sustaining the Report of the Committee as there was in the Committee in presenting it.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I do not think I can add anything to the reasons which have been presented by the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this Report. I rise merely to express my concurrence in the conclusions to which they have come, and in the reasons which have been offered upon this subject. I have no doubt that there are cases, or have been cases, where the opinion of the supreme court has been asked where it was for the interest of the public that their opinion should be known, and upon the other hand, I believe their opinion has been asked upon many cases where the public interest did not require it. But upon principle, I think this clause in the existing Constitution ought to be stricken out. Indeed, I do not very well see how that provision consists with the last article of the Bill of Rights, which declares that to the end that this may be a government of laws and not of men, the judicial department shall never exercise the legislative powers, nor the legislative ever exercise the judicial powers. Yet, in the face of that declaration, here is another provision which authorizes either of the other departments of the government, that is, the governor and his council, or the legislature, to call upon the judiciary, upon any occasion, for their opinion.

Now Sir, in the first place, no doubt, cases have occurred where these departments of the government might be influenced by a double motive. One is to simply get a judicial opinion upon an important question, and the other is to throw off the responsibility, which naturally and properly devolves upon them, which should rest upon their own shoulders, upon the shoulders of another department of government.

Sir, the judiciary is the weakest branch of the government, and the most defenceless. The judges can have no will, no action, but can merely exercise judgment and pronounce opinions. For this reason, it seems to me, that it places it in the power of one of your departments of government to require another to perform duties and assume responsibilities, which should rest upon their own shoulders. On the other hand, it imposes upon the judiciary a burden which I think belongs not to them, but to another branch of the government. My friend from Boston has alluded to one important case, to show the evil of this state of things. I was never able to see how that case was properly submitted to the supreme court at all. I understand that the duty of calling out the militia, at that time, devolved upon the governor, and the governor, alone, has no right to ask the opinion of the supreme court. The executive, at that time, was a distinguished man—a man whose reputation will always stand; but, upon this occasion, he brought the question before his council, and he and his council called upon the supreme court for an opinion. They placed the whole responsibility of the proceeding upon that tribunal; and they were obliged to assume it, and give their opinion, because it is not a matter of discretion upon their part. Either branch has the power of calling upon them, at any time, and they are bound to give their opinion. That tribunal, on that occasion, were compelled to give a decision upon a question of great national and State importance. They did give a decision, but it was one which, as my friend remarked, was afterwards overruled by the supreme court of the United States, and probably by the unanimous opinion of the present generation. I never would involve the supreme court of Massachusetts in such a difficulty again. I would say, to each department of the government, as these questions come up, you must take the responsibility upon yourselves. You must judge for yourselves, in all matters which properly come before you, and not throw the responsibility for your action upon the supreme court of Massachusetts.

Now, one word with regard to the amendment. I like the proposition, as it comes from the Committee, better than I do that of my friend from Worcester, (Mr. Earle). I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment now pending. It has been remarked, that it is not a matter of any great consequence, and perhaps it is not, but suppose the amendment prevails, and the provision in the present Constitution, giving the governor, or any department of the government, power to call upon the supreme court for an opinion, is stricken out? Why, Sir, the legislature, upon some solemn occasions, may take it upon themselves to call upon the supreme court for an opinion, and there is nothing to forbid them. I submit, that if the matter is thus left, without making any provision upon the subject, it may give rise to a great deal of embarrassment between the legislature and the judiciary. I much prefer to say, in express terms, that those departments of the government shall not have the power to call upon the supreme court for an opinion. There can be no misunderstanding such a provision. I like that form of resolution, and I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

Now, let me advert to one or two other reasons. These questions often involve considerations of the highest possible moment to individual citizens of our Commonwealth, yet they must be decided, as my friend remarks, by the supreme court, ex parte—without argument, without the benefit of discussion.

I remember, during the last session of the legislature, there was a movement made to submit the question to the supreme court, with regard to

Monday.]

THE JUDICIARY. — DAVIS — EARLE — BUTLER.

[July 11th.]

the constitutionality of what is called the "Maine Law." Now, I ask gentlemen to look at the difficulties which must have arisen, if the legislature had submitted that law for the decision of the court, as to its constitutionality. It could not be argued before them, yet there were, at that time, many cases of indictments against individuals, pending all over the Commonwealth, under that law, which would have to be tried, ultimately, by that court. Well, Sir, suppose the court had given a decision in favor of the constitutionality of the law. The judges go upon their several circuits in the different portions of the Commonwealth, and decide suits brought against individuals, resting upon the constitutionality of the law. What will these courts say? Will they say they have settled this question? Where have they settled it? Why, in their chamber in Boston. The general court have asked for their opinion, and they have given it. They have given that opinion, without a hearing and without argument, it is true, but they have given it, and they cannot hear you. They must either say, they have given an opinion to posterity which they cannot change, or else they must say, that, inasmuch as that opinion was given without a hearing, without argument, they do not feel themselves bound by it, but will hear the cases of the people as they are presented. If they took this latter course, it would not be very unlikely—if the judges were what they ought to be, and such judges as we have now—that, upon a solemn argument, upon discussion, views might be presented to them which would change their opinions, and they would give their decisions in accordance with that change. And what is the result? Why, it is, that, in their chamber in Boston, upon the request of the legislature, they pronounced an opinion one way, and when they went into the courts, and came to hear arguments upon the subject, they changed their opinion, and pronounced an opinion directly the reverse.

Now, Sir, I would not expose this tribunal to any such inconsistency as this. I think, therefore, that for many and weighty considerations, the Report of the Committee ought to be sustained. I am very glad they have brought in this Report, and I am glad they were unanimous in presenting it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution, but rather for the purpose of offering an amendment. I agree with the Committee, perfectly, in the object they seek to attain, but I would rather adhere to the provision in the present Constitution, substituting the attorney-general for the supreme court. I propose, therefore, in the third line, to strike out all after the word "following" and to insert the following:—

Each branch of the legislature, as well as the governor and council, shall have authority to require the opinion of the attorney-general upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions.

As we have already provided in the Constitution, for continuing the office of attorney-general, it seems to be very proper that he should be made an authority for reference, instead of the supreme court. I therefore propose to leave the article just as it now stands, substituting the attorney-general for the supreme court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion, that the amendment of the gentleman is not now in order, because it relates to matter different from that now under consideration. The gentleman might attain his object, by allowing the question to be taken upon the motion to strike out, and then his amendment would be in order.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I should like very well to know, in what position the Convention stands, in relation to amendments which are offered to these resolves? A few days since, it was stated—and the statement seemed to receive the unanimous assent of the Convention—that all these resolves must be put in precisely the form in which they are to go into the Constitution; that the Committee, whose business it shall be to put together the several amendments which may be proposed by the Convention, must incorporate them into the Constitution in precisely the form in which they were adopted by the Convention. I say that seemed to receive the consent of the Convention, but a few days afterwards I made a motion to amend by striking out a great deal of superfluity which had been retained in consequence of other amendments which had been adopted, and I was met by the remark that there was no occasion for such amendment, because, when it went to the Committee to put it in form, they would alter it and shape it as they pleased, and upon that suggestion the amendment was voted down.

I wish that the Convention would adopt either one rule or the other, and have a distinct understanding as to the course to be taken in this matter. Here is a distinct proposition to strike out and insert something else. My object is simply to strike out, and it appears to me that what is here proposed to be inserted is not what we desire. If it is meant to make a prohibition, as has been said by the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) let us then at once strike out the words "be authorized to," and then say, "the governor and the two branches of the legislature respectively shall not propose questions to justices of the supreme judicial court, and require their opinions thereon." That would make a prohibition; but as it now stands, it is no prohibition. I would not disfigure the Constitution by incorporating anything of the kind proposed in it. It has been said sometimes—I do not profess any knowledge of law, but I do profess to have some little modicum of common sense—that the object of lawyers in making laws is to frame provisions in such a manner that there shall be some place left for doubt and evasion, and that they do leave loopholes whereby men can evade their effect, because it makes it better for their profession. I do not believe, that any member of the Committee had any such intention in proposing what they have presented in this Report, but it certainly appears to me they have left this matter in a position where it may be construed as a prohibition, as it has been by gentlemen, when in fact it is no prohibition. I would either incorporate something definite in regard to this matter, or else I would have nothing in relation to it. I would either amend this provision by striking it out, or by changing it so as to make it an absolute prohibition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I do not wish to take part in this debate at all, but I wish simply to call the attention of the Convention to the opinion of the supreme court upon this subject.

In the fifth of Metcalf, they gave an opinion which they have reiterated under these circumstances. The Provident Institution for Savings in this city believed that they had the power to loan money upon notes, independent of the law about savings banks, because they were incorporated before the general savings banking law, and they proceeded to exercise the power. The question of their charter came before the legislature, and that body directed an opinion of the supreme court to be taken upon that subject, involving, of course, a very great class of private rights. The supreme court gave their opinion, and in giving it expressed great doubt of the propriety of so doing, in these words:—

"This question relates directly to the rights and duties of a private corporation under existing laws. The embarrassment felt by the justices of this court in expressing an opinion in this manner, in such a case, was particularly stated in an opinion heretofore given to the honorable House of Representatives. In giving that opinion, it was said: 'As the questions, on the face of them, seem to involve a controverted question of right, between the Commonwealth and a private corporation, a question apparently and peculiarly fit to be decided in a regular course of judicial proceeding, we had doubts, at the first view of the subject, whether it was a case coming within the intent of the Constitution, pursuant to which, questions of law are to be proposed; and whether it might not be expedient first, to submit to the consideration of the honorable House, whether it would be expedient to request an ex parte opinion in such a case. Our doubt was this: as we have no means, in such a case, of summoning the parties adversely interested, before us, or of inquiring, in a judicial course of proceeding, into the facts upon which the controverted right depends, nor of hearing counsel to set forth and vindicate their respective views of the law, such an opinion, without notice to the parties, would be contrary to the plain dictates of justice, if such an opinion could be considered as having the force of a judgment, binding on the rights of the parties. But as we understand that the session of the legislature is drawing to a close, and it might be inconvenient to the House to refer the matter back to them before acting upon it; and as an opinion upon an abstract question, without any investigation of facts, and without argument, must be taken as an opinion on the precise question proposed, which cannot affect the rights of parties, should they hereafter be brought before the court in a regular course of judicial proceeding, we have thought it best, without further delay, to submit an opinion upon the questions proposed.'—5 Metcalf, 597.

"The above remarks have been quoted at length, as applying, with full force, to the present case, and the same doubt expressed in the case referred to, is now felt, in an equal degree by the undersigned."

This is signed by the then justices of the supreme court. They set forth two things: first, that an opinion in such a case was always embarrassing, and that, as an opinion, it is to have no more weight or force than a private opinion, or that of any other body of gentlemen who should be assembled in the city of Boston, and that they should not hold themselves bound by it one moment, when it should come before the court in a regular form. One word upon another matter, for I do not propose to argue this subject at great length. The amendment of the gentleman from Worcester proposes that the attorney-general—

The CHAIRMAN. That question is not before the Committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I would simply suggest, how-

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — EARLE — BUTLER — HOOPER — MORTON.

[July 11th.

ever, as bearing upon this subject, whether it is needful for us to retain the provision that the judges shall give opinions to the legislature; as it is provided by the Revised Statutes that the attorney-general shall attend the legislature, and give them his opinion whenever required, and it was formerly the practice for that officer to give his opinions, a practice which has now fallen into disuse. The thirty-third section of the thirteenth chapter, which has relation to this matter, reads as follows:—

“The attorney-general shall, when required, attend the legislature during their sessions, and shall give his opinion upon all questions of law submitted to him by either branch of the legislature, or by the governor and council; and shall give his aid and advice, in the arrangement and preparation of legislative documents and business, when required by either branch of the legislature.”

This was afterwards reënacted, when the office of attorney-general was reëstablished. I think, therefore, there is no need of retaining this power in the Constitution, because we can always have access to the legal opinion of the attorney-general, which ought certainly to be a sufficient guide for the legislature. Again, it is proposed, as I understand by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Earle,) to strike out the whole provision in relation to this matter from the Constitution, and not incorporate in it any prohibition.

Mr. EARLE. The gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him. I say I am perfectly willing that there shall be a prohibition, and I would make a prohibition. What is reported by the Committee is not a prohibition. It does not grant the power necessary to require an answer, but still leaves them at liberty to propose questions for decision.

Mr. BUTLER. “They shall not hereafter be authorized to propose questions,” &c.

Mr. EARLE. I would strike out the words “be authorized.”

Mr. BUTLER. If the legislature have not authority to do it, I cannot see how they are going to do it. But, to return to what I was saying a while ago, I have had some experience in this matter. A long time was taken up by the legislature at the expense of a great many hundreds of dollars to the Commonwealth, in discussing the question whether we should submit the license law, or rather the no-license law to the supreme court for their opinion. The question was greatly mooted at the time, and I believe it would have been a dangerous matter to have submitted it in that manner. As one of the committee to whom that matter was referred, I was of the opinion, that it ought never to be done. Let me here refer to the court of New Hampshire, by way of an illustration, not by any means wishing to throw any odium upon that learned court, than which there is no more able and learned court in the United States, who had that question presented to them in a bill of seventeen sections, and was asked, what is there in it contrary to the principles of law and the constitution. Without argument, and without research, any more than they could give in the short time allotted them, they gave an opinion in which they said this, among other things, that that clause of the law which permitted a master to be punished for the criminal acts of his servant, in the course of his business, was unheard of in the laws of any civilized people; whereas, it turns out, that that has been the common law of England and of this State, ever since 1740, when Lord Mansfield pronounced a very learned and able judicial opinion in the case of Rex vs. Almond, where it was decided, if a bookseller's servant sells a libel, in the usual course of his business, he is responsible. This doctrine has been tacitly adopted in our own courts in the tenth of Metcalf, where it has been decided, under our old license law, that if a clerk sold liquor, his employer was liable to punishment, and yet the learned court of New Hampshire declared that such a provision was unheard of in the laws of any civilized people. I only give this illustration to show how easy it is for men to make mistakes under such circumstances, and that they are not omniscient. I trust that the Report will be sustained, and for the reason that it is competent for the legislature to order their attorney-general to keep an office here and advise them as much as they wish.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. It is very possible that this authority has been so broad, that it may have been used in too extensive a manner, but it does seem to me that there ought to be a power retained in the Constitution, which will give that Constitution a uniform application throughout the Commonwealth. We are now about to submit a new Constitution to the people. The practice under the old Constitution is now pretty uniformly established, but under the new, there will be questions likely to arise, demanding interpretation, and which may prove embarrassing. How are we to get at an uniform interpretation?

Some gentlemen say that we should take the opinions of the attorney-general. The attorney-general may be a wise and a learned man; his opinion may be given as a lawyer, but it is not conclusive. Other men may differ from him, and the question may still have to be brought before the supreme court, to be settled at last. Why not take the provision which is simple, easy and perfectly practicable, that the decision of the supreme court may be taken for a uniform purpose. I do not think it would be wise to have the supreme court decide on questions affecting the private rights of individuals. Gentlemen complain that it must be decided without argument. I think we should retain a provision so as to permit the legislature to get the opinion of the supreme court so as to have a uniform construction to guide municipal business. If gentlemen agree to that, I am perfectly willing to leave it there. I think that, at least, should be retained.

Mr. MORTON. ‘I will detain the Committee but a single moment. When this resolution was first brought up, this morning, I supposed there would be no diversity of opinion with regard to it; and, therefore, I merely alluded to one or two general reasons that influenced the Committee in favor of the adoption of that resolution. I did not intend to go into an argument on the subject, because I am unwilling to consume the time of the Committee, and, because I did not deem it at all necessary in the consideration of this case. And it has since been so fully investigated, that I should find no excuse in going into the argument on the subject. I wish to state, however, in the first place, that the Committee was in favor of this resolution, because we thought the present provision of the Constitution on this point in conflict with the fundamental principles of our government, and with the expressed provision of the Constitution in other parts, and we wished to remove that inconsistency, and that absurdity which we supposed existed in it.

Another reason why we were in favor of it, was, because we thought it immensely important, and we supposed that the whole community would agree with us, that the supreme court should be entirely withdrawn from the vortex of politics, and all exciting questions which might agitate the community. We wished to keep them clear from improper influences, and from all suspicion of being under improper influences. They have been called upon, heretofore, and in some instances in a way that affected and shook their standing in the community. These cases, I forbore to allude to when I was up before, but since they have been alluded to, and being a man in active politics at that time, I wish to say a single word. When the war of 1812 was in progress, a question arose which agitated the whole community, a question about which there was more excitement than there ever had been before, or will be likely to exist for half a century to come; the question in relation to calling out the militia was got before the supreme court in some manner, I do not recollect how, and they gave an opinion which produced an immense excitement in the community, and which was arraigned throughout this State, and throughout the United States, which opinion was reversed by the whole court of the United States, and which opinion would have destroyed the utility and confidence in the court in this Commonwealth, had it not been founded upon a basis which could not be shaken, and had it not been supported by a law-loving community.

The gentleman from Fall River speaks of the importance of the decisions of the courts on these questions. They cannot make any decision. They always tell you they cannot make any decision. What is the course pursued? They are called upon to give an opinion, when loaded down with labor, and almost always under circumstances when the question requires to be immediately answered. They have to put off all other things and attend to this, as well as they may, without a hearing, without argument, and without time to investigate authorities, and very likely in a remote part of the Commonwealth, where they are not able to get authorities. They, however, feel bound to give an opinion, but that is not a decision. On the contrary, it is possible they may often give an opinion which may lead people into errors and involve them in lawsuits, which result in great expense to them. Under these circumstances, the Committee thought they should not be called upon to give any opinion, though the judges cannot, under any circumstances, be bound by that opinion. The Committee, therefore, deemed it wise that this change should be made, and I feel satisfied that they decided right, from the discussion which we have had on the present occasion.

One word in relation to the motion before the Committee. It seems to me, upon reflection, that the Committee have adopted the best course which they could. They thought it expedient, in the first place, that this article in the old Constitution should be abrogated. Then it occurred to that Committee to decide what would be the best mode, and, after a good deal of consideration, they adopted this mode. It will be recollected that our Constitution is very different from the Constitution of the United States. It does not confer specific powers and withhold all others; but in our Constitution, the legislature have general powers and they do not have to look about and see a specific clause that authorizes them to do this or that. Therefore we thought it best merely to strike from the old Constitution this clause, and lest the legislature should think proper to continue the old practice, it was deemed but proper to insert a clause prohibiting the continuance of it, and they adopted such language as they thought proper. I know of no more decorous or better language than that which was adopted, to wit: that the legislature should not be authorized to do it. I am surprised that anybody comes here and says that they may do it, when we say they are not authorized to do it.

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — HATHAWAY — WARNER — EARLE.

[July 11th.

One word more in relation to the form. That not only had the deliberate consideration, but it had the unanimous consent of the Committee, and they were aided by taking the very words of the Committee which had the same subject under consideration in 1820; and I will inquire, when you take the language adopted by the Committee with Chief Justice Story at its head, and the present chief justice upon the Committee, whether we could take any language more appropriate than they used. Under these circumstances I hope the Committee will not only retain the principle, but retain the very words which the Committee have proposed.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. After the very lucid explanation which has been given of this matter by the chairman of the Committee, it seems to me quite superfluous for me to say a single word. But having been a member of the Committee that reported this resolution, I feel it incumbent upon me to give one or two of the reasons which induced me to favor the Report.

In the first place, all of us who have mingled in party politics, know that the executive branch of the government must be connected with the parties in this Commonwealth. We all know that the legislature is necessarily connected, somewhat with the parties that elected it. My wish about this matter was that we should have one branch of the government that never should be drawn within this maelstrom of politics. I would have one branch above suspicion, like Cæsar's wife. I think the supreme court heretofore—speaking generally of that body, and not particularly—have sustained in this government, that position. I hope they may hereafter sustain that position so far as the confidence of the community is concerned. That was the leading reason which influenced me in reference to this matter. The other reasons given by the honorable chairman of the Committee, also had great weight on my mind, as well as the reasons given by my friend—and I trust he will permit me to call him so—from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) that all these departments should be kept distinct. I would have the very language which the Committee have recommended still retained, not only for the reasons which have been so efficiently argued by the chairman, but for other reasons.

Sir, if I understand the Constitution in reference to these matters, the legislative branch of the government has the right to make what are denominated in the Constitution wholesome laws, and all the necessary and wholesome laws which in their judgment should be made for the government of the people. I look upon the proposition made by the Committee as far better than the intimation which comes from the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis). The reason is this. If you accept of the proposition which he has intimated, then there is nothing in the Constitution to forbid the legislature from requiring the supreme court hereafter to answer. Whereas, if you allow the proposition to remain as it is, you not only forbid them to put questions, but you say the supreme court is under no obligation to answer those questions, and you, in fact, prohibit them from enacting a law by which they may put the question. Hence I prefer the resolutions of the Committee, so that the legislature cannot, by any possibility, without transcending the limits prescribed by the Constitution, submit a question to the supreme court, and they cannot bring them within the maelstrom of party politics. I would not give the legislature power to drag the supreme court into politics or any existing party questions such as that of the Maine Law; and no decision should be required of them except it should be given after full deliberation and after solemn argument. I would not permit the legislature to be following them, and if I may use the expression, hounding them upon the circuit and pressing them, almost upon the instant, to give their opinion. By no means; for the supreme court, as has been well said by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) in ninety-nine cases in a hundred will be required to answer immediately.

Mr. WARNER, of Wrentham. I do not wish to protract the discussion upon this question, but I desire to say a word or two in explanation of my position; for I find I stand nearly alone; though I have the aid of the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) and of the gentleman from Berkley, (Mr. French,) who is a host in himself. Notwithstanding the Report has been sustained and advocated by the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously, and also approved, as I understand, by the supreme judges of the Commonwealth, I do not think the reasons lie altogether on one side. I am of the opinion that something may be said on the other side also. I have no doubt that the judges of the supreme court desire to avoid the decision of questions submitted by the legislature. I do not blame them for it. They ought not to be blamed for it. It is an arduous part of their duties laid upon them by the present Constitution; and no man can blame them for desiring to avoid being called upon to decide such questions. But I ask the members of the Committee on the Judiciary and the members of this Convention, to what tribunal can they go with so much confidence as to the present supreme court?

Notwithstanding all that has been said of the haste with which they are called upon to give their decisions, and notwithstanding their desire to avoid this labor, after all, to what tribunal or what man or set of men can we go with so much confidence as to our supreme court? I say it is wise to leave it where it now resides; it is wise to leave the power of deciding these questions to that tribunal to which our fathers left it. I would be content to leave it there.

All the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject admit the necessity of taking advice. They say that cases may arise where the legislature ought to be advised. What do they propose? They propose to change the officer who shall give the advice. Do not the same arguments apply against submitting these questions to the attorney-general, which apply against submitting them to the supreme court? Is not the consideration on the part of the attorney-general ex parte, also. Is he to have power to bring witnesses and to have parties before him on one side and on the other? Does he not stand precisely as the judges do in that respect? What is the benefit of shifting it from one to the other? It seems to me that the same argument will apply which is urged against leaving it to the judges to decide; and with greater force, too, because in the one case we shall have the decision of five men, and in the other, of only one man. I have not heard that any evil has grown up from the practice which has been pursued heretofore. I have not heard one word spoken of any evil which has resulted from the practice; at least, if any gentleman has said anything of the kind, I did not so understand him. But, on the contrary, as has been urged by the gentleman from Fall River and the gentleman from Berkley, great good has resulted from the practice of allowing the legislature to refer questions to the supreme court for its decision.

Now, Sir, when the supreme court have given their opinion upon any question referred to them, so far as my knowledge extends, the people have always acquiesced in that opinion; they have always submitted to their authority and have been governed by them. I have heard no word of complaint on that subject.

I hope, although I presume it is a forlorn hope, from what I have observed in this Convention, I really hope that the Constitution will be suffered to remain as it is, and that the proposition of the Committee will be rejected.

Mr. EARLE. Inasmuch as the Committee seem to be very well satisfied with the Report which they have made, and inasmuch as they say they intended to do what I supposed they did not intend to do—to make a specific prohibition—I am inclined to withdraw the amendment which I offered, although I still think that if they intended to do no more than their proposition says, they do not make any prohibition at all. The article which they have reported, and which they propose to incorporate into the Constitution, simply says that they do not give any authority to propose questions and to require an answer, but it leaves them just as much liberty to propose questions as they had before, although they cannot require them to make any answer. It leaves the matter without any absolute prohibition. It is simply a negative proposition. It does just as much and no more than is done by the present provision of the Constitution. The words "shall not be authorized" do not, in my view of the subject, make a prohibition; but if we should strike out these words, and make it in the form of an absolute prohibition, that will effect the object. Until we do that, it will be merely a matter of construction and a matter of inference whether the Convention intended to take away this power absolutely or not, whether they intended to prohibit the legislature from going to the justices of the supreme judicial court with such questions, or whether they left it so that they might go to them with questions, and leave them at liberty to answer or not, as they might think proper. Under these circumstances, I am disposed, in order to expedite business, to withdraw my amendment; and if the Committee are satisfied with the proposition as they have presented it, I shall acquiesce.

Monday.]

THE JUDICIARY.—MORTON—GARDNER—HOOPER—WOOD.

[July 11th.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. As I said just now, there are a few words which were accidentally omitted, and the omission has been very kindly suggested to me by a member of the Convention. I will, accordingly, move to amend the first resolution, by adding, after the word "Governor," the words "and Council," and by striking out the word "respectively" and inserting the words "or either of them," so that it will read as follows:—

The governor and council, and the two branches of the legislature, or either of them, shall not hereafter be authorized to propose questions to justices of the supreme judicial court, and require their opinions thereon.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee whether it would not be proper further to amend the resolve by inserting, at the end of it the words, "but may propose them to the attorney-general."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already suggested that that is a different subject from the one under consideration, and the proposition is, therefore, not now in order.

Mr. GARDNER. Would it not be in order to move an amendment to the amendment? The gentleman from Taunton has offered an amendment, and I wished to submit that this would be proper as an amendment to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject now under consideration is with regard to obtaining the opinions of the justices of the supreme judicial court, and the gentleman proposes to obtain the opinions of some other tribunal. In the opinion of the Chair, that is a distinct and different subject.

The question being then taken on the amendment of Mr. Morton, it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolve as amended.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I wish to correct a mistake that occurred in the remarks which I made just now. My impression was, that the amendment did not pass the Convention of 1820. I find, upon examination, that it did pass that Convention, and was submitted to the people; but it was rejected by the people.

The first resolve, as amended, was then agreed to.

The question was then stated upon agreeing to the second resolve.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk, moved to amend the third paragraph of the resolve, by inserting after the word "receive" the words "ample and," so that it would read as follows:—

The justices of the supreme judicial court shall receive ample and honorable salaries, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I deem it incumbent on me, Mr. Chairman, as I see no other member of the Committee present, with but one exception, to make a very brief explanation in relation to this matter. The old provision in the Constitution is, that "permanent and honorable salaries shall be established by law for the justices of the supreme judicial court; and if it shall be found that any of the salaries aforesaid, so established, are insufficient, they shall, from time to time, be enlarged, as the general court shall judge proper." That, I suppose, was thought to be sufficiently explicit when it was adopted; but questions have since arisen with regard to it, and different constructions have been put upon it by different individuals and different parties. The intention of the Committee was to make it so explicit that it would not be misunderstood; and therefore they reported the clause which is now before this body, that the justices shall have honorable salaries, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. That will remove all doubt. Many seem to think that this is merely a reenactment of the former provision; but this clause was put in so that there should be no power to reduce the salaries of the justices. This, I believe, received the unanimous assent of the Committee. I feel bound, however, to state that a modification of this proposition was favored by a number of the Committee, of whom I was one; but the majority were against it, not deeming it important. As I do not see any of the advocates of that proposition present, it may not be improper for me to state what that provision was. The minority of the Committee proposed that it should read as follows: "The justices of the supreme judicial court shall receive honorable salaries, which shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office." The reason why certain members of the Committee wished to have the clause provide that the salaries should neither be increased nor diminished, was this: they wished that the justices of the supreme court of the Commonwealth should have an independent provision made for their support, so that there should be no question arising whether their salaries could be reduced during the term of their continuance in office, and also so that there should be no inducement for either them or their friends to importune the legislature to increase their salaries. I did not believe that this was very important, and I am disposed to acquiesce in the decision of the majority of the Committee. I regret that I do not see any of the members of the Committee who advocated that provision present, with possibly a single exception; and therefore I have taken the liberty to make these suggestions.

The question being then taken on the adoption of the second resolution, it was agreed to.

The third resolution reported by the Committee was then agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. Wilson, of Natick, being to strike out the fourth resolve, and substitute, in place thereof, the following:—

Resolved, That it is proper and expedient so to amend the Constitution, as to provide that the justices of the supreme judicial court shall be appointed for the term of ten years, and the justices of such inferior courts as are, or may be established by law, for the term of seven years; said justices to be eligible to reappointment, but in no case to continue in office after attaining seventy years of age.

Mr. WOOD, of Middleboro', moved to amend the amendment, by striking out of the third line the word "appointed," and inserting instead thereof, the words "chosen by the qualified voters of the Commonwealth," and also by striking out the word "reappointment," and inserting instead thereof, the word "re-election." He also gave notice that he should subsequently move to strike out the last clause, in these words: "but in no case to continue in office after attaining seventy years of age."

Mr. WOOD said: I had supposed it to be the intention of the Committee to pass upon this question in some form, but it appeared to me that this resolve would conform to my ideas better than any other before the Convention, with this change, to have the judges elected by the people, instead of their being appointed. I suppose all will agree that we, the people, have the right to elect our judiciary as we elect the other departments of government, as, for instance, the legislative and the executive departments. No one will doubt that the power in this matter rests wholly with the people; and the question, then, for us to determine is, whether we think it judicious for us to keep this power in our own hands, and elect the judiciary, or whether we would do better to delegate this power to some other body, either to the executive or the legislative departments of the government.

Now, if it is proper for the people to keep the power in their own hands, then the only way in which that can be done is to provide for the election of these officers by the people, as we provide for the election of all other officers. If it is not proper that the people should retain this power, it must be on account of one of two reasons—either, first, that the people at some time may not be desirous of electing proper officers; or else, secondly, because they have not sufficient intelligence to make a proper selection.

In regard to the first of these reasons which may be adduced, namely, that the people may at some time become so corrupt, or take so little interest in the matter, that they will not care whether proper persons shall be elected or not, no one, I presume, will undertake to sustain such a position for a moment. They are interested in this matter above all others. They are the only parties who are interested, for any one of us may be under the necessity of falling back upon the judiciary for the protection of our interests and our liberty. The whole people, then, are interested; and it cannot be otherwise than that they must always be anxious to keep the bench filled with honest and upright and learned and independent judges.

Then, secondly, are not the people sufficiently informed to be able to carry out what it is so much to their interest should be accomplished? They must, in such a matter, always design to do right, and to ascertain, as well as may be, who the competent persons are. Then the question appears to me to be the only one—have they now sufficient intelligence to do this work, and may we depend upon the fact that in this Commonwealth they always will have sufficient intelligence and discrimination to make a proper selection. This question cannot be less answered in the affirmative than the other one. We all believe that the people have sufficient intelligence to accomplish this work. We all believe that they have sufficient power of discrimination. They are brought into contact with their judges in various ways—as parties to suits in court, as jurors, and as witnesses; and in these and various other ways they have the means of ascertaining the qualifications of their judiciary. It appears to me, therefore, that it is eminently proper to leave this matter to them.

But, I suppose the only objection which will be urged against this will be in regard to the

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—WOOD—HOOPER.

[July 11th.

tenure of office. It has been said here—I believe by more than one gentleman in the debate, in reference to judges of probate—that they believed that the people would require more ample qualifications in their judiciary than the executive would require; but that the fear was in having them chosen by the people that the tenure would be less than for life; that the judges would be subject to reelection. We shall then come back to this point. If your judges are to be elected by the people, what shall be the tenure of their office? It is here provided that the supreme judges shall be elected for ten years, and judges of the inferior courts for seven years. The fear here expressed is that your judges will be so much influenced by the popular will that they will cease to be independent; that is, that when the time comes for reelection of judges, they will be so much influenced in regard to the popular will, that they will cease to do right—will cease to have that uprightness and independence which they now have, when not dependent upon the people. But, let me ask, are not the judges men who can understand what the people wish? If they are anxious for reelection, will they not endeavor to ascertain what kind of judges the people want? And can we fail to perceive that that the very qualifications which will insure their reelection, will be just those qualifications of talent and uprightness and independence which caused them to be elected at first, and at which we are all aiming? The people desire, and always will desire, judges of this class; and the judges themselves will know that the only way to secure their reelection, will be to pursue this course of uprightness and independence. To believe otherwise, would be to believe that the people did not want this uprightness and independence in their judges, or that they were too ignorant to appreciate it.

But, it may be argued that we have now an upright and independent judiciary; that in this respect we stand fairer than some of our sister States; and that where the other States elect their judges, we can compare better with most of them. But why have we an upright and independent judiciary? Is it owing to the fact that they have been appointed by the executive? Let us see if we cannot find an argument in the history of the mother country in this respect. Let us ask whether the mere fact of their being appointed by the executive, has at all times secured upright and independent men to sit in judgment in that country? I only need mention one name in answer—"Jeffreys!" That is not alone sufficient. And if it has not been sufficient there, it may not always be sufficient here. What is the reason, then, that we have had such a judiciary as that of which it has been our good fortune to boast? It is because we have had an intelligent and upright people—a people at once desirous and capable of electing an executive that would be careful in these matters—an executive backed by the people desiring such appointments; and had these appointments been otherwise, they knew that the people would have demanded a change, and the appointment of men having the qualifications they desired. I therefore come back to the point that we have an able and intelligent people—a people desirous of having, and determined to have, an upright and independent judiciary.

Then the question recurs whether this can best be effected by vesting these appointments in their agents, by delegating their power to others, or by acting directly by themselves? I believe that all this results more from the fact of the people themselves being intelligent, and upright, and discriminating, than from any other cause; and I believe further, that they can carry out this matter better by taking it into their own hands, than by delegating their power to others. The people can always do better for themselves than their agents can do for them; except perhaps in some very particular cases, where they cannot investigate testimony, or in regard to some very particular appointments about which they cannot know sufficient. But with regard to an important matter like this, the people themselves always can and will know what is proper. I believe, therefore, that we may have as upright, and if possible, a better judiciary than we now have, if the power is left in the hands of the people.

But another consideration that weighs upon my mind, apart from the fact that it is necessary for the people to elect their officers in order to have proper men, is that it will have a reflective influence upon the people themselves. Suppose that the people could have just as good and proper a legislature, in all respects, and have all their wishes carried out just as well without the trouble of electing their legislators themselves; suppose that they could delegate this power of election to a single individual; does not any man see at once that such a thing would have a blighting influence upon the public interests. The people are called upon now to make their election of legislators in both Houses, and also to elect a supreme executive of the State; and by the very exercise of this power they become better acquainted with their rights, and thus acquire a larger amount of political intelligence. Now, in the election of their judiciary, here is another field for them. The consideration as to what are the proper qualifications for such men, is brought home to their minds. And inasmuch as it is always better for the people to do their own acts, rather than by the agency of others, I would give them this power not only in regard to this matter, but in every instance in which it is practicable. I think it is best for the people to be brought into contact with their government in as many points as possible. It is beneficial to themselves as well as to their officers, who are thus made to feel their obligations to the people.

For these, and other considerations that might be adduced, I am in favor of making this amendment to these resolves.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I hope this amendment will prevail. The principle laid down by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) as well as by the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) requires that this change should take place. They laid down the position that it was proper that the sovereign should appoint its own agents, and took occasion to make that an argument in favor of the election by the people of judges of probate. Now I see no reason why the same argument will not apply to the election of judges of the supreme court with as much force as to these inferior judges. It seems to me that we ought to carry this principle fully out.

It may be argued, perhaps, that this was not one of the inconveniences which was complained of by the people, and which originated the call for this Convention. I am quite willing to admit that we have now a competent and upright judiciary; but, Sir, we are called upon to revise the Constitution; and I apprehend that that call was not with a view merely to one or two points, but to the whole instrument. Whatever, therefore, we permit to remain in that Constitution, we sanction just as much as we sanction any new provision which we may adopt.

Now, it being admitted that the people are sovereign, and that the sovereign should appoint its own agents, I think that this is unquestionably one of those cases in which that power should be exercised by the people, and that this is the proper time and occasion in which that duty should be committed to their charge. Nor do I believe that there can be any solid objection to this. I do not believe but that we shall obtain just as good a judiciary as we have now, and, if possible, perhaps a better one. I believe that so far as the elections of judges have been made in our sister States—and it is quite proper to refer to their example by way of illustration—I do believe that they have been entirely satisfactory; and that not one of these States would be willing to go back to the old method of appointment. I saw a gentleman here the other day from the State of New York, who belonged to the party usually considered conservative in this State—the Whig party. He was an alderman of the city of Brooklyn, and spent a day in our Convention. He heard an argument here against the election of judges of probate, made by the gentleman for Wilbraham. He expressed his utter astonishment at the doctrine advanced, and said that since the elective system had been adopted in the State of New York there was scarcely a fraction of any party in that State that would be willing to return to the old system. Now the voice of these States has come up to us in favor of the practice, and their united testimony is that the system works well. If that is so, why not adopt it here? Is it contended that the people are incapable of electing proper men? If that is an argument to have any weight, let me ask are they not equally incapable of electing their governor? Who is to appoint these judges? I cannot believe that any gentleman here will attempt to maintain that doctrine. It is admitted—because it has been demonstrated in other States—that the people of other States are fully competent to perform this duty, and surely no one will place the people of Massachusetts in an inferior position to the people of any State in the Union, in regard to intelligence and capability of self-government. Why, then, should they be denied the exercise of this right?

But, it is said, that the judges ought to be rendered independent of political influences. I ask how that is to be done? I ask, if our judges heretofore have been independent of such influences? It is true that their tenure of office has been what some gentlemen would call an independent one; and it was supposed that that tenure would render them independent. But what has been the history of the past? Do you suppose that they have not held as decided political sentiments as any other class of the community? Have they not exercised as strong a political influence as any other men in the Commonwealth? How many of them have been taken from the bench and placed in the executive chair? And could this have been done, if they had been independent of political influence? They have been repeatedly selected as the standard-bearers of their respective parties in consequence of their known and decided political views. And yet who will contend that this fact has ever influenced their decisions in a single case? I do not believe that their election, by the people will have the slightest effect in rendering them less independent and impartial than they are now. They are political men now, and exercise perhaps more political influence than any other class of our citizens. The very fact that they have been repeatedly taken from the bench to fill the highest office in the State shows this.

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — HOOPER — DANA — WHITNEY — MARVIN — WILSON — KINGMAN.

[July 11th.

Now, I contend that their present position is such as to render them political to a greater extent than they would be if elected by the people. They now hold an independent tenure of office, and they have their views, as all persons in our community have, in relation to political questions, and they are now in a situation to give effect to those views, without being liable to be reached by anybody. You cannot call them to account, as they are not to go before the people for their reelection. They therefore can exercise as much political influence as they see fit, and you cannot hold them responsible for the manner in which they exercise it. Now from the very fact that all men in a community constituted like ours hold political opinions, and will exert political influence, the more independent you make them of the public voice, the more they will be liable to be swayed by such influences. But if you provide that they shall come before the people for reelection, they will take care that their opinions reflect justice and right, because they cannot stand upon any other basis. The very theory of our government rests upon the idea that the will of the majority reflects justice and right, otherwise our system of government could not stand for a day.

Now, Sir, so far as the assertion that by rendering them independent in their tenure of office you render them independent of political influence or bias is concerned, I have no confidence in it. In my opinion it is a fallacy. Our courts will be as reliable if the judges are elected by the people as they are now. The fact of their being elected would not change them. An opposite argument is one upon which we cannot rest, and therefore it is time that we changed the system.

There is another consideration connected with this matter. The system of appointments has great evils connected with it. That was found to be the case in the State of New York. Their judicial system broke down under them. And we are not entirely free from them here. These appointments are often confined to cliques and circles of a few politicians, who dictate the appointments, and those who do not belong to them, however well qualified they may be, can never hope to rise to the bench. They are frequently made as rewards for party services. And the man who stands upon his own personal merits and reputation, independent of cliques and parties, has no chance. He must give a quid pro quo in the nature of party services. But make the judges elective by the people, and if a man has ability, honesty, and legal reputation, the people will find it out, and in that way they will break up this kind of cliquism which will always be found to prevail wherever the present mode of appointment exists.

For these reasons, Sir, I hope this amendment will be adopted. I believe we shall not do justice to ourselves, or to the expectations of the people, if we do not make this change. I am aware that some persons believe that the people are not ready to adopt such a proposition. I have heard several gentlemen say that they believed the principle to be right, but that the people are not ready to embrace it. So far as I know, the people are ahead of us in this matter. We have adopted a resolution this morning, which I do not believe the people would adopt, if submitted to them by itself. It was submitted and rejected by the people in 1820, though sanctioned by the Convention of that year, and I am inclined to think they would do the same now, if separately submitted to them. But if you will send to them a proposition to elect the judges, one at a time, and for a suitable term, the people, in my opinion, will accept it. As far as I have ascertained the opinion of the people whom I represent, there is no fear among them that any bad result would follow the adoption of that proposition. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. I should like to say something upon this point. It is the most important question that has come before this Convention. There is no doubt of it. But as the time of adjournment is near, I would move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and by their chairman, (Mr. Hallett,) reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That the Committee had had under consideration the resolves referred to them, had made some progress therein, and had instructed him to ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, of Malden, the Convention then adjourned until 3 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at 3 o'clock.

Reconsideration.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I am sorry, Sir, to be obliged to do what I am about to do, yet I do not see how I can very well avoid it. I waited here on Saturday for some time, in the hope that the matter then under consideration would be disposed of, so that I might move that the Convention take up the Report of the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, on the petition of Francis Jackson and others, that the word male may be stricken from the Constitution. I learn this morning that that subject was disposed of before I arrived on Saturday morning. I move, therefore, if it be in order, that the vote by which the resolves were passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is misinformed. The matter has not been acted upon in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITNEY. I saw it so stated in the public prints.

The PRESIDENT. The subject has been referred to the Committee of the Whole, and the papers ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITNEY. That being the case I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon, moved a reconsideration of the vote whereby the Convention adopted the Report of the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, that it is inexpedient to act upon the subject of the several orders and petitions referred to them.

The PRESIDENT. The motion will be placed upon the Orders of the Day for consideration tomorrow.

The Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, of Quincy, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Hallett, for Wilbraham, in the chair, on the unfinished business of the morning, being the resolves on the subject of the Judiciary, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Middleborough to the amendment of the gentleman from Natick.

The question was taken on the pending amendment, and it was, on a division—ayes, 76; noes, 102—decided in the negative. The question recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Natick.

Mr. BRADFORD, of Essex, moved to amend the same by striking out the word "eligible," and inserting the word "ineligible."

The amendment did not prevail.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater, moved to amend by striking out the word "ten," where it occurs, and to insert "seven," to strike out "seven" and to insert "five."

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I hope my friend from West Bridgewater, (Mr. Kingman,) will not press his amendment. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the judges of the supreme court, from the origin of our government down to the present time, have held their offices for a term, on an average, of thirteen years, and the judges of the court of common pleas, for about six years. I think there should be a difference between the term of office of the judges of the supreme court, and that of the judges of the court of common pleas. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Committee will stand as it is. Whether it does, or not, I think I shall give my vote for a limitation of the term, and not in favor of an elective judiciary, for I do not believe the people of the Commonwealth are prepared for it.

Mr. KINGMAN. It seemed to me to be the determination of the Committee to provide that the judges should be made elective, and my object in offering the amendment to reduce the term of office, was to remedy, in part, the difficulty which the people would experience if they should happen to have a man appointed or elected—which I suppose and hope will not be likely to occur—who is incompetent to fill the position. That occurrence is, however, within the range of that reasonable contingency which should be provided against, and if it should happen, there will be a chance, by my amendment, for their removal sooner than there otherwise would be. And if they are, in every respect, desirable judges, as it is the purpose of the amendment to provide that they may be reappointed, I do not anticipate that any inconvenience will arise from shortening the time, in the manner I have suggested in my amendment.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I rise for the purpose of asking for a division of the question, because I cannot see any reason, if the term is limited at all, why one class of judges should hold their offices longer than another. Why should the justices of the supreme judicial court hold their offices seven or ten years, while the judges of the inferior court hold theirs for only five or seven years? It struck me, upon a moment's consideration, that if there were to be any difference between the two, the terms of office should be transposed, and the longer period given to the judges of the court of common pleas. In the first place, the judges of the supreme court are older men, than those of the latter court. The judges of the common pleas are apprentices, as it were; they are there studying and fitting themselves to be judges of the supreme court, and their term ought to be the longer of the two. They are also younger men, and they are in a better condition to remain for a longer period in office, than their older brethren upon the higher bench, and perhaps the longer they serve in the inferior capacity the better they will be fitted to perform the more important duties of judges of the supreme court. As I said before, the judges of the supreme court are older men, and the period of seven years is with them as long a time as ten years is with the judges of the inferior courts. I suppose that some persons would prefer to reduce the term of ten years to seven, and allow the other to remain as it is, and thus make the tenure of all the judges the same.

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — KEYES — KINGMAN — DANA — HALLETT — WILSON.

[July 11th.

Mr. KINGMAN. At the suggestion of a friend near me, I wish to modify my motion so that the judges of the supreme court shall hold their offices for seven years, and leaving the provision in relation to the other judges as it is now.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. Wilson.

Mr. DANA. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this question, because I am not prepared to discuss it in a manner in which it ought to be discussed before this Committee. I had no idea, and I suppose no gentleman present had, that with four subjects before us partly finished, we should have taken up this new, most important, and vital subject of the judiciary. Therefore, I think that on Monday morning no person expected that it would be taken up, and after we adjourned at one o'clock, on my suggestion, other occupations from which I could not escape, have taken up every moment of my time, and I have had no opportunity to put my thoughts into form and order, so as to make them deserving of the consideration of the Convention, nor, indeed, have I had time to obtain the necessary sustenance to impart that strength which is sufficient to enable me to express the remarks I should like to make. I do not ask the Committee to give any indulgence to me to discuss this question, because it can be discussed after it is reported to the Convention, but I simply desired to state the reasons why I am not prepared to discuss it now. I doubt whether gentlemen generally, are prepared to enter upon it; because I think the taking of it up was a surprise upon the Committee. Preceding this subject on the calendar, we had the motion of Mr. White to reconsider the vote by which the resolves on the subject of the House of Representatives were finally passed; the subject of general laws for corporations; the resolves to amend certain parts of the Constitution by striking out the words "University of Cambridge;" the subject of loaning the State credit, and the resolves on the subject of amendments of the Constitution; most of which, as also the subject of elections by plurality, which has been partly discussed, we could take up now.

With the distinct understanding with every gentleman here, that I wish no one to vote out of consideration for me, but as a general question in which we are all interested, I move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. Is this a debatable question?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. KEYES. I was only going to remark, that I consider the great question as having been decided. I came up here this afternoon to hear arguments against the election of judges by the people, but that having been decided after slight debate, I consider it a matter of small importance whether this is decided at all or not.

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) and it was decided in the negative.

So the Committee refused to rise.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) it was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Committee rise and report the resolutions as amended, to the Convention, with a recommendation that they do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and the chairman of the Committee, Mr. Hallett,

IN CONVENTION,

Reported that the Committee of the Whole had had the subject of the resolves in relation to the Judiciary under consideration, had made amendments thereto, and had directed him to report the same to the Convention as amended, with a recommendation that they do pass.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, requested that the amendments might be acted upon separately.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River, moved that the question on the first resolution be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. SCHOUER, of Boston, suggested to the gentleman from Fall River to ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage.

Mr. HOOPER. I renew the motion to amend, that I made in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the word "appointed," and to insert the words "elected by the people of the Commonwealth," and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALLETT. It is not my intention to make a speech in explanation of the vote that I shall give. I must be permitted to say, however, that I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I think we shall make greater progress in regard to the matter of the judiciary, if we now only go so far as to limit their tenure of office. The judiciary power is a great and important branch of the government. It construes our laws; it construes our Constitution. The practice of our government has been to give to the judges a life tenure of office, following the example of Great Britain, where it was found necessary that the judiciary should be independent of the crown, or of the royal power. In this country, the same necessity for providing for what may be called an independent judiciary does not exist; for we have no royal power to guard against or hold in check, and therefore I shall be content to go so far as to limit their tenure of office. And I think the sense of the people generally will go with us on that point. I believe it would not be judicious, whatever may be my private opinion on that subject, to go any further than that at present. I hope, therefore, we shall concentrate on that point, and thus commend our action to the whole body of the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. Mr. President: This is a question of transcendent importance—perhaps the most so of all the questions that have engaged, or that may hereafter engage, the attention of the Convention. Whatever may be the views and wishes of the people of this ancient Commonwealth as to the mode of action in relation to the judiciary, all are united in regard to the importance of securing and possessing an independent, able and learned judiciary. All men of Massachusetts look to that department of the government with profound regard, respect, and veneration. All deeply realize the inestimable importance to life, liberty, and property, of preserving the judicial system of the Commonwealth as pure "as the lot of humanity will admit." Some of the brightest names in our history have adorned and illustrated our judicial history. The talents, learning, and purity of those names have cast a halo of unfading light over our judicial history, thus winning the admiration and affectionate attachment of the people for our judicial system. It becomes this Convention to approach the discussion of this great question with caution, care and deliberation. Mr. President, there are differences of opinion in relation to the action of the Convention upon this question. Many members of the Convention—whether a majority or a minority, I am not able to say—are opposed to any action whatever upon the subject of the judiciary. They wish to preserve that department of the government as it now stands. They love, honor, and venerate our present judicial system, as the best that can be devised by the wisdom of man. They cling to it with all the tenacity of sincere conviction. They look upon all changes as hazardous and untried experiments, dangerous to the independence, purity and ability of our judiciary. These members will sustain, with all the ability and influence they can command, the Report of the Judiciary Committee now under consideration. A large portion of the people concur fully with these members. This class of men, in and out of the Convention, look upon any change of our judicial system with apprehension and alarm.

There is, Mr. President, another portion of the Convention—and I think a decided majority of the members of the Convention—in favor of some action. There is, also, a large portion of the people—I think a majority of the people—in favor of some action upon this question by the Convention. But the friends of action upon this question are not agreed as to what that action shall be. They differ in principle—differ widely in policy.

Some members are in favor of an elective judiciary for a limited tenure; others are in favor of an

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — WILSON.

[July 11th.

elective judiciary for good behavior. They wish to change the mode of appointment, but to preserve the tenure of the office. This class of men, in and out of the Convention, are few in number, men, I take it, who have been disappointed in regard to executive action at some time in their lives. Many members are in favor of an elective judiciary for a limited tenure of years—say seven or ten. This class of men are strong in numbers, in and out of the Convention, and it must be admitted, that this class of men are rapidly increasing. They think an elective judiciary more in accordance with the theory of our democratic institutions, more in harmony with the genius and spirit of our American ideas. These men believe that the people of Massachusetts are ready for an elective system, and that if the Convention will give the people an opportunity to do so, the people will take an elective system. The gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) has embodied the opinions of these members in the amendment he has proposed to the amendment now pending.

There are many members, however, who are in favor of an elective judiciary, that do not think the people ready to adopt such a system. If they believed the people ready for it, they would at once vote for it. Believing that the people are not yet ready to accept an elective system, these members will unite with those members who are in favor of limiting the tenure of the office, but not in favor of changing the mode of appointment. Sir, the friends of a limited tenure, and the friends of an elective system, who believe the people unprepared for an elective system, will unite in the support of the resolution which I have moved as an amendment to the Report of the Committee on the Judiciary. If the friends of an elective judiciary will abandon all efforts to secure such a system, if—when the amendment to the amendment moved by the member from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) fails, as fail it must—they will vote for the resolution now pending, it will receive the sanction of the Convention, and the approbation of the people. This resolution will secure all that most of us will desire, and I hope that gentlemen will abandon all efforts to obtain the impossible, and content themselves with securing the adoption of the amendment now pending, to wit:—

Resolved, That it is proper and expedient so to amend the Constitution, as to provide that the justices of the supreme judicial court shall be appointed for the term of ten years, and the justices of such inferior courts as are, or may be, established by law, for the term of seven years; said justices to be eligible to reappointment, but in no case to continue in office after attaining seventy years of age.

This is all, Mr. President, any of us can hope to obtain at this day. In my opinion it is all the people are prepared to accept, even if the Convention should venture to go farther. This system, I am confident, will meet the just and reasonable expectations of the people. I am not prepared to go farther at this time. I am not ready to peril the Constitution in an effort to gain an elective judicial system, a system which does not meet the cordial assent of all the people in those States where it has been adopted.

Mr. President, I feel that I am pledged by every obligation that can bind a man of honor not to propose, advocate, or vote for an elective judiciary, in this Convention. Other members may not be under any pledges or in any way bound by obligations either expressed or implied. I may err in opinion, but it seems to me that the majority are pledged to the people, at least, by the obligations which the silence observed during the canvass imposes, not to press upon the Convention an elective system. I put it to gentlemen to say, if it is consistent with the fairness, with the candor and frankness which should ever mark the actions of public men, to avoid, studiously avoid, the question before the people, and then come here and advocate a system they kept out of sight during the canvass? Is this fair dealing? Is it honest towards the people? Is it fair towards our associates who were and are opposed to an elective judiciary, and who would rather have let the Convention fail than to take such an elective system? Having blinked the question during the canvass, I cannot consent here to advocate it. I may err in my opinions, but I am confident, that some of our best friends would have voted against calling the Convention if they had supposed that the Convention would make a change so radical as an elective judicial system in Massachusetts.

At any rate, Mr. President, I am pledged by every obligation that can bind an honorable man not to vote for the election of judges by the people. During the two years that the Convention question was canvassed before the people, I took some little interest and some little part in advocating the Convention. At all times and upon all occasions, in public and in private, I said to those who approached me upon the subject, that it was not the purpose of the friends of the Convention to make the judiciary elective. I suppose, Mr. President, that there are from fifty to one hundred letters of mine scattered over the Commonwealth upon the question of the Convention, in which I have expressed my opinion, that the Convention was not called to make the judiciary elective—that the friends of constitutional reform were not agreed upon either the principle or the expediency of making the judges elective, and that the question would not be pressed by the leading friends of the Convention. I had, Sir, a right to say and write this to our friends, who were in doubt. In all our documents—in our addresses and resolutions we observed a “masterly” silence in regard to the question. In the report of my friend for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) which gentlemen all over the house are so fond of referring to as the chart by which their course is guided here, no reference is made to that question. In the addresses put forth by state committees and state conventions, the question was studiously avoided. During the last year's canvass some five hundred speeches were made under the direction of the State Central Committee of the Free Democracy. My eloquent friend for Northborough, (Mr. Burlingame,) the representative of “young America” on this floor, will tell you that our speakers were urged to advocate the Convention, but they were cautioned to avoid committing the friends of the Convention upon the question of an elective judiciary. My eloquent friends, the delegate from Lowell, (Mr. Adams,) and the delegate for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) will remember that on this question we were to maintain a prudent silence. In my opinion this prudent policy carried the Convention. Now, Sir, after going through a two years' canvass in silence upon this question, giving pledges to hesitating and doubtful friends to win their support, it would not be manly or honest in me to vote for an elective system. If the result depended upon my vote I would not, I could not, vote for it. I have thus frankly stated the position I occupy upon this great question; I cannot, therefore, vote for the amendment to the amendment proposed by the member from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper).

Mr. President, I have put the question of a limited tenure of office to gentlemen of all parties, men of intelligence and character, and the response is almost invariably in favor of such limitation. Men who are in doubt concerning an elective judiciary readily assent to the proposition to limit the tenure of office. It is more in harmony with American ideas and institutions. A leading member of the Boston bar—not a friend to this Convention, a gentleman who has served in the legislature many years—expressed to me the opinion, the other day, that two-thirds of the Boston bar were in favor of a limited tenure of the judicial office. A day or two ago a leading member of the profession, not long ago a distinguished district-attorney, expressed to me his entire assent to the amendment I have proposed, limiting the tenure of the judges of the supreme court to ten years and the judges of the common pleas court to seven years, these judges to be eligible to reappointment, but in no case to continue in office after attaining seventy years of age. Sir, in my poor judgment, the adoption of this limited judicial tenure will meet the approval of members of the legal profession generally, and of the people. All learned and upright judges will be reappointed. Chief Justice Greene, of New Jersey, a Whig, was reappointed last winter by a Democratic governor, with the cordial assent of the bar of that State, of all parties.

I am told, Mr. President, that the tenure of office is too brief—that men of learning and talents will not go upon the bench for so brief terms. Now, Sir, it so happens that the justices of the supreme court have held their offices, on the average, about thirteen years; and the justices of the court of common pleas about six years. During the past twelve years eighteen judges of the court of common pleas have been appointed. The rapid changes in that court go to show that gentlemen go upon the bench of that court—not to continue for life—but to increase their reputations, and then go again into practice. This practice will continue until the salaries are larger than they now are. If the term of office is fixed at seven years, judges will feel bound in honor to remain in office, at least, during the term for which they were appointed. I may be mistaken in the opinion, but I believe that if the tenure of office is fixed at seven or ten years, the justices of the court of common pleas will continue in office, at least, as long as they now do.

Sir, objection is made to the length of the term I propose for the justices of the supreme court. I think the tenure of ten years none too long. We want upon the bench of the supreme court of Massachusetts, men of eminent ability, of profound learning, and of ripe experience—men who will illustrate and adorn our judicial history. We must hold out inducements enough to satisfy the most gifted men of the legal profession to accept seats upon that bench. The tenure of ten years, with the power of reappointment, so far as the tenure of office is concerned, will secure the services of men of exalted talents for that tribunal. My friend for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) opposes the length of the tenure. He tells us that the justices of the supreme court are older men than the justices of the court of common pleas, and, therefore, the tenure of office should not be so long. My friend is mistaken, I think, in his views upon this question. If we wish to have upon the bench of the highest judicial tribunal of the State the first legal talent of the profession, we must pay good salaries, and make the tenure of office long enough to secure that talent. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that ten years should be the tenure of the office. I had rather fix the tenure of the justices of the common pleas at ten years, than to reduce the other to seven years.

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—WILSON—SCHOULER.

[July 11th.]

I am, Mr. President, as anxious as any one can be to secure the independence of our judicial tribunals. To that department all of us should look with entire confidence. The humblest man in the Commonwealth should repose in security upon the inflexible justice of the judicial tribunals of the land. No one, here or elsewhere, desires more sincerely than I do to secure and preserve an able, learned and pure judiciary—as impartial “as the lot of humanity will admit.” If I supposed that the limitation of the tenure of office would impair the independence, or lessen, in any respect, the exalted character which the most devoted admirers of our judiciary claim for it, I would not advocate or vote for the limited tenure.

Gentlemen seem to fear that if the judiciary is made elective, or the tenure of office limited, that political considerations will influence the choice of judges. Have not political influences controlled the choice of judges under our present system? Have not our judges been strong political partisans? How does it happen that only two judges of the supreme court were members of the Democratic party, for more than half a century? Yes, Sir, for more than fifty years, the judges of that court, with only two exceptions—governor Lincoln for a short time, and governor Morton for about fifteen years—were Federalists or Whigs. Many of these judges were not only politicians, but ultra politicians. Chief Justice Parsons was the brain of the famous Essex Junto. Chief Justice Parker was an ultra Federalist, and the present Chief Justice, I venture to say, entertains his political opinions with all the ardor and zeal of sincere conviction. Some of the most active, I may say violent politicians of the Commonwealth have been appointed judges; and political considerations controlled their appointments. Every man of ordinary intelligence knows this to be so. Then why this extreme fear that politicians will be elected to the bench, or that politics will influence their appointment? It has ever been so, and I venture to say that it will continue to be so, in the future as in the past. It is said, and I have reason to believe it to be so, that Judge Fletcher desired for several months to leave the bench before he did so, but that he was induced to continue upon the bench until a Whig administration came into power. Then, in haste, he resigned, and a successor was appointed—of the Whig school of politics—an able man, I know, and an able judge I am sure he will be; but a more violent political partizan it would be difficult to find in the State or in the nation. Sir, I venture to say that the judges of our supreme court have been, and are now, strong, zealous politicians—as much so as any other class of public men. It has been so in other States. Chief Justice Spencer, in New York, played, while upon the bench, a leading part in the political intrigues that have ever marked the political history of that great State. He was the Warwick of New York politics and politicians, while on the bench. That great State has adopted the elective judicial system. Politics may now influence her judicial officers; but the judges under the present system will not influence so powerfully the political affairs of that State as they did from 1800 to 1825, especially while the judges were members of the council of appointment.

Sir, our history affords abundant evidence that the judges in this and other States have been men of as active and strong political feelings, prejudices, and opinions, as any other class of public men. And I am sure our history shows that in the exercise of their judicial functions they have not been influenced, to any great extent, by their political opinions. I have no fears that the limitation of the judicial tenure will tend to the introduction of political influences into the judicial tribunals of the Commonwealth—at least, to any greater extent than they now are and ever have been. Do not gentlemen, who are so keenly alive to the dread of political influences, know that the Lord High Chancellor of England is placed in power solely on political considerations—and that he holds his office on the sole tenure of the political power of his party? The tenure of the highest judicial officer of the British Empire depends upon the power of his party to retain the control of the government. Yet gentlemen are alarmed at the idea that the tenure of office in Massachusetts shall be fixed at ten years.

If the friends of constitutional reform desire to do anything, I hope they will sustain the resolution I have proposed. It is all we can do at this time, and I believe it will meet the wishes of the people, who I am quite sure are not yet ready to adopt the elective system. Other States have adopted it. Let them try fairly the experiment. If it works well we can follow their example. Massachusetts should “Be not the first by whom the new is tried,

Be not the last to lay the old aside.”

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I said a few words, the other day, in favor of an elective judiciary of probate. But, Sir, I am opposed to making your judiciary, either of the supreme court or court of common pleas, elective. The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) said, that in all the circulars they had sent out, in all the addresses that had been written, or in all those one hundred and fifty letters which he had written, in answer to inquiries about the Convention, there was not one word said in favor of an elective judiciary. Now I should like to ask that gentleman, if there was anything said, in any of those documents, about limiting the tenure of office of the judges of our courts? I ask him if there was anything said, in any of these addresses which have been issued by either party, or if there was anything said, in the address or report of the committee, of which the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) was the chairman, in favor of holding the Convention, which took ground in favor of limiting the term of the judges? I think he will find, that there is as little said upon one question as the other. Now, Sir, I prefer to let the Constitution, with regard to the judiciary, remain just as it is now; that is, that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior—that, as long as they perform the duties of their offices well, they shall remain there, uninfluenced, either by an outside, popular pressure, or by legislative or gubernatorial pressure.

Now, Sir, according to this Report, we are to limit the term of the judges of the supreme court to ten years, and of the court of common pleas to seven years. Just so soon as a judge has been on the bench long enough to acquire a thorough knowledge of his profession, you would have him liable to removal. Now, Sir, I would not make any such provision. I believe, that when a man goes upon the bench, he goes there for a good purpose. He goes there to study his profession, and to prepare himself in such a way, that he will be able to give judgment in accordance with the law, and in accordance with what is just and right. And I cannot see any difference in principle, between the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) and that adopted by the Committee of the Whole, offered by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson). As far as any expression of public opinion goes, there is just as much to be said in favor of one plan as the other. If either question has been discussed at all, in opposition to the present system, it has been discussed in favor of an elective judiciary, and not in favor of limiting the term of the judges to a certain period, and then reappoint or elect them, as the case may be. Now, Sir, as far as the popular argument is concerned, it is in favor of the proposition of my friend from Fall River, and against that of the gentleman from Natick. But as I am opposed to both propositions, and as I believe the people of the Commonwealth, a large majority of them, are opposed to both, I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River, and then against that of the gentleman from Natick.

The gentleman from Fall River, this morning, spoke in favor of an elective judiciary, and, as I understood him, brought up some historical facts in regard to England, to support his argument. He said, that in England, where the judges had been appointed for life, they had not always been free from bias in their decisions, but that they had lent the great weight of their decisions in favor of the strong arm of the crown. Well, Sir, that may all be very true, but the gentleman did not tell us the whole facts of the case. It is very well known, that when such men as Jeffreys, were appointed by the crown, they were appointed from the fact that they could be made the tools of the crown. Now, Sir, I am opposed to having judges sit upon our bench, who can be made the tools of the executive, of the legislature, or tools of the people. I care not which. And, so far as I know, since the Revolution of 1688, the judges in England have been honest men. At any rate, I think we have had none who were not honest.

But, Sir, the reason why I am opposed to an elective judiciary, or in favor of the judges of our courts being appointed for a limited time, is this: I do not see that they are not likely to be as much influenced by popular argument, and popular impulses, as other men, and I wish to have them so constituted, so that we shall feel that they are not influenced—so that we shall feel, when we go before a court, that we have a judge upon the bench, or judges there, who are so constituted that none of those popular appeals or popular influences can warp their judgments. I wish to have all the other departments of government made as popular as they possibly can be, by election; but that great stand by, that tribunal which is to construe our laws, which has our lives, our liberties, and our property in its hands of such a character that we should feel, when we go before it, that we are before an impartial and fair tribunal, free from party influence, and free from all other influences—that we are before a court of justice where justice will be meted out to us.

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HOOPER—KEYES.

[July 11th.

It is for these reasons, that I am in favor of the Constitution remaining as it now stands, in reference to this branch of the government. I would not touch it, in one way or the other. But as to the propositions of the gentlemen from Natick and Fall River, I would not toss up a copper between them. Upon the popular ground, I should prefer that presented by the gentleman from Fall River, and let the judiciary be made elective. But I cannot see any distinctive argument that can be raised in favor of either above the other. Any gentleman who will go for the proposition of the gentleman from Natick, cannot possibly object to that of the gentleman from Fall River. But I believe a majority of the Convention are opposed to both propositions. Let the judges of your courts remain in office during good behavior, subject to removal by the governor and council, upon the address of both branches of the legislature, and I think we have a perfect assurance that our judiciary will be well guarded, and that they will guard well the rights of the people. With these views, I shall vote against any proposition which may be made to affect the tenure of the judiciary of Massachusetts.

*Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. With the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) I can truly say, that the discussion, upon this subject has come up very unexpectedly to me, at this time. I did not suppose that it would come under consideration to-day, and I was in hopes that I might have had an opportunity to have made some little preparation, to have presented my ideas in a clearer and more collected form. But it has been my misfortune in attending the sittings of this Convention, that I have had no opportunity of making preparation of any kind upon any subject presented for consideration here, as I ride over one hundred miles every day, in the cars, and walk more than two miles, in travelling to and from the Convention, besides attending to considerable professional business. [Laughter.] The only time I have had to investigate any subject, was while riding to and from the Convention. I have not attempted, therefore, to make a set speech on any subject, nor do I intend to do it. What I say is, consequently, always upon the spur of the moment. This question has come up unexpectedly. It is a question of great importance.

I was not aware that gentlemen of this Convention were committed and precluded from coming to a free and unbiased decision of it upon its merits. I was not aware that this thing had been settled prior to the Convention being convened. I had not seen it agitated in any addresses and circulars, it is true; but I did not suppose that that was any reason for precluding us from discussing it, like all the other questions which might be raised in relation to matters embraced in this Constitution. I supposed that we came here for the purpose of revising the Constitution, and that the majority could act upon whatever questions they saw fit, and send out the result of their deliberations for the acceptance of the people. If it be a fact, that this matter has been prejudged, and the whole thing settled upon the part of some gentlemen, I presume it does not preclude other gentlemen who are not so situated upon this matter, from carrying out the views they may entertain, or what they may suppose to be the wishes of their constituents. It is upon this ground, that I make this motion. I advocate it because I am individually in favor of it, and because I believe it will be acceptable to my constituents. It strikes me that this is one of the reforms which we are called upon to make, and although, as I have admitted before, there is no great evil existing under the present system, nor do I suppose that we shall suffer very materially if we do not change it, still I think it better to carry out the theory of our government in the fundamental laws, and make them harmonize with each other, rather than retain this relic of monarchy, which has come to us from our ancestors across the water. I say that we had much better place this thing in harmony with the theory of our institutions, and let the sovereign people, if the sovereignty resides in the people, appoint their own agents. That they are as fully competent to decide in this matter, as in any other, I presume no gentleman upon this floor, will pretend to deny. It seems to me, the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) is open to the same objection, that has been urged against making the judiciary elective for a term of years, on the ground that these officers will be influenced by party considerations. Will not the judge upon the bench whose term of office is about to expire, and who desires a reappointment, be as apt to enter the arena of politics and endeavor to secure the ascendancy of his party in order to secure a reappointment, as the judge who depends upon the people for a reelection? Will not the judge be as liable to be influenced by these considerations, when holding his office under an appointment from the governor, as when holding it under an election by the people? I think he would be influenced more under the appointing power than he would be under the other method. We have had experience of the working of the elective system in various parts of the country, to which we can refer, and we find that judges of the most upright and estimable characters, have been selected. I believe in Vermont, a chief justice, who was chosen by the legislature, was reelected more than twenty years in succession, by his political opponents. In New York, the judicial system to which the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) alluded, as being so corrupt that it could be endured no longer, was a system of appointment, but now they have changed it to an elective system, to get rid of the corruptions. There, the judges, and the higher judicial officers, were appointed, until by the revision of their Constitution in 1846, a change was made, and the judges are now elected by the people. One good feature about this system is, when you get a very good judge, the people will be very apt to reflect him as long as he chooses to serve, and if, unfortunately, a bad judge should have been elected, they will be very apt to reject him if he should again come up as a candidate. This, it seems to me, is an important point. I think the adoption of this system will have another effect, and one which I think highly desirable, and that is, that it will elevate the character of politics. It will induce the more respectable class of citizens to mingle in the primary assemblies, to see that the right class of officers are nominated, and not leave the matter in the hands of mere politicians. I am in hopes that we shall carry through this measure and send it to the people, and I believe that it is a measure which they will sanction, and one which is greatly desired by them.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I trust this may be the commencement of a debate which will last long enough to give us all an opportunity of investigating this subject thoroughly, so that we may be able to vote upon it intelligently. I do not certainly feel prepared to vote upon this question to-day. So far as regards electing judges by the people is concerned, I see nothing so alarming about it. I do not understand how gentlemen who are for stripping the governor of all power, authority, and dignity, taking away the appointment of every officer from him, and leaving everything to the people, upon the ground that they are the best fitted to decide in these matters, should hesitate when it comes to the election of judges by the people. I do not see what there is in the character, or office of a judge, to prevent him from being selected by the people, just as well as any other officer. My early predilections were not democratic, but rather the reverse, and I was rather disposed to invest the governor with some dignity and authority in his own hands, and if I could favor the appointment of judges by the people, it would be somewhat upon the ground of not stripping the office entirely of its importance, dignity and authority. But, I believe, of all the officers which the people or the governor would be called upon to appoint, that the people would make the best selection, use the most discretion, and come the nearer to a correct decision, in the election of judges. It so happens that judges are placed in a position in the discharge of their duties, which makes them stand out more conspicuous than any other class, and their characters are better understood, are more open to discussion and scrutiny, and the people can judge better of their ability, integrity, and personal honor, than almost any other class of men. The people are more conservative even than governors themselves, and where officers of this character are to be elected, the fault generally is that they keep on electing them continually, until they become incapacitated for the discharge of the duties of their offices. Take, for example, the case of county registers, treasurers, and other county officers. They are elected, generation after generation; the offices are kept in the same families, and they are elected in spite of political parties. Even in my own county these offices have been kept, for two or three generations, in the same family. In regard to the argument which has been used here about the political influence that will be exerted upon judges, let me say one word. It is very rarely that a legal question has anything to do with politics. It is rarely that a question arises in any court, the decision of which

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — KEYES — HOLDER.

[July 11th.]

affects parties or politics one way or the other, and whenever such a question should arise, why the judge may be influenced as well by somebody else as by the popular voice. Judges are mere men, are subject to this influence, and are as liable to act under it, perhaps, as any other class of men. It is not a new thing that men have given solemn judicial opinions in their law offices, and afterwards reversed them when upon the bench. I do not know as it makes any very great difference whether the influence which acts upon them comes through the party clique or class into which they enter when they become judges, or whether it is the great voice of the people which shall influence them. Why is this popular influence more dangerous in regard to judges, than other officers? That is what I desire to find out by the discussion. I am not prepared to say that I shall vote for an election of judges by the people. If the people do not desire them elected, they ought not to be elected. I have one reason for wishing them to be appointed by the governor, and that is, that he may have something to do, that he may have some responsibility, and that it will give to his office more character, dignity, and responsibility, especially as it is intended to strip him of all other kind of appointments. They elect judges in some of the States, and the system has worked well. I think it is the greatest bugbear which has been introduced into this Convention, that, by the adoption of this system, our judiciary is to be destroyed, and our courts of justice corrupted. I think it is time the idea was dissipated, for no reasons are given by gentlemen who have held it up before us. If there is any foundation for it, I should like to know what it is. In Vermont, the system of an elective judiciary has been tried successfully. I have been there myself at repeated times, have seen the judges upon the bench under the operation of the different systems, and I could never tell the difference, and after going there six or seven years, I am not sure that I found out that they were the judges elected by the people. As I intimated before, I came up to the Convention to-day to listen to the debate upon this subject, and hear the various arguments urged for and against the election of judges by the people. I think the limitation of time already adopted is a great improvement, because the tendency is not to take men at the end of their term and turn them out of their office, if they are proper men. You do not find, every hour of the day, men who are fit to be judges of the supreme court, and whom the people would wish to elect, or whom the governor would wish to appoint. I happen to have some experience in this matter, and I know that it is somewhat difficult to find men whom the people will clothe with the high and distinguished office of judge. So far as regards politics, that matter seems to be left entirely out of sight. You may take the bitterest politician, one who has rendered himself even obnoxious to a large majority of the people, and place him upon the bench, and he drops his political mantle at once, and ceases to be, to some extent, a politician. I do not know as I may allude to a case of this kind within my own personal observation, where, after an individual was elected judge, it was never supposed that party considerations had the slightest influence in his decisions, and not one intimation of that kind was ever made against him. Gentlemen are willing that the people should do everything but elect their judges. Why cannot the people elect these officers as well as anybody else? The danger apprehended from any supposed political influence which might be exerted upon them, has been denied, and proved to be false, in every case where it has been tried. They had a ticket for judges a few years ago, in the State of Pennsylvania; and there was one man nominated on the ticket with the rest, who, for some cause or other, was not thought to be a proper person for a judge. What influence did party considerations have in that case? The other members of the ticket were elected by triumphant and overwhelming majorities, but he was left far behind on the ticket, and utterly defeated. This fact, and others of a similar character, show that wherever judges have been elected, party considerations have had but little to do in their election, and it seems to me, from the observation I have had, that of the various kinds of offices, there are none more out of the reach of political partizanship, or would be affected by party politics so little, as this very office of judge. We have had in the last year or two, upon the bench of the supreme court in this State of Massachusetts, an individual who, not three years ago, was the most unpopular man in the Commonwealth, and who had been renounced, abandoned, and abused by all parties. He was taken and placed upon the bench, and, if the people had selected him, it would have been one of the strongest arguments that could have been urged against an elective judiciary, and yet three months had not elapsed before he became one of the most popular judges in the State. I did not rise to argue in favor, and I do not know that I shall vote in favor, of electing judges by the people, but I believe there is a groundless and unnecessary fear upon this subject. I believe that thousands of people who hold up their hands in opposition to such an act, do not know why or for what they do it. It seems to me to be a little inconsistent, while we are talking about the people being the conservators of virtue, intelligence, and honor, the only reliance and source of safety, to tell them that they are not to be trusted with the election of those officers in whose administration of office they have a great and vital interest.

Who cares who is elected sheriff unless he expects to be hanged or put in prison? [Laughter.] Nobody. But every-body, even without their own consent or control, will be at the mercy of the judges, and the people feel and know that they have a solemn interest in the character of the bench; and if they can take care of anything, I believe they can take care of that. I do not believe the people rule in virtue and righteousness any more than some single men, but I believe that if any business can be safely and securely intrusted to their administration, it is the election of the judges, just as much as that of the governor himself, and even more than that.

I hope, Sir, that before I shall be called upon to vote upon this subject—and I hardly know how I shall vote—I may know what the people in various parts of the Commonwealth think of it. I think there has been a change in the views of the people on this subject; for formerly, I know there was an almost unanimous voice against it. I know I have been led to look upon it with different eyes from what I had formerly, in consequence of hearing the testimony of men from other States in regard to the results of the election of judges by the people in those States.

The arguments in the newspapers within the last fortnight, as reasons why the judges should not be elected by the people, are the very reasons why they ought to be elected by the people. Still they were not good reasons. A man in Virginia or North Carolina, whose character was such that he ought not to be a judge anywhere, whom his very neighbors hated and vilified, said himself that if it was to depend upon a popular vote, he would not have been elected, and therefore it was his opinion that judges ought to be appointed. [Laughter.] Such arguments do not convince me that it is best to retain the appointing power.

But I have said more than I expected to when I got up. I am not the proper person; my life and education have not been such as to enable me to judge on this subject, perhaps. I have sat in a jury box, and attended courts as a loafer, and seen how things occur, and I know from the experience of men that it is one of the safest duties which can be left with the people, to allow them to elect the judges.

Mr. HOLDER, of Lynn. I was a little surprised, this morning, when I heard the subject which is now before us, announced for discussion, but still more surprised when I found that the question was near being taken; for it is a question which I consider of great magnitude, and one which should call out all the talent of the Convention. I hope, however, the amendment now under consideration will be adopted. I believe the people are ready and anxious to assume the power of electing their judges; and the remarks made by the gentleman from Middleborough, for Abington, and from Fall River, meet my approbation.

It has been said that the election of the judges by the people would destroy their independence, and make them subservient to political parties. I beg leave to differ from gentlemen who take that view of the subject. I believe it will clothe them with a true and god-like independence, based upon the popular will of the people. That Sir, is always true and unerring, and should always be regarded by all men who are in authority. I would ask gentlemen of this Convention if they wish to give the judge a salary and continue to guarantee it to any class of individuals who shall not be chosen by the people, and who are not popular with the people? If we do this, what kind of men are we to expect will be appointed? Are we to expect men of the full growth and stature of men? Are we to expect men who regard the interests of the community at large? Are we to expect men whose interests will be blended with the people's interests, and whose actions will be based on justice, mercy, and all those kindred virtues, which go to adorn humanity? If we should be so fortunate as to obtain men possessed of these virtues, under the appointing power, as we have always been fortunate enough thus far to do, it will not be on account of our action. If we reject this amendment, the result will be to make men morose and unkind, and will tend to make them irresponsible on account of the security of the tenure of office.

Now I wish to have the judges elected by the people for the purpose of placing them in the right position. If we take a retrospective view of our own lives, we shall find all the attain-

Monday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — HOYT — FRENCH — WOOD.

[July 11th.

ments we have made in virtue were on account of our dependence on, and connection with, the people. I advocate the election of the judges by the people, because I believe it is an American principle. I know we learn from history that the time was, when rulers even fixed the price of the wages for men, and seemed to think that mankind could not go alone unless they directed their steps. But in these States, in the nineteenth century, are we not willing to take the responsibility to elect the men who have the care of the lives, the property, and the dearest rights of our citizens? For one, I am ready, Mr. Chairman. And I feel that it is based upon every principle which it has been my province to know or learn in this goodly State in which I live. I believe it is the duty of this Convention to take away this appointing power and give it to the people, and not only proclaim their love for them, but trust them with entire confidence. This is what I believe, and I believe that no man who would be a governor in this State would wish to have that vast responsibility placed upon him, of appointing the judges for the people. And if gentlemen in this Convention will look at the matter right, even if governors are willing, I hope they will not be willing to intrust them with it. It is a power which belongs to the people; they are ready to exercise it and I hope they will retain it.

Mr. HOYT, of Deerfield. It was not my purpose to say anything upon this subject, but I wish to say a few words in regard to some remarks that have fallen from other gentlemen. It has been said that this proposition was not sent forth to the people generally when the call for this Convention was issued. That, I believe, is true. I know very well, however, that the constituency I have the honor to represent, regarded this question as one of the first and most important questions which were to come before this Convention; and I know that the proposition for calling this Convention obtained many votes among them, on account of the hope that this reform might be effected. I also know, that it was regarded by the friends of constitutional reform, as one of the most vital questions which would come before this Convention, and I believe that if the proposition to elect the judiciary by the people, is to go forth to the people, that it will be the most popular proposition, in that part of the State where I reside, of any proposition which has yet been adopted by this Convention. It is not my purpose, however, to say a single word with regard to it; but it does seem to me, from what I know of the views of the people in various parts of the Commonwealth, that it is regarded as a most important object, and one which will be hailed with the utmost satisfaction by almost every friend of the Convention among the constituency which I have the honor to represent. And I know something of the feeling in the towns in my vicinity, and I think that it will give great satisfaction there, also.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I have listened with a good deal of attention to this debate, but still I am unable to understand how a judge, elected by the people, should be so much more deeply impregnated with political matters than one appointed by the governor. I do not see why a judge appointed by the governor would not be as liable to be led astray by political prepossessions as a judge elected by the people. I am for retaining in the hands of the people all the power that belongs to them. Power, it is said, is always stealing from the many to the few; and that power which belongs to the people, I want them to hold. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) tells us, that he wants the judges appointed for life. Now, suppose these men, appointed for life, should happen to die. [Laughter.] We should have nobody left who would be able to take their places. I think that it is proper, and necessary, and right, that judges, and all other officers of the government, should remember that they are mortal, and that they ought, at certain seasons, to retire; and then if the people think that they are the best, they can reelect them and still let them go on. But there is something which strikes my mind as a rather curious question—how it is possible that a judge appointed by the governor, should have less political matter about him, than one elected by the people. I cannot say that it is not so, however. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River will be accepted, and let the people see whether they are capable, inasmuch as they are capable of electing a president of the United States, of electing their judges. If there is talent in the whole State of Massachusetts, I guess the people will find it out, and I guess they will make no mistake. But if they should happen to make a mistake, it can afterwards be corrected; but to create an appointment for life is to make them wholly independent, to make them independent of everything on earth, with nobody to call them to an account; and if they should happen to be arbitrary, they may do just as they please, though that has never yet happened in this State, and I hope it never will.

Mr. WOOD, of Middleborough. If I was in favor of the amendment made in Committee, of course I should favor this proposition, which is now before the Convention. I presume I am like many who came to this Convention, who came, not having looked into this subject thoroughly, and fully made up an opinion. I was against the election of the judges by the people; my habits of life and education were such. I believe it is the case with the legal profession generally, that they get a reverence for the judiciary from their leading influence and from reading their decisions, which causes them to suppose that their appointment by the governor, as heretofore, is necessary. But when my mind was led to follow out the principles which have been acted on here, I came to a different conclusion; and I believe we should come to a different conclusion by an application of those principles, and that the election of the judges should be by the people.

The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) has stated that he believes it was not one of the purposes for which this Convention was called. Now, I believe that no gentleman knows better what objects the people wished to accomplish than that gentleman. But I take it that no one knows or can tell for what purposes particularly this Convention was called. It appears to me that what has been called the reform party, the friends of this Convention, have in some things not been quite bold enough, have been too fearful of carrying out their own ideas, lest the people should not sustain them; and therefore they have taken a kind of middle ground. It appears to me that this is one of those cases in which we should not leave the judiciary as it was, nor provide for their election by the people, as other States have by their modern Constitutions; but should take a middle course and provide that their tenure of office shall be limited, while they are still appointed by the governor. It appears to me that is the right course for this Convention—to submit that proposition to the people and let them pass upon it.

We are called here to deliberate and submit propositions to the people. Some say the people are not ready for this. Others say they are, and wish for it. Why, then, not submit it to the people, and let them act upon it? I know that many people are expecting it, if others are not, and many people wish to act upon it, if others do not. Why not put it before them, and let them vote upon it?

Reference has been made to other States. I submit to this Convention that there are fourteen States, if I have counted right, which elect their judiciary. This practice has been gradually increasing, and where can you find a State which has once adopted the plan of electing by the people, going back again to the old plan? Can any one present any such case, of any State? If they cannot, letters received from individuals, and opinions of different men, cannot weigh much against the deliberate opinions of these fourteen States, which, beginning with a few, have gradually gone on to this number, and these among the most influential States, like New York, Ohio, and nearly all the Western States, and some of the Southern States, which have adopted this plan.

Why not submit this to the people, now that a Convention has been called by them, and pursue the course which other States have done which have altered their Constitutions recently. Go forth with it to the people, and not hold back because we fear the people will not sustain it. Let us try it.

With regard to the tenure of office, my reason for desiring that it should be limited, is this. It is found in the present Constitution:—

“In order that the people may not suffer from the long continuance in place of any justice of the peace, who shall fail of discharging the important duties of his office with ability and fidelity, all commissions of justices of the peace shall expire and become void, in the term of seven years from their respective dates; and upon the expiration of any commission, the same may, if necessary, be renewed, or another person appointed, as shall most conduce to the well being of the Commonwealth.”

This is a good reason, and it is a reason that should apply to other cases as well as to justices of the peace. Why not make the tenure of other officers limited also, for the same reasons? It has been stated here that if a judge did not behave well, he can be removed. How? In two ways; first by address, at it called, to the governor, requesting him to remove a judge. I think that course has been pursued once, and so far as I am able to ascertain, once only, since the formation of this government. About the year 1803 or 1804, a judge of the supreme court who became incompetent on account of a paralytic shock, and was unable to preside, was in this way removed. An attempt has been made, as many here present will recollect, to remove justices of the peace in this way, when they were acknowledged to be incompetent; but it could not be carried through the legislature, and why? It was said that the provision in the Constitution was not intended to apply to persons where charges of criminal conduct were not preferred against them. Then you must pursue the mode of impeachment, and that applies to these cases and also to cases of mental or physical inability, like insanity or old age, and some such cases. It has in fact become inoperative except in these cases. If a judge becomes unpopular—if he has done anything for which he ought to be removed, he can only be reached by impeachment. I suppose it is pretty well understood now, after the experience of three or four years, that you have only your impeachment. Gentlemen know, if they will look into the history of impeachments, the difficulties that arise here; and these are so great that there have been only six impeachments in this State—one of judge of probate, Judge Prescott; one of notary public, one of sheriff, and three of justices of the peace. These are all the cases in which officers have been removed by impeachment since the formation of our State government. Why, Sir, gentlemen know very well that such a stain is thrown upon a man's reputation if he is impeached, that nothing would induce a legislature to present an impeachment, except in a case of the most urgent necessity. Nothing but the most gross cases could be reached in that way. People would hesitate to do it, seeing that it was casting a very great stain upon a man's character to have him removed in that way. He might commit a great many indiscretions, and might be very unpopular before they would proceed to such a course; they would wait for some evidence of criminality or immorality, or very great incompetency to perform his duties, before you could make an impeachment lie against him. It is next to an impossibility, although not entirely impossible. These are the two ways. Now why not have the other mode of doing this—why not let the people select their officers? Let them select them because they wish to have them selected in that way; and the effect would be good, not only upon the people, but upon the judges themselves. They now know that it is almost impossible to remove them; but let the tenure of office be limited, and I think it would operate well—it would meet the wishes of the people, and relieve every difficulty with regard to this subject. For these reasons, I am strongly in favor of this amendment.

Monday,]

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENT, &c. — WOOD — MORTON — HALE — NAYSON.

[July 11th.]

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I rise to make a suggestion, which I do with unfeigned regret and reluctance. I am entirely unwilling, at this stage of our session, to do anything which should seem to delay the progress of business; but, Sir, all seem to agree that this subject came up very unexpectedly at this time; although it may have been very properly called up by me, yet members of the Convention, were somewhat taken by surprise. All the gentlemen who have expressed an opinion upon this subject have said, that it was one of very great importance. Some gentlemen, to my knowledge, deem it the most important subject which can come before this Convention during its session; and nearly or quite every gentleman who has spoken upon this subject, either upon one side or the other, has said that he was compelled to speak without that preparation, that deliberation and that arrangement of his ideas which are important to a proper discussion of a subject. About one-half of the Committee on the Judiciary are either absent or unable to address the Convention at this time; and I believe that nearly or quite every one of those who were very desirous of making an argument against this proposition, are either absent or unable to speak at the present time. I am constrained, therefore, to suggest, in their behalf, the propriety and the expediency of postponing this subject to some future day. I ask nothing upon my own account, but I feel that it is due to other members of the Committee with whom I am associated, to ask that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Wednesday next, at ten o'clock, and that it be made the special assignment for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Amendments of the Constitution.

Mr. NAYSON, of Amesbury, moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the resolves reported by the Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to Amendments and Enrolment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Griswold, for Erring, in the chair, and proceeded to consider the said resolves, which were read.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question pending to be on the motion of Mr. Hale, of Bridgewater, to strike out the second resolve.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. On the occasion when this subject was before the Committee, the other day, it was in the afternoon, and very few members were present. I then made a few remarks, stating briefly the reasons which induced me to make this motion. The subject now comes up before a fuller Committee, and I hope I shall be pardoned, if I restate very briefly the object which I have in view in proposing this amendment. The principle reason is, that it is entirely unnecessary. It seems to me intended to meet the case, that if the legislature in the year 1873, should fail or, refuse to comply with the express provision of the Constitution, then the sense of the people may be taken without the subject being submitted to them by the legislature; and reference was made to the circumstances, under the Constitution of 1780, when the time passed by and the people did not act upon the provision of that Constitution for calling a Convention in a particular year. But, by reference to the first resolution it will be perceived that the contingency is already provided for. The legislature, in any year, are authorized, by the first resolution, to submit that question to the people either before or after the year 1873. Therefore, it seems to me to be entirely unnecessary to have this second resolution inserted into the Constitution. I consider it unwise to insert any provision into the Constitution but those which may be absolutely necessary. At the same time, it is implying that the legislature may refuse to comply with the express provision of the Constitution. I do not wish to put anything into the Constitution which shall convey such an imputation as that.

Besides, it seems to me very imperfect. It is to be done merely by notice from the secretary of State. The resolution provides, that when the legislature shall fail to submit to the people the question of calling a Convention, the qualified voters in State elections in the several cities and towns may, at the next general election thereafter, and upon notice of such failure by the secretary of the Commonwealth, proceed to vote upon the said question. They may or may not, as they choose. Suppose, for instance, that one-half of the towns should vote, and the other half should not; is the governor then to issue his proclamation for the calling of that Convention? There are many amendments to the Constitution proposed, imposing duties upon the legislature; but in no one that I know of, has there been any provision, nor has any disposition been manifested to have a provision, that in case the legislature should not comply with the duty assigned them, other steps should then be taken to supply the deficiency. I do not think that it is expedient that the question of revising the Constitution should be submitted to the people very often—certainly not every year. If the legislature on this particular year fails to present the question to the people, as here provided in the first resolution, and the people desire to have the question submitted to them, and desire the calling of a Convention, they will, in all probability, elect a legislature who will present the question to them. I therefore think, that it is entirely unnecessary to have any provision made for the anticipated failure or neglect of the legislature to perform their duty.

Mr. NAYSON. I would inquire of the Chair whether an amendment is in order at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out the second resolution. An amendment will be in order, if it be desired to perfect the part to be stricken out.

Mr. NAYSON, of Amesbury. When this subject was under discussion the other day, it was objected to the second resolution by the gentleman from Boston, that it failed to provide for the basis of a Convention, which, it was presumed, might be called in case the legislature should fail to perform the duty prescribed to them by the Constitution. Although this subject was fully considered by the Committee in order to prevent any misconception on the matter, I have consulted with several members of the Committee, since then, and now offer the following amendment. At the end of the resolve, add the following words:—

The said delegates to be chosen in the same manner, and in the same proportion, as the representatives to the general court are by this Convention directed to be chosen.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the Committee is on the motion to strike out. But it is in order first to amend, and the proposition of the gentleman from Amesbury is, therefore, in order.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

The question now recurred on the motion to strike out the resolution as amended.

Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln. I understand that the question is on striking out the second resolution as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope that that resolution will prevail. I was opposed to this resolution in the Committee, and I am opposed to it still. It seems to me, in the first place, that there is no rule or precedent for this in any other part of the Constitution, or in any Constitution of other States. You propose that the legislature shall,

Monday,]

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENT. — WHEELER — WILSON — NAYSON — HALLETT.

[July 11th.

before they enter upon the discharge of their duties, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and of the State of Massachusetts, and you propose, also, to submit to the people, twenty years afterwards, whether they will call a Convention to revise the Constitution you are now making. Then, by the second resolution, it is proposed to provide, that if the legislature in 1873, should evade or refuse to comply with this provision, some other officer—the secretary of State, I believe—shall perform it. Sir, this seems to me to be not only wholly unnecessary, but somewhat absurd. If this provision is to prevail, why not also incorporate one in the Constitution, providing that in case the legislature should neglect or refuse to pass wholesome and necessary laws, some other power shall take upon itself that responsibility, and pass such laws? That if our judges of courts should refuse or neglect to enforce the laws of the Commonwealth when they are appealed to for that purpose, some other power shall take their place and perform the neglected duties of these judges? Or that if the governor of the State should neglect or refuse to perform the duties which the Constitution devolves upon him, some other officer shall perform these duties? It seems to me, Sir, that such provision would be just as sensible and proper as the provision contained in this second resolution. You might just as well provide that, if the legislature should refuse to pass laws, a Convention should be called to pass them; that if your judges should refuse to enforce your laws, that duty should fall upon your sheriffs, or that, if the people of the Commonwealth should refuse or neglect to elect a governor, then that functionary should be chosen by your justices of the peace.

Sir, I am also opposed to this resolution on the ground that it implies what appears to me to be a very unwise distrust of your legislative assemblies. It is not courteous, to say the least of it. And, more than that, I am not quite of the opinion that all the wisdom, either of the past or the future, is to be found in this Convention, and that when it finally adjourns, all honesty, and truth, and patriotism, will die with it. Gentlemen seem to think that this Convention, in point of patriotism and wisdom, is as much above all future legislatures to be chosen by the people, as generals in the army are, in point of rank, above corporals. This is a sentiment in which I cannot participate, however much it may be indulged in by others. Even if you grant, that at the expiration of twenty years the legislature might fail to perform this duty, why then the legislature assembling the next year after that, or in any subsequent year, would have the power to perform it, seeing that the power to call a Convention rests with the people; so that if the legislature should continue to neglect, the people will still have the remedy in their own hands; and in this respect the provisions of the present Constitution are more liberal than those of 1778.

But, Sir, if all this neglect should arise, the same thing could only happen which has happened before; and when the people are fully prepared for a change, and convinced of the necessity of it, the demand will be made; and, having in themselves all power, that demand will be answered in conformity with their desires. Now, if this Convention should succeed in framing a Constitution which will be perfectly satisfactory to the people of the Commonwealth for the next twenty years, I think they will have wisdom enough to elect such legislators as will not refuse or neglect to perform their duties.

For these reasons, and especially on the ground that it implies an unwise and unnecessary distrust of the legislative branch of the government, and regarding it as being wholly unnecessary, I was opposed to the resolution when it was under consideration by the Committee on Amendments, and I trust that it will be stricken out.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I have read these resolves as reported by my friend from Amesbury, (Mr. Nayson,) and I am satisfied that the first resolution is all that is necessary for us to pass. The proposition contained in the first resolution is this, that in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also, at such other times, preceding or succeeding the above-named year, as the legislature may by law prescribe, the question—“Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and amend the same?”—shall be submitted to the qualified voters in State elections; and, in case a majority of the same thus voting, shall decide in favor of a Convention for such purpose, the legislature, at its next session, shall prescribe by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

Now, I do not think that the second resolution is necessary in order to carry off the first one, because, in the year 1873, and in every twentieth year afterwards, it is not for the legislature to put the question to the people, but the Constitution itself does so. I would therefore prefer to have the first resolution stand, and to have the second and third ones stricken out. That is all that we wish, and I believe that such a course will meet with the general approbation of the Convention.

In regard to specific amendments, I prefer the Constitution as it now stands to the plan proposed. A majority of the Senate and two-thirds of the House of Representatives for two successive years, may propose specific amendments to the people. I think that is better than this third resolution, which allows a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives to propose these amendments to the people. I propose that the legislature shall have very little to do in regard to future amendments of the Constitution. I would allow the legislature the power of making specific amendments on some points of no great interest, but I would not allow a bare majority of the Senate and House of Representatives to do it. I, therefore, am clearly of opinion that we had better strike out the second and third resolutions, and have a Convention every twenty years, or as often as the legislature may think proper to put the question to the people, the people concurring therein; and allow the Senate and members of the House of Representatives of two successive legislatures to submit specific amendments to the people. I again repeat the hope that the Convention will strike out these two last resolutions, because I think that the first will answer every necessary purpose. I like the first resolution very much; but I think the others are wholly unnecessary.

Mr. NAYSON. It is to me a matter of entire indifference what disposition the Committee may make of the resolves now under consideration. They were canvassed before the Committee on Amendments as honestly and faithfully as under the circumstances it was possible for them to be. They were fully considered—the whole matter, in all its bearings; and knowing the anxiety of a majority of this Convention to institute some measure which would hereafter prevent all possibility of doubt or cavil as to calling future Conventions, the Committee gave the question their most serious attention, and it was thought necessary that we should provide for the case of the neglect or refusal of the legislature to put the question to the people in 1873; and hence this second resolve was drafted and submitted to the Convention. If, however, the Committee of the Whole should be of the opinion of the gentleman from Natick, that these provisions in the second resolve are unnecessary, and that there will be no probability, on the part of the legislature, of any such contingency in 1873, then the Committee will do as the gentleman from Natick advises: they will strike out this resolution.

As to the third resolve, it was drafted by a gentleman who is not now here, and who unfortunately has not been present at any time when this subject has been discussed. It was adopted in Committee, as I supposed and believed, with entire unanimity, until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Lincoln, (Mr. Wheeler,) a few moments ago. It is, however, entirely in the hands of the Committee, and whatever disposition may be made of it, as I have said, is a matter of indifference to me personally. I hope that such action will be taken as the case requires; and to the wisdom of the Convention, as manifested in its decision, I shall bow with deference.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I think we have now got upon a subject of a great deal more importance in regard to principle, than the Committee seem to be aware of. We are at the very foundation matter of things; and, if there be one subject on which we should act with more caution and deliberateness than another, this appears to me to be the very subject. It has occupied my mind not a little ever since this Convention came into session. Sir, we are now testing the value of our own principles—the method of carrying our principles of popular sovereignty into practice, as this Convention laid down and enforced them in debating the question of the Berlin vacancy, during an early stage of our labors; and it is now for the Convention to say whether it is the right of the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to amend their own Constitution, or whether that right is to be given away. I want the fact distinctly stated. I do not want that either we, or any who are to come after us, shall sit in another Convention in which any member can rise and say, that they sit there merely at the mercy of the legislature, which might at any moment declare them an unconstitutional body; or, at the mercy of any governor of the State, who might disperse them at the point of the bayonet. Yet every gentleman knows that that was the precise condition in which we sat during the whole of the time that this Convention and the legislature of the State were contemporaneously in session, according to the avowal of some of the best judicial minds of the Commonwealth. And that denial of the people's right to hold a Convention without the consent of the legislature, was said to be a legitimate result, and a legal construction of one of the provisions of our present Constitution.

Now, Sir, we have in the existing Constitu-

Monday,]

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENT.—HALLETT.

[July 11th.]

tion two principles laid down; one is in the Bill of Rights, that "the people have an incontestible, unalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government, and to reform, alter, or totally change the same, when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it." That is in the Declaration of Rights; and the practical construction put upon it by some of the leading judicial minds of our State, who politically differ from the majority of this Convention is, that the people have a right to do this only provided the legislature of the State will permit them to do it; but that without that permission, no such right exists.

Now I want this sovereign right made plain, and I desire to say, on that part of the subject, that it has been thoroughly discussed in the Committee on the Bill of Rights, and so far as that Committee is concerned, you can get nothing out of them. They stand still upon the old Blackstone doctrine, that the practical sovereignty is in the government, and not in the people. The question has also been referred to the Committee on Amendments and Enrolments, and I must confess that it appears to me that that Committee have not done very much better than the Committee on the Bill of Rights. They have failed to recognize the right of the people to make or amend their own Constitution, without the consent of the legislature—they come back here and thus report it. Taking, therefore, the Report of this Committee and that of the Committee on the Bill of Rights together, it will be seen that you are put in a position declaratory, that the sovereignty is in the government and not in the people; for if, after the question has been raised here, you leave the Constitution as it has been construed, you exclude the conclusion of any popular right in it to hold Conventions to revise it. And thus we should be practically resolving to undo all we did and said in the "Berlin case." I do not believe that this Convention, or that the Committee mean to do any such thing; and therefore I would have them look carefully to the action of their Committees, both of which, in my judgment, have failed to reach this question.

And what is the question? In the first place, in the Bill of Rights we declare what rights the people have, and not what the legislature has; and therein have laid down, as is well laid down now, that the people have the right to change their own government. This provision has failed to produce its effect. It was in danger of being subverted. We have just escaped that, and now are called upon to change the Constitution in that regard. We are forewarned now, and we should do precisely as a principal would, whose agent had exceeded his power of attorney, or threatened to eject his principal, when he comes to the question of revoking that power, or giving a new one. He takes care to limit his agent expressly upon the particular point in question. So we must limit the legislature upon this question, that they may not undertake to interfere with the rights of the people to exercise the privilege of holding Conventions to reform their Constitution without being threatened with the bayonet, or with legislative repeal.

The other proposition before us regarding the mode in which the Constitution shall be amended, by a proposition coming from the legislature, refers to the power to be given to the legislature for that purpose, and therein the people are to say just what the legislature may do concerning this question—and in this respect the proposition is a proper one—as to what powers the legislature shall have in calling a Convention.

The first proposition provides that the question shall be submitted, by an act of the legislature, to the people, whether they will have a Convention once in twenty years; and in case a majority shall decide in favor of a Convention, then the legislature, at its next session, shall prescribe the manner of the election of delegates to such convention. Now that leaves the matter entirely with the legislature, to act or not, as they see fit, and I do not believe that my friend from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) will, on reflection, consent to leave that power, which belongs to the people, unrestricted in the hands of the legislature, because the legislature may, without any penalty whatever, refuse to submit this question to the people. How was it in regard to the first Constitution of 1780? If anybody can find out how the votes of the people upon that question were obtained, I should like to see the historical facts in regard to it. Though we know that the Constitution was adopted in 1780, yet when, in 1795, fifteen years afterwards, it was required that it should be submitted to the people, something or other was in the way, and it was so contrived that a majority of the people had no voice in that matter. And now it is assumed, from this neglect of the people, that they have given away all power forever to amend their Constitutions, without asking the consent of the government. And that is what the legislatures of 1873 and '93 will do if they do not choose to have a Convention; and therein, if the first resolution passes in this form, the second is extremely important, though I should prefer a different form. I wish the attention of the gentleman from Natick for a moment, in order that he may see whether, upon a re-examination of the subject, he is willing to leave the power unrestricted with the legislature, to say whether the people shall have a convention or not; or whether he will not rather leave it to the people, under a constitutional law, that shall execute itself? From this source has arisen the trouble from the beginning, between the people and the government, and therefore this second resolve is an important one, if we adhere to this as the best form; because it declares that in case of a failure by the legislature, and upon official notice of that fact, the people shall proceed to vote upon the question, in precisely the same manner as if the legislature had propounded it to them. That is a proper reservation of power. If the legislature fails to do it, the people should spontaneously do it. But under the existing doctrine, if the legislature fails to put the proposition to the people, the people cannot get at it in any way at all, so as to collect and enforce their own will—because we are told that if we hold a meeting illegally, without the authority of the legislature, or against it, we are a riotous assembly, and the governor, the justices of the peace, or the mayor, can call out the militia, read the riot act, and thus we are put in the condition of rebels. And if the people, being a large majority, muster a larger force than can be thus easily disposed of by the local authorities, or the volunteer militia, and the governor happens to be opposed to us, he sends off to the president of the United States, a case of domestic violence, which requires only his word for it, and down comes upon us the whole military and naval power of the United States, if the president happens to be of the same party with the governor.

Now, Sir, I want to get away from such a state of thralldom, and put this matter in such a condition that if the legislature shall not make a proper provision in regard to calling and holding a convention, the people shall have some remedy of their own, which is practical and peaceful, and some mode of collecting the votes upon the question. And upon the point of making reservations in this respect, we have the wisdom and experience of ages, and we ought never to depart from it. I want to read what Jefferson himself says in relation to the right and duty of making amendments to a constitution. I will take a very remarkable passage found in the selection of his "cabinet opinions" in Rayner's Life of Jefferson, p. 377. Speaking of the elder age, he says:—

*"We have not yet penetrated to the mother principle, that 'governments are republican only in proportion as they embody the will of the people, and execute it.' Hence our first Constitutions had really no principle in them. Though we may say with confidence, that the worst of the American Constitutions is better than the best which ever existed before in any other country, and they are wonderfully perfect for a first essay, yet every human essay must have defects. It will remain, therefore, to those now coming on the stage of public affairs, to perfect—what has been so well begun by those going off it." * * * "Laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their barbarous ancestors." * * * "Each generation is as independent of the one preceding, as that was of all which had gone before. It has, then, like them, a right to choose for itself, the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness; consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors."*

Again he says:—

"It is now forty years since the Constitution of Virginia was formed. Within that period, two-thirds of the adults then living are now dead. Have, then, the remaining third, even if they had the wish, the right to hold in obedience to their will, and to laws heretofore made by them, the other two-thirds, who, with themselves, compose the present mass of adults? If they have not, who has? The dead? But the dead have no rights. They are nothing; and nothing cannot own something. Where there is no substance there can be no accident. This corporeal globe and everything upon it, belongs to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by their majority. That majority, then, has a right to depute representatives to a Convention, and to make the Constitution what they think will be best for themselves. If this avenue be shut to the call of sufferance, it will make itself heard through that of force, and we shall go on, as other nations are doing, in the endless circle of oppression, rebellion and reformation; and oppression, rebellion, and reformation again; and so on, forever."

Upon that very principle it was, that Mr. Justice Wilson, of the supreme court of the United States, one of the ablest and truest commentators on systems of government we have ever had; whose Lectures on Government are eminently

Monday,

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENT. — HALLETT — HALE.

[July 11th.]

American; declared that the only panacea in politics was the peaceful mode of reforming government by the expression of the will of the majority whenever they desired to give it. I will quote a single passage from his speech in the Pennsylvania Convention, on adopting the United States Constitution, in 1787.

"Oft have I viewed with silent pleasure and admiration, the force and prevalence, through the United States, of this principle, that the supreme power resides in the people, and that they never part with it. It may be called the panacea in politics. There can be no disorder in the community, but may here receive a radical cure. If the error be in the legislature, it may be corrected by the Constitution; if in the Constitution, it may be corrected by the people. There is a remedy, therefore, for every distemper in government, if the people are not wanting to themselves. For a people wanting to themselves there is no remedy; from their power there is no appeal; to their error there is no superior principle of correction."—Works of James Wilson, LL. D., vol. iii. 293.

Now we come to the simple question, 'How shall you collect the will of the majority?' In that is the only difficulty. Those who are in favor of a high toned government say you shall not collect that will but by the consent of the legislature, and therefore those who hold the power in the legislature can control the people. Now, I want a distinct provision to guard against that, and I want it put in such form as precisely to say to the legislature what power the people mean to delegate to them to touch the Constitution; and then I want a proposition brought in here in connection with this Report, that shall definitely secure the right to the people themselves to collect their own will, and put it in force, if the legislature will not do it; and thus practically carry out what I am sure we have maintained, and well sustained, in the argument upon that point, of the right of the people to reform their own government.

In the earliest period of our history, even before our own Declaration of Independence was made, we had one of the best commentaries upon this very question, in a work by James Burgh. After reviewing and refuting the then recent doctrine of Judge Blackstone, that the sovereignty was in parliament—the legislature—he said:—

"As the people are the fountain of power and object of government, so are they the last resource when governors betray their trust. And happy is a people who have originally so principled their Constitution, that they themselves can, without violence to it, lay hold of its power, wield it as they please, and turn it when necessary, against those to whom it was intrusted, and who have exerted it to the prejudice of its original proprietors."

These "Political Disquisitions" of Dr. Burgh are the most remarkable productions on government of that day. They were republished in Philadelphia in 1775, by Robert Bell, under the immediate patronage of Washington, Jefferson, Hancock, Wilson, Thompson, Sullivan, Dean, Rush, and the continental worthies. In them the doctrines of Blackstone, which gave all power of sovereignty to the parliament, were completely refuted. On this point of the people reserving the power of amending Constitutions, Dr. Burgh says:—

"In planning a government by representation, the people ought to provide against their own annihilation. They ought to establish a regular and constitutional method of acting by and from themselves, without, or even in opposition to their representatives, if necessary. Our ancestors, therefore, were provident, but not provident enough. They set up parliament as a curb on kings and ministers, but they neglected to reserve to themselves a regular and constitutional method of exerting their power in curbing parliaments when necessary."—Political Disquisitions, vol. iii. 6.

That was a prophetic declaration for that period, and one which ought to be adopted and ingrafted into every constitution.

Now, to bring these remarks to a direct point. I want to put into the Constitution an amendment which shall say how much power the legislature shall have to propose amendments or conventions, and how much shall be left to the people independent of the action of the legislature; a power which shall enable the people to act in case the legislature refuses to act. For those reasons, I am in favor of the first and second resolutions as they are reported by the Committee, unless I can find a provision more direct and explicit. Then, having disposed, Mr. Chairman, of the principle contained in the two first resolutions, which is, in substance, for that is what we want, that a convention may be called whenever the legislature see fit to call one, and that they shall call such a convention once in twenty years; and if they refuse to do it, the people may call the convention themselves; then comes the third proposition, and to that I ask the attention of the Committee. It proposes to amend the present mode of making amendments to the Constitution by authorizing the majority of the legislature to send out propositions of amendments to the people for their adoption. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that amendment, and for the reason that I think the legislature generally a very poor body to amend or make a constitution. I had much rather that a constitution should be made or amended by a convention. Nevertheless, I admit that there are occasions—but they are rare ones, and ought to be rare ones—in which it is desirable that the legislature may have the power to propose amendments and send them out to the people. Now, how much power shall they have, is the question. Shall they have the power to do so by a bare majority, or shall we require a two-thirds vote? The present Constitution requires a vote of two-thirds of the House, and a majority of the Senate; and it further requires that proposed amendments shall be approved of by two successive legislatures. That is, the amendments shall be proposed by one legislature, and then that they shall lay over a whole year, during which time the people will determine whether they will send back to the legislature representatives who are in favor of the amendments, and who will again recommend them to the people.

Here I stand upon somewhat of a conservative ground, and I ask whether the power which the legislature now possess is not as much as is necessary to give them, in the matter of amendments to the Constitution? True, no one proposes to authorize the legislature to amend the Constitution without consulting the people; but if you give them the power to propose amendments by a majority, they will be constantly harassing the people with amendments. What will be the result of such an arrangement? If the legislature shall happen to be Whig, they will commence proposing one amendment after another, according to some peculiar views they may entertain. The very first proposition they would make to the people, would be to abolish the secret ballot which we have determined upon; and although they may fail the first year and the next, they will continue to harass the people, year after year, in the hopes that by finally wearying them out, they will succeed in removing it from the Constitution.

On the other hand,—for I do not think one party will differ very much from the other party in that respect,—if you have a Democratic legislature, they will find some features in the Constitution which they dislike, and they will send out propositions of amendment to the people in the same manner.

I am opposed to so great a facility of change. The Constitution should not be a repealable statute. I do not want the Constitution to be fixed in the position that Lycurgus placed his when he made laws for Sparta, and then provided that the laws should not be changed until he returned, and then went off to Delphi, and put himself out of the way, and never came back, thereby hoping to preserve the constitution forever and ever. But the constitution was soon departed from, and Sparta lost her glory and her power, and was absorbed in the Roman Empire. Neither would I have it as John Randolph proposed to have the Constitution of Virginia, in the Convention of 1838, which was, that there should be put into the Constitution no power by which the legislature could ever propose alterations, because he wanted the Constitution unalterable for at least fifty years.

Upon that suggestion, the old Constitution of Virginia had no provision for its own amendment, and the only power of changing it, was that recognized in its Bill of Rights, "a majority of community."

For these reasons, I am in favor of striking out the third resolution, which will leave the question in relation to legislative amendments precisely as it stands in the present Constitution. I do not think it is prudent or desirable that the legislature should have any more power, in that respect, than they now possess. Having done that, I hope to see another provision which shall secure to the people the right to vote for a convention, whether the legislature will it or not, and that we shall thus set an example to all free people to provide in their frame of government for a peaceful mode of change, by collecting the will of the people or holding conventions, without the power or possibility of the legislature, should it be in the hands of a party or of a minority, defeating that will."

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. The gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) seems to have overlooked, or very slightly touched upon an important provision in the first resolution—I mean that which gives the legislature power, in any year, to submit to the people the question whether they will have a Convention to revise the Constitution of the State or not. Now an emergency can hardly be supposed to exist, requiring a revision of the Constitution, when a legislature could not be elected by the people within two or three years, which would submit the question to them. I think such a contingency could not happen, but if it should, the gentleman for Wilbraham seems to suppose the second resolution is quite adequate to protect the people from the legislature. Now I would ask, if it is any more safe to trust the secretary of State and the governor, than it is the legislature. If I understand this resolution, it provides, that before the people may act upon the expediency of calling a Convention, the secretary of State must notify the people that the legislature have failed to comply with the provisions of the Constitution, in presenting the question to them. But, suppose the secretary of State should refuse or neglect to give that notice, what then? Are the people authorized to vote at their regular town meetings, or at their annual elections, without such notice? Certainly not. It seems to me, therefore, that you are relying entirely upon the secretary of State, to supply the omission or failure of the legislature to do their duty.

Monday,]

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENT.—HALE—WHITNEY—GILES.

[July 11th.]

But, suppose the secretary of State should give the notice, and the governor should not issue any proclamation for a Convention, what then? Would the people go on, and elect their delegates and send them here, without any action upon the part of the governor, required in this resolution, being had? It seems to me there is no provision in this second resolution, that would give them that authority which the gentleman for Wilbraham seems to think they should have. I think it will be very difficult to call a Convention for the revision of the Constitution of the State, without some preliminary steps being taken upon the part of some branch of the government itself. I do not see how it can be done without some detail, some legal provision upon which the people are to act, except by revolution, and that may be accomplished without incorporating any provision into the Constitution to provide for it. They must have some prescribed form of action, before it will be possible to call a Convention by any constitutional process.

As to the third resolution, I do not think it is as good as the provision in the present Constitution. But I am really opposed to the second, and I hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I do not rise, at this late hour, for the purpose of discussing these resolutions, but to say, with all due deference to the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) I am compelled to differ in opinion with him, as to the relative importance of these resolutions. I believe this last resolution to be a very important one—and why? It provides, that a majority of the two branches of the legislatures of two successive years, may submit specific amendments to the people, which, even after such submission, cannot become a part of your constitutional law until a majority of the people have passed upon them affirmatively. And why should not such amendments then, become a part of your Constitution? After two successive legislatures, elected by a majority of the people, in their wisdom, submit an amendment, and the voice of a majority of the voters of the Commonwealth, in their primary meetings is obtained, favoring that amendment, I contend that it should then, in every case, become part of your constitutional law, and when that voice is legally obtained, will any gentleman tell me why such amendment should not then be considered a part of the Constitution? Sir, I think, in all reason, this third resolution should be retained.

In relation to the second resolution, I was in hopes the gentleman for Wilbraham, with all his knowledge of constitutional law, would have submitted an amendment which should carry out the idea which he seems to have advocated, and, I think, with much ability. I have not prepared any amendment to accomplish that result, but I hope some gentleman, better able to do it, will prepare one which shall recognize the right of the people, at all times, by a majority of the votes in the Commonwealth, legally expressed, to call a Convention for the revision of the Constitution of the State. I suppose the gentleman for Wilbraham will not contend that we can confer power upon the people, any more than the legislature can do it. For we met here, merely as the representatives of the people, and we cannot, by any resolution of ours, confer power upon the sovereign people. We can recognize their right, at all times, to assemble, and reform or alter, or make over, their Constitution. But we can no more confer power upon the people than the legislature can. I should prefer, therefore, an amendment to this second resolution, recognizing distinctly, the right of the people, at all times, to assemble by their delegates, properly chosen, for the purpose of reforming their Constitution; and, without such a recognition, I see no virtue in this resolution at all.

The first resolve provides, that the legislature shall submit, at certain specific times, and also at such other times, preceding or succeeding the above-named year, as the legislature may, by law, prescribe, the question, "Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and to amend the same?" Now, I take it, if you provide that the legislature may, by a majority of its members, submit that question, there will be no difficulty in relation to it. There will be no danger that you will not have the question submitted to you, whenever you want it. The trouble in getting specific amendments, which resulted in calling this Convention, was not that questions were not agitated in the legislature; they have been agitated in that body, for the last four or five years; questions were agitated in 1851 and 1852, and passed one house, and obtained majorities in the other, but in consequence of failing to receive a vote of two-thirds in the House of Representatives, as was required by the Constitution, they could not be submitted. If these questions could have been submitted to the people, by the vote of a majority of both Houses of the legislature, there would have been no difficulty in relation to some alterations. This subject is somewhat a new one to me. I had not examined it, until it came up for consideration to-day. But I hope the third resolution will be retained. The second I consider of little importance, and I do not think it is a matter of any considerable consequence, whether it is retained or not. I cannot see that it will do any good, in its present form, and I should much rather see a provision adopted, recognizing the right of the people to meet at all times, when, by a majority of their votes, they elect so to do, such votes being legally given, I would then make it the duty of the legislature to provide for the choice of delegates for the purpose of revising the Constitution.

I hope that the gentleman for Wilbraham will prepare and offer an amendment to these resolutions, more perfectly expressing his idea and my own, and that something more directly to the point may be presented for our action and final adoption.

Mr. GILES, of Boston. I am in favor of the first resolution, and opposed to the second and third. I wish to see the second and third resolutions stricken out and the first adopted. In regard to amending the Constitution by legislatures, as the gentleman proposes, I am opposed to it. I think the provision in our present Constitution, authorizing amendments to be made by the legislature, was introduced for this object. When the Convention had settled all the great principles and established all the great leading propositions in your Constitution, and those principles and propositions came to be applied to the wants and exigencies of the State, as a matter of course it turns out that certain minor provisions are necessary in the course of events to enable your great fundamental principles to take effect readily and effectually, and it is therefore provided in our present Constitution that such provisions may be made or rather initiated by the legislature, with a view to meet a specific want which appears in the course of time, but was not foreseen by the Convention making the Constitution. That is to say, the principle is this: the Convention makes the machine, but not being able to foresee all the impediments to its safe and easy action, it gives the engineer the power to carry out the great principles upon which the machine is constructed, and to remove such impediments as shall arise. Now, Sir, I would confine the legislature, in amending the Constitution, to that class of exigencies—to those which arise, in the course of events, which have not been foreseen and provided for—which are wanted to carry out the great principles established in the Constitution, but which are hardly of sufficient importance to make it worth while to call a Convention. I would make a broad distinction between the action of the legislature, which is an agent, a mere creature of the people, and the action of a Convention, which comes directly from the people, for the express purpose of making a Constitution. I would hold the great provisions of your Constitution sacred, so to speak, and not subject to amendment and alteration at the mere whim or caprice of your legislature, like the laws which I have known to be repealed before the session in which they were enacted had closed. I would establish your Constitution as the "blue book" of laws in the estimation and confidence of the people; and for this reason I would make it as permanent as possible until the people see fit to call another Convention to alter and revise it. And this brings me to say, with my friend for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) that I am one of those who believe in the inalienable right of the people to amend their Constitution whenever they please; and I therefore do not feel the need of a declaration to that effect in the Constitution, so much as some gentlemen seem to, because I believe it is a right which we can neither give to the people nor take from them. No convention or legislature can do any such thing as that. But if it is thought desirable to insert into the Constitution a declaration which shall effectually take it out of the power of the legislature or any other body to prevent the people from calling another Convention when they shall think proper, I have no objection, and I will go with any man who will make such a proposition. But to do that we must incorporate

Tuesday,]

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENT, &c. — GILES — NAYSON — HALLETT — KNOWLTON.

[July 12th.

into our Constitution a convention electoral law; that is to say, a provision upon which and by which the people may, by their own motion, without any preliminary steps upon the part of the legislature, and independent of that body, proceed to elect delegates to alter and amend their Constitution."

But by this second resolution as it now stands, if the legislature fails to provide for submitting the question to the people, it becomes the duty of the secretary of State to notify the people, and they may go on and elect delegates. But suppose the secretary of State declines to give that notice, the people cannot go on and elect their delegates without; so that you would still leave them at the mercy of the legislature, or what is worse, at the mercy of an executive officer of your government. Now your object is to take the people out of the power of the government, in other words, it is your object to let every-body know that it is the people who have the power of calling a Convention whenever they choose, and that the power does not rest with the legislature or secretary of State.

Now if you wish to provide against that difficulty, and forever secure that right in the hands of the people, I repeat, you must incorporate in your Constitution a convention electoral law, so that the question shall go to the people whenever it may be desirable, whether the legislature will or not. But I would alter the phraseology of this second resolution, because it does not, as it seems to me, accomplish the object for which it is designed. If the gentleman for Wilbraham wishes to attain his object, I can see no objection to it, and I will go with him for attaining it if he deems it important.

I call the gentleman's attention to the phraseology of the first resolution. The question is printed in italics—"Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution and to amend the same?" That question is to be "submitted to the qualified voters of the State," says the resolution. Submitted by whom? By the legislature. But the next resolution says that in case the legislature fail to submit it, the secretary of State shall submit it. But suppose he fails, then what? You may provide, if you choose, that your town officers shall act, but if they fail, the people are still unable to have the question submitted to them.

Mr. NAYSON, of Amesbury, (interrupting). I would ask the gentleman from Boston, if in case the emergency should happen that the legislature should fail to provide for submitting the question to the people, the remedy according to his own admission, would not be found in that declaration of principles which gives the people the right and power at all times, to alter, control and change their government, and whether by making the declaration which he proposes, he could accomplish any purpose which is not already accomplished in that section of the Bill of Rights, which, as I understand, it is the purpose of the Convention to retain?

Mr. GILES. I agree with the gentleman so far as that declaration is concerned. I was expressing my willingness to go with the gentleman for Wilbraham in the accomplishment of the object he had expressed a desire to accomplish. I shall go for this first resolution as it stands.

But why I am not content with simply this declaration in the Bill of Rights, is that it is merely a declaration that certain things are right, and certain things are wrong. It contains a law which is written in every man's heart as well as in the Bill of Rights. But that law is inoperative, unless every citizen, of his own free will, chooses to obey it, and that is the reason why we have special laws to carry out the Bill of Rights, and to enable the people to carry into effect the great principles therein contained. And therefore it is that the declaration in the Bill of Rights does not go far enough for this purpose.

I would amend this first resolution in one or two particulars. Instead of saying, "shall be submitted to the qualified voters in State elections," I would say "shall be voted upon by the qualified voters in State elections."

And in case the legislature should fail to submit the question to the people, I would make some alteration in the next resolution. Instead of saying "the qualified voters in State elections, in the several cities and towns may, at the next general election thereafter," I would say "shall, at the next general election thereafter, proceed to elect delegates for that purpose, in the same manner as the representatives are annually chosen to the general court."

You would obtain by that amendment just exactly what the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) wants, and you would enact in your Constitution a fundamental law for the election of delegates to a Convention, by which the people, whenever the legislature fails, may every twenty years proceed, of their own mere motion, to have a Convention according to the Constitution, peaceably and without violence, and without the power in the legislature, or any department of government, to send bayonets here to drive them out of the hall belonging to themselves and their fathers.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I most heartily concur in the suggestion which the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Giles,) has just made in the matter of construction, and I think it covers precisely the ground, that is to say, it makes the submission of this question to the people, once in twenty years, a fixed constitutional provision, requiring no laws in regard to it, and that it shall be voted upon by the qualified electors once in twenty years, without reference to party. The only difficulty that remains is in relation to the power of calling the Convention within the period of twenty years. I do not want to tie the people down so that they shall only have a Convention once in twenty years, if they desire one oftener. So far as the submission of the question to the people every twenty years, is concerned, the amendment offered covers the whole ground, and I should be glad to hear a suggestion from the gentleman with regard to calling a Convention within twenty years.

Mr. GILES, of Boston. The law with an amendment in two words can be made active, living and effectual at all times. There may be an addition to the first resolution of the following words: "as often as the legislature shall so provide." It is impossible, as the chairman will see, to effect this by the amendment we now have before us, because it involves striking out a part of two resolutions. I heartily agree with the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) in the idea that the people should have the power of calling a Convention whenever they please, but I would hardly wish to call it in question by asserting it. It is one of those things which I look upon as being as clear as the light of the sun, and which needs no provision here to make it plain and palpable. If it would be in order now, I would move the amendment I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon striking out the second resolution.

Mr. GILES. I see it is impossible to present it now. I have expressed my views, briefly, in relation to this matter, and should be happy to concur with the gentleman for Wilbraham in carrying them out, if agreeable to the Committee.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater, moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee rose and reported to

THE CONVENTION,

And obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. PARSONS, of Sandisfield, the Convention then adjourned until to-morrow at nine o'clock.

TUESDAY, July 12, 1853.

The Convention assembled, pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President at nine o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Harvard University.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester, from the Committee on the University at Cambridge, made the following Report:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 12, 1853.

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to the University at Cambridge, to whom was referred the order of May 19, concerning the comparative amounts of public grants and private donations to the several colleges in the Commonwealth, report the following communications received respectively from the treasurer of Harvard College, the treasurer of Williams College, and the treasurer of Amherst College.

For the Committee,

J. S. C. KNOWLTON, Chairman.

Communications from the Treasurers of Amherst, Williams, and Harvard Colleges.

[A.]

Amherst, June 25, 1853.

DEAR SIR:—In reply to your letter of the —th, enclosing a copy of an order adopted in the Constitutional Convention, on the 19th May last, inquiring into the sources of the benefactions to Harvard College, and asking me to furnish the Committee with the information in regard to Amherst College, required by the order in relation to Harvard.

I will say, that by a resolve of the legislature, approved on the 7th April, 1847, an annual allowance of $5,000 for five years, $25,000, was made to Amherst College, for the use of the college.

This is the only grant ever made by the State. All the residue of the donations or benefactions to the college, has been from private sources.

Yours respectfully,

EDWARD DICKINSON,
Treasurer Amherst College.

Hon. J. S. C. Knowlton, Chairman Com., &c.

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS, &c. — WALKER — GREENE.

[July 12th.

[B.]

Williams College, June 27, 1853.

Hon. J. S. C. Knowlton, Chairman, &c.

SIR:—In answer to the request of the Committee, I make the following statement:—

The grants made by the legislature in the first year of this institution, were used chiefly in the erection of college buildings; the principal building thus erected was destroyed by fire, and, after an unsuccessful effort with the legislature, benevolent individuals furnished the means of new accommodations for students. The grant made from the bank tax in the year —, was used to sustain the college through a series of years when the number of students was small, owing to the question of removal. The only "present property and available instrumentalities of education" which I can trace to "direct grants from the legislature," is $7,500, one-fourth of the last grant made, the income of which is annually applied to the bills of indigent students; and about $8,000, the avails of land in Maine. The residue of our small fund, $35,000, has been given by individuals. The real estate, now worth say $35,000, consisting of buildings and land for the use of students, and one dwelling-house for the president, I cannot trace to the legislature. The libraries and apparatus have been procured by the donations of the friends of the college, and charges upon students. The college has not had income sufficient to meet its expenses, for many of the years during which it has existed. For a few years past, the liberality of one man has furnished the means of living, but much more is needed to meet the demands of this progressive age.

Respectfully yours,

DANIEL N. DEWEY, Treasurer.

[C.]

July 7, 1853.

Hon. J. S. C. Knowlton.

DEAR SIR:—I should have replied sooner to your note, covering the order of the Convention in relation to Harvard College, but for my absence from town on account of my health.

I have now the honor to state, that "of the present property and available instrumentalities of education possessed by Harvard College," all that can "be traced to direct grants of the legislature," is the following items, viz.: A grant for the erection of Massachusetts Hall, in 1718–19, £2,850 sterling, equal to $12,654. Several grants in 1762–3, for building Hollis Hall, £4,815, lawful, $16,050. In 1794, a lottery was granted by the legislature to raise £8,000 for a new building, (Stoughton Hall); and in 1806 another was allowed, for the purpose of erecting another building, (Holworthy Hall). The amount realized from the sale of tickets was $47,400.

In 1764–5–6, £4,112 18s. 7d. were granted to rebuild Harvard Hall, which was burnt while in the occupancy of the legislature, during a college vacation, but no compensation whatever was made for the loss of the library and philosophical instruments, which were also destroyed.

In 1814 a grant was made of ten-sixteenths of a bank tax, or $10,000 per annum for ten years. Of this amount, $2,500 a year was ordered by the legislature to be given to indigent students, equal to $25,000. Another $20,000 was appropriated by the legislature to the erection of the Medical College; and the remainder was spent by the corporation in erecting University Hall. Down to 1786, the legislature of the Colony, the Province, and the State, granted certain sums for the relief of the president and professors; and with an occasional grant of a piece of land, (of which possession was sometimes not obtained,) these constitute all the donations of the government to the institution to the present time. The whole amount received from the State from 1636 to the present time, is $215,797 73 in money, and the annuities of Charles River and West Boston Bridges, £200, or $666 66 per annum, each, of which the former was for many years discontinued, and the latter has not been paid since June, 1846.

I believe these are all the grants of the legislature, of which any portion can be traced in the present property of the college, and they show that a little over a hundred thousand dollars value in the existing resources of the college, has been derived from the State, while the productive resources given by individuals, principally since the Revolution, amounts to about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the reversion of half as much more.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL A. ELIOT,
Treasurer of Harvard College.

The Report and the accompanying documents were laid upon the table.

Qualifications of Voters.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

To consider the Report of the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, which recommends that no action be taken on the subject of the petition of Francis Jackson and others, that the word "male" be stricken from the Constitution and that women be allowed to vote on the amendment to that instrument.

The question being on agreeing to the report,

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. The reasons are given in brief in the Report for the course taken by the Committee in relation to this matter. The Report was agreed to with considerable unanimity by the Committee, and I presume it will be agreed to by this Committee with the like unanimity, and therefore, I deem it unnecessary to make any remarks in relation thereto.

Mr. GREENE, of Brookfield. I maintain, first, that the people have a certain natural right, which, under special conditions of society, manifests itself in the form of a right to vote. I maintain, secondly, that the women of Massachusetts are people existing under those special conditions of society. I maintain, finally, and by necessary consequence, that the women of Massachusetts have a natural right to vote. I am but a recent convert to the doctrine of women's rights, never having meditated upon the matter before the famous question was propounded by our good friend from Salem, (Mr. Lord), "Who are the people?" I have been unable, therefore, to prepare myself with statistics. I know nothing of women's wrongs, and, with the permission of the Committee, will argue the question solely upon abstract and general grounds. I had the honor, when I spoke before, to define the people of Massachusetts as being that collective body, which includes within itself all rational creatures existing within the limits of the Commonwealth. My definition was criticized at the time, on the ground that idiots, madmen, and immature children, are people. Certain gentlemen proposed to bring in petitions from the children of this Commonwealth, praying that children also might be permitted to vote. I adhere to my original statement. The word "people" has a specific and political sense, for not all that are governed are people. Oxen and horses are certainly governed, but they are not people, and that for the reason that dumb creatures are incapable of giving consent to government. No living creature can be recognized as one of the people, if that living creature has not rational faculties by which it can either consent or refuse to become the subject of government. The fundamental doctrine of our republic is this, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Oxen and horses cannot give their consent to government, neither can madmen, idiots, or immature children, give their consent; and, therefore, it follows, on account of this natural incapacity, that none of these can be recognized as people. The people are they upon whom shines that intellectual light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world; and I maintain that women are capable of receiving that intellectual light, are rational creatures, human beings, enjoying all the faculties which belong to human beings. I would call the attention of the Committee, for a moment, before I endeavor to prove the propositions I enunciated at the beginning of my remarks, to certain principles which are generally acknowledged to be correct by the people of this Commonwealth; and in order that I may support no principles, except such as will meet the acceptance of the Committee, I will quote the express words of the Bill of Rights. In the preamble to the Constitution we read:—

"The end of the institution, maintenance and administration of government, is to secure the existence of the body politic; to protect it; and to furnish the individuals who compose it with the power of enjoying in safety and tranquility their natural rights and the blessings of life; and whenever these great objects are not obtained, the people have a right to alter the government, and to take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity and happiness."

I would have the Committee mark that the preamble to the Constitution does not say, that the legal voters shall have the right to "alter the government, and take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity and happiness," but that "the people" have this right. Now, if women are people, (and the Convention have already affirmed, by a solemn vote, that women are people,) they have a right to "alter the government, and take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity and happiness."

We read, in the same preamble, that "the body politic is formed by a voluntary association of individuals; is a social compact, by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good." I do not believe that any body politic was ever formed in this way. I suppose that the social compact is the ideal of human government, and not the origin, and that human government becomes perfect in the proportion that it attains to conformity to this perfect pattern. Acknowledging, however, the statement of the preamble to be the true theory of government—true, at least, in idea—I would ask you what you will do with those two thousand women who have petitioned for the right of voting upon the amendments to the Constitution? You say that the body politic is a social compact, by which you mean that it is the result of a social compact, and you say that "it is a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people." But here are two thousand women who have demanded the right to vote upon the amendments to the Constitution—that is to say, have demanded to enter into this cove-

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.—GREENE.

[July 12th.

nant—what do you propose to do with them? I suppose I shall be obliged to take the stump in favor of the measures that we approve in this Convention. I suppose I shall have to endeavor to defend the course of action upon which we may have entered. And now, Sir, permit me to ask what I shall do when Miss Lucy Stone, who lives about three miles from me, interrupts me in the middle of my speech, by reading from the preamble to the Constitution, that “the body politic is a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good?” She will say that she wants to enter into that covenant; and how can any man vote to refuse the privilege to women of entering into this compact, and at the same time affirm that the social compact is formed by a voluntary association or agreement of the whole people? If any person present can tell me how I can answer that woman upon this point, without confusion of face, he will relieve my mind very much indeed.

We read that the people of this Commonwealth “have the exclusive right of governing themselves.” Can it be denied that women constitute one-half of the population of the State; nay, that they are a majority of the population? If we wish to be consistent, and express our real views in the Constitution, and not insert in it a democratic falsehood by which we cannot stand—I will not say a democratic falsehood, but a democratic truth, which we are to treat as though it were a falsehood—then we ought to say, if we are to deny the women’s rights, that the legal voters, or one-half of the men—one-quarter only of the whole people—have the sole exclusive right of governing themselves and the rest of the people. Our fathers spake otherwise; they said that the PEOPLE of the Commonwealth ought to have the sole exclusive right of governing themselves. What shall I say to Miss Lucy Stone upon this point?

Again: “No man, nor corporation, or association of men, have any other title to obtain advantages, or particular and exclusive privileges, distinct from those of the community, than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public.” I should like any gentleman to state what peculiar and transcendent services have been rendered to the public by legal voters, and I should then like to state certain services which have been rendered by women.

“Government is instituted for the common good; for the protection, safety, prosperity and happiness of the people, and not for the profit, honor or private interest of any one man, family or class of men; therefore, the people alone have an incontestable, unalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government, and to reform, alter, or totally change the same, when their protection, safety, prosperity and happiness require it.”

The women of this Commonwealth are deprived of the right of voting, not only upon ordinary occasions, but of voting upon that occasion which is specially referred to in this article of the Bill of Rights. In the hands of women, as well as in the hands of men, rests the sacred right of revolution. For I maintain that a government that is totally changed, by an immediate, sovereign act of the people, is a government that is revolutionized; but if the people have a right to revolutionize government, then women, as a part of the people, partake in that right:—I am talking of rights, not of mights. If the people have a right to revolutionize government, then they have a right to do it peaceably; for a right that must be exercised by force is no right at all. Whatever act a human being has a perfect right to accomplish, that same act he has a right to accomplish peaceably. I claim that the right of women to concur in the peaceable revolution of government shall be guaranteed to them. For if the people have the right to totally change their government, women, who are people, and whom the Convention have confessed, by an authentic vote, to be people, have a right, to the extent that their numbers would give them power in the government, “to alter the government, and to take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity and happiness.” If we do not give them the right to vote, they have no political power to guarantee their own welfare.

Before I go further, I must notice one statement which has been made upon this question. It was said by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Choate,) whom I do not see in his seat, but it was endorsed by the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) whom I do see in his seat, that the men, the legal voters, are the trustees of women; that the legal people are the trustees of the natural people. I should like to inquire who it was that appointed them to be trustees, and to whom they are responsible for the proper fulfillment of their trust. I would like to say, also, that the autocrat of Russia considers himself as a trustee, having the right to act for his people; for the Emperor Nicholas would argue precisely as the gentleman from Boston argued, except that the gentleman from Boston argued in favor of the legal people of Massachusetts, while the Emperor Nicholas would argue in his own favor, affirming himself to be the incarnation of everything that is Russian.

In the East, it is believed that this earth is an immense plain, and that the four corners are supported upon the backs of four elephants; that the four elephants stand upon the backs of four tortoises, and that these stand upon a great snake; but what the snake stands on, nobody knows. Now, Sir, on what ground of authority do the legal voters stand?

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like, before he proceeds any further, to say that I have not presented any such doctrine as the gentleman has stated, in its sequence; by no means. I undertook to combat, whether successfully or not, the doctrine that the people gave up certain rights which they had the right to exercise, and which they could not resume. My ground was, that we were shadowing forth the great American doctrine; not that the people yielded and gave up rights to their rulers, by any means, but that it was a mere delegation from the people, for a certain time, to those that exercised the power, merely as our agents, and which the people had a right to resume at any time; and that the first delegation of power by the people was to electors.

Mr. GREENE. May I ask the gentleman if he believes in the dogma of the social compact?

Mr. HATHAWAY. I do, Sir.

Mr. GREENE. I congratulate the women upon the accession of so distinguished an advocate to their cause. I suppose the gentleman will go with us in endeavoring to secure to women the right of voting on the proposed amendments to the Constitution. He will perceive that we must now go back to the original fountain of political power. I grant, for the present, that the women gave up their power originally; for I desire not to meet the gentleman half-way, but go the whole way myself, since it is necessary that we should give him a generous welcome, now that he comes out on our side. I will grant that the women gave up their own political power, and put it into the hands of their husbands and fathers. But it is at this very moment of time that the people are going back to the origin of all things, politically—going back to that which underlies the snake on which the earth rests;—and I maintain that the women ought to be consulted in this crisis, to see if they will continue to delegate their political authority to their husbands, brothers and fathers. The Bill of Rights further says:—

“In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments.”

Now, I maintain that a legal voter is “a public officer.” The gentleman from Freetown has shown us that the legal voter has been delegated by the women and non-voting men to exercise a power as a trustee for them; he shows us where the trust came from, from the non-voting people, the natural people. If this trust is committed to the legal voters, then they are public officers; and the people, that is, the women and the non-voting men, have a right, on certain occasions, to make these officers retire to private life, and exercise the trust no longer. Mark the word! “In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right”; the “people,” not the legal-voters, mind you, but the “people.”

Again, Sir: “All elections ought to be free; and all the inhabitants of this Commonwealth” —now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask you, if, in your various travels through the Commonwealth, you were met ever by any of that obscure portion of “its inhabitants” called women. [Laughter.] “All the inhabitants”—I believe inhabitants are those who have a residence. “All the inhabitants of this Commonwealth having such qualifications as they shall establish”—they establish? Who establish?—the legal voters? No, Sir. “Having such qualifications as they (the inhabitants) shall establish by their frame of government.” Now, we are establishing a frame of government; and I ask you by what right you prevent the women from having a voice in the matter. I confess, that after a frame of government is established, and the men have been made the trustees of the women, it may be correct to have the men act for the women. But now we are establishing the foundation itself, upon which the whole superstructure must stand, and the question is, whether you will allow the women to exercise the right of choosing their trustees, or whether you will force trustees upon them in an arbitrary and tyrannical manner?

Sir, I know very well what course the Convention will take in this matter, and I know very well what answers I shall receive, if I receive any. Sir, I call for arguments, not phrases. I profess, Sir, to stand upon democratic ground, and I would like to know how any Democrat can rise up here and say, that he believes the doctrines set forth in the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, and at the same time say that he will deny to women the exercise of their right to vote.

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.—GREENE.

[July 12th.

The gentleman for Berlin, as I understand, proved, while I was absent, the other day, or attempted to prove, that the father of a family has the natural right to govern his wife and children. I think it likely I may misstate his words, as I did not hear them, but I believe the substance of his remarks was as I have said, that the father has a natural right to govern his family. Well, Sir, the autocrat of Russia uses the same argument, affirming that his domination is paternal in its character and principle. The gentleman for Berlin will think further upon this subject of women's rights, and will, I doubt not, reconsider his opinions. I maintain that the father has no right, as such, to exercise political dominion. When we regard the doctrines of government from the point of view of the family relation, we are thrown back upon the old mythus of Adam, and upon the subjugation of Eve to her husband. The sentence upon Eve, as recorded in the book of Genesis, is as follows:—

"In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

Sir, I submit, that if any invention of science can succeed in preventing the pain which attends the coming of a new human being into the world, no sin would be committed by the woman who should adopt that invention, and employ it for the relief of her own suffering. I know that in Scotland, the use of chloroform has been objected to as interfering with the original sentence denounced by the Almighty upon woman. Such objections are, of course, absurd. But if the use of chloroform by women in child-birth be just, innocent, and right, although it obviates one-half the curse of the original sentence, who shall dare to affirm that it is not just, innocent, and right that women should be put in a position to emancipate themselves from the other half of the curse? But, granting the correctness of the argument, that the father has a right to control his family, what shall we do with the women who are over twenty-one years of age, who earn their own living, and are free from their fathers? I take it that such women are entitled to vote, and that they are people.

Now, Sir, I will endeavor to prove, with the precision, though not with the conciseness, perhaps, of a mathematical demonstration, my position that the women of Massachusetts have a natural right to vote. I will trespass upon the patience of the Convention for a few moments, only, and hope I may secure its attention, as I shall be under the necessity of having recourse to an order of ideas not often brought before a body of this kind. I ask every gentleman to weigh, in his own mind, and answer me a few of the questions which I will suggest to him.

Is there not always before us an ideal, a mental picture, if you will, an image, of what we ought to be, and are not? Does not every one who endeavors to follow this ideal revealed to his inward vision, every one who endeavors to attain to conformity with it, find it enlarge itself, and remove from him? Does not he that follows it improve his moral character, the ideal remaining ever above him, and before him, prompting him to new exertions? What is conscience but a comparison of ourselves as we are, mean, pitiful, weak, with ourselves as we ought to be, wise, powerful, holy? What is conscience but a comparison of our actual conduct with our ideal of human perfection? As we make new efforts in striving after the fulness of perfection revealed in our hearts, the ideal removes further and further from us, making higher and higher claims, until, at last, we lose ourselves in the contemplation of the Infinite Majesty; for, in this upward aspiration, there is revealed to us a knowledge of our spiritual existence, and a knowledge of the Most High God. Man is created in the image of God, and it is his duty to bring out into its full splendor that Divine Image which is latent at the bottom of his heart. When a man first recognizes this Divine Ideal, which is the shadow of God, it is to him like the dawning of a new day. As he looks steadfastly, the darkness of his understanding begins to disappear, and the day-star begins to rise in his heart. As he moves forward toward the mark of his desire, subordinating his will to the divine will, he enters into communion and fellowship with God the Father; and the Eternal Sun fills the whole firmament of his soul with its rays of threefold glory. But, if a man aspire toward God, he must aspire according to his threefold nature; he must aspire according to his body, his soul, and his spirit; he must obey the divine law in its threefold applications. Man must follow what he ought to be in the natural world, in the moral world, and in the world of thought.

Liberty is the right which every human being possesses of aspiring toward God, by the development of that threefold human nature—physical, intellectual, and moral—on which the image of God is stamped. Liberty is the form of the relation which exists, and necessarily exists, between man and his Maker. Now this liberty is the sum of human right; for, because man has a threefold existence—physical, moral, and spiritual—he must glorify God by aspiring toward him in accordance with his threefold nature; that is to say, man has a natural right and duty to develop all the faculties of his threefold being.

Shall repressive laws, shall priests and creeds, shall public opinion, separate between me and the Father of my spirit? Tyrants and priests know nothing of the revelation which God makes in the centre of my individual heart. I stand before God as an individual man; he communicates his will in the secret chambers of the centre of my individual heart. The revelation which God makes to me, is made to me, not to another. Individualism (which is the opposite to egotism) is, therefore, a holy doctrine. The individual man is a mysterious and holy force placed on the earth in accordance with the mysterious designs of a holy providence. Touch him not, therefore; seek not to guide him by indirect influence, for he is holy! Man is the temple of God, and his heart is the sanctuary from which the Almighty deigns to reveal his presence. He that contends against the rights of an individual man, contends against God; for it is the ever-attractive in-dwelling of God in the individual soul, that is the origin and foundation of all human rights.

An organization of society which renders a man dependent upon his neighbors, upon public opinion—which, in a word, renders him subservient to his accidents, instead of being supreme over them—is destructive to individualism, and is, therefore, profoundly immoral.

Now, I maintain—and let me see the man stand up that claims to deny it—I maintain that woman has an intellectual and spiritual nature; I maintain that woman aspires towards God, that she stands in secret and direct relations with God; that the will of God is revealed to her, secretly, and in the centre of her individual heart. I maintain, therefore, that woman has natural, divine rights, and that these rights come from that relation which she sustains to her Maker, which, because it imposes duties upon her, imposes the correlative duty upon us of taking from her nothing that is necessary to enable her to perform her duties.

At the risk of being tedious, I will endeavor to show the identity of the fundamental dogma of Democracy (that of the supremacy of man over his accidents) with the fundamental principle of Christianity; for I recognize no Democracy that is contra-distinguished from Christianity, and no Christianity which teaches either the divine right of kings, or the divine right of any portion of the people to govern any other portion, without the consent of the governed. What is this upward aspiration of the soul toward God, if not that spiritual attraction or gravitation, of which St. Augustine speaks, and which he denominates charity or love? "Charity," he says, "is the weight of spiritual existences." What is Faith, if not the conviction which is awakened by the spiritual world, through the power of this supreme attraction in the soul, that is akin to itself. Is not Hope the confidence which is borne in this upward aspiration? From these fundamental principles of democracy, can we not thus deduce every one of the fundamental principles of Christian morality?

Moreover, the universe exists eternally to the mind of God in idea. A Divine Ideal of the universe is, therefore, eternally with God; and—because the Supreme is essentially intelligent—that same Ideal, in a certain sense, is God. Besides, the whole visible universe was created with reference to man, that is to say, with reference to beings enjoying distinct consciousness and will; such beings are, therefore, more or less perfect embodiments of the Divine Ideal. One perfect man, that is, one perfect incarnation of the Divine Ideal, has existed, &c. &c.

Are not these the fundamental postulates of Christianity as considered metaphysically? Was not our Lord the crown and completion of the creation? Was He not the incarnation of the ideal? What is that Word which is with God and is God,—that Word, in accordance with which all things are made that are made,—that Word which is the true intellectual light, enlightening every man that cometh into the world,—that Word which was incarnated in the Savior of the world,—if it be not the Divine Ideal? If it is evident that the moral doctrine of Christianity and progressive Democracy coincide, it is equally evident that Christianity and Democracy are identical in their metaphysical basis. Christianity and Democracy, in their germ, in their fundamental principles, are identical; and because Christianity recognizes no distinction of sex in the soul, affirming that "there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, in the body of Christ, which is the Church,"

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS. — GREENE — KEYES.

[July 12th.

Democracy ought, in like manner, to affirm that the State should take no cognizance of differences of sex and color. Are not the differences of sex and color "accidental," merely, in human existence?

I rejoice that I have had this opportunity to affirm the identity of the fundamental principles of Christianity and Democracy. I have demonstrated that woman is capable of the exercise of a religious sentiment, and that she, therefore, possesses natural rights; and, in demonstrating this, I have demonstrated that she has a right to vote. What is the right to vote? It is a right which the citizen has to protect himself against the encroachments of society. The right to vote is the right to protect other rights; and, if the rights to be protected are natural, then the right to protect those rights is also natural. It has been said by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) that the right to vote is, or ought to be, consequent upon the possession of property. But if a man has not a dollar's worth of property in the world, has he not a right to acquire property? And if he has a right to acquire property, has he not a right to protect that right to acquire? Can he protect that right to acquire property, if he have no vote by which he can put a veto on the encroachments of property castes? And so it is with all other rights. If a woman has rights, she has also a right to protect these rights. I repeat, that if man has a natural right to protect himself, he has a natural right—in Massachusetts, at least—to vote, because a right to vote is necessary, under existing conditions of society, to enable him to protect his other rights. If women are human beings and people, then they, in like manner, have a natural right to vote, at least in those societies where the right of self-protection organizes itself spontaneously in the form of a right to vote. The women of Massachusetts have, therefore, a natural right to vote.

In order to enforce his remarks, the gentleman, (Mr. Hillard,) quoted Aristotle. Sir, it is lawful to quote Aristotle. The first phrase in Aristotle's book upon politics, and the one that in reality sums up his whole theory, affirms that the State, as such, is founded, not on right, but on interest—egotism. But self-interest, egotism, is, as Swedenborg, Boehme, and other spiritual writers affirm, the centre and essence of hell. The gentleman maintains that no progress has been made in the science of government from the days of Aristotle until now. He has altogether forgotten that the Savior of the world was born upon the earth since the time of Aristotle, and died on the cross, expressly for the purpose of destroying the spirit of egotism which Aristotle advocates, and of substituting the principle of fraternity in its stead. Modern democracy dates its origin from Judea, not from Greece and Rome. Modern democracy is based upon a divine principle, not upon egotism, which is an infernal principle. Who, then, can acknowledge the principles of democracy, as set forth in the Bill of Rights, and at the same time deny the right of women to vote? I would like to see some man rise up in his place, and give me an argument—I care not what it is—any argument that is worthy to be listened to by a man of sense and reflection, against the right of women to vote. No one rises: I should like to have it put into the record that no man rises.

I have now said almost all that is necessary to be said, at the present time, taking the circumstances into consideration. If any arguments had been adduced on the other side, the case might have been different. Before I sit down, however, I want to make a single remark. Certain very wealthy gentlemen of Boston, recently deceased, have been alluded to several times upon this floor, and they have been defended against certain alleged calumnies. My friend for Northborough, (Mr. Burlingame,) made some statements in relation to wealthy men, to which I listened carefully, but I was not aware that he said anything against those three gentlemen of Boston. I did not hear anything uttered which could be tortured into an attack upon them. He drew a sharp line of distinction between men of mere property and men of genius. What he said about men of mere property was undoubtedly true; no man can deny it; and I think that what he said about men of genius is also true. But he made no particular allusion to those three Boston men. One of those gentlemen I did not know, but the other two were unquestionably men of genius, and the loss experienced by the community on account of their death was because they were men of genius. The vacancies left by those distinguished gentlemen cannot easily be filled. The gentleman for Northborough said nothing derogatory to either of them. Had anything been said in this hall injurious to their character or detracting from their merit, I am the man who would have risen suddenly to repel the unjust accusation; but I deem it right to say that no accusation has been made.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I had the good fortune to be honored, Mr. Chairman, by being made the medium through which some of the petitions on the subject now under consideration, were presented to the Convention. I hardly know how it happened, or why I came to be selected, out of this distinguished body of men, to be so honored above others. It was certainly not on account of any peculiar opinions which I have ever entertained or expressed, nor because I have ever distinctly favored the claim which is made in these petitions. I cannot account for it upon any other ground than that I may have given an intimation, at sometime or somewhere, of my disposition to have all petitions—come from whatever quarter they may, and relating to whatever subject they may—fairly entertained and considered. Now, Sir, I am very well aware, that unless this is a much more gallant and chivalric assembly than commonly meets in this hall, or in other places,—assemblies of men I mean,—there is a feeling that the time which is spent upon this subject is entirely wasted. Gentlemen may possibly feel that it is beneath their dignity, in a Convention like this, to treat with any degree of candor a petition on this subject, which everybody feels to result in nothing; but it is because I do not entertain any such opinion as that, that I am always willing to consider claims coming from this quarter.

I think, however much men may sneer at and ridicule petitions of this character, they are not quite so independent of woman's influence at home and elsewhere as they would be thought. They may safely laugh and deride at a distance, who will tremble and cringe in the presence of a woman. The power of woman is not to be sneered at. I take it as a matter which has been settled by the common consent of every-body, that were it not for this power and influence men would not be able to preserve their civilization. Let that part of the human race be struck out of existence, and the very generation which now exists—and we could never have another generation—would go back to barbarism. What is the history of man? It is a record of crime, inhumanity, injustice, and blood. That is the idea of the human race as represented by history; and the foundation of all our politics, and the foundation of all our philosophy, is based upon the idea that men are vindictive, dishonest, cruel, and wicked. The great power that preserves them in the elevated condition in which we find them, is the influence of woman. This only has a tendency to keep them above the low level of brutality, vulgarity, and vice. I say then, that petitions coming from a quarter like that, deserve respectful treatment. Gentlemen know very well,—although in our day women are comparatively free,—that the history of the world is a history of the injustice of man towards woman; and man, such as he is represented to be, and such as he is described in the history of the world, is not entitled to assume such a vast superiority, as he does, either of character, integrity, or capacity, over woman. I had prepared, for another occasion, a few extracts, showing the character and dispositions of men, and how they are to be regarded; and if they contain a true representation, I want to know what right they have to set themselves above woman, either in capacity, character, or in common sense. Machiavel says:—

"Those who have written on civil governments lay it down as a first principle, that whoever would found a State, and make proper laws for the government of it, must presume that all men are bad by nature."

Montesquei says:—

"Constant experience shows that every man invested with power is apt to abuse it."

Swift says:—

"So endless and exorbitant are the desires of men that they will grasp at all, and can form no perfect scheme of happiness with less."

Junius says:—

"Laws are intended not to trust what men will do, but to guard against what they may do."

Dr. Price says:—

"Such are the principles that govern human nature; such the weakness and folly of men; such their love of domination, selfishness, and depravity, that none of them can be raised to an elevation above others without danger."

This is the character of men, as portrayed by the wisest of lawgivers; and, Sir, they have illustrated their characteristics in their treatment of women as well as in their treatment of one another. You know that the history of the world is a history of bloodshed, cruelty, violation of treaties, tyranny and inhumanity; and men have sometimes extended this same treatment to the weaker sex. One or two anecdotes from history will show how this matter stands. Virginus is considered to have been a very noble patriot, and his name is almost revered by those who read how he killed his daughter to keep her out of the hands of a tyrant; but when we come to reflect upon the matter a little, we very naturally ask, why did he not stab the guilty tyrant instead of his innocent child? Or, if his daughter must die, why did not he die with her? That is the fashion of women, when they have to make a sacrifice of this sort. Let us look at another case. When Scipio Africanus besieged the city of Numantia, and the inhabitants could no longer make resistance, they sent a flag of truce, and asked to make terms; and what did they do? Sir, the male inhabitants of that city went to work, during the time allowed for negotiation, and butchered all their wives and children, mothers and sisters; and what was the reason for this monstrous cruelty? It was because these sisters, and wives, and children, would count among the prisoners; and they did not wish their conqueror to have the glory of having a roll of prisoners swelled with the numbers of their sisters, wives, and children—so they butchered the innocent—those who had no share in causing the war, and lived on themselves. Over and again cases have occurred, during the history of the world, where women were sacrificed and men continued to live; but when the wife of Hamilcar saw fit to sacrifice her children in the flames, rather than permit them to fall into the hands of the enemy, she rushed in herself and shared their fate. But, Sir, the same spirit that was exhibited in these cases, has continued to exist and to operate in modern times.

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.—KEYES.

[July 12th.]

I will refer to a practical illustration. A female medical society petitioned the legislature for aid, and it was denied. If there was any ground for that refusal, it was that women were not competent to discharge the duties of that profession; but how unjust is that pretence! Women, at one time, had almost the whole of an important part of the medical practice, in their own hands; but, men, through the instrumentality of the power which they hold over the educational institutions of the country, rendered them incapable of maintaining their position, and then assumed and monopolized their business. Men, having, by the tyrannical abuse of their authority, deprived women of the means of education in the higher departments of knowledge, turn round and taunt them with their ignorance and inability. How would men like it, if they were to be served in a similar manner, and to be excluded from the public colleges and scientific institutions? Suppose they were to be excluded from such institutions, and all other means of instruction now afforded to them and denied to woman, how would they stand in comparison? Would they be likely to achieve more than women have done under the same circumstances? Women are deprived of the chief of these privileges, which men regard as essential to fame and success; and yet the latter taunt them, because they are inferior in knowledge to themselves. I presume it is not generally true, that the equality of women is denied; it is only determined, that their condition is such, that they are not in a situation to enter into the same field with men, or fitted to discharge the same duties. Now, what I wish to say, is this. If women are going to come forward, and claim their share in the administration of the government, if they are to enter into that, which, by custom and usage, has devolved on men, they must, at the same time, submit to the same treatment, and have their petitions and claims treated in the same manner. The question then arises, would the privileges which they ask at our hands, relieve them from the evils of which they complain? In the first place, are they, under the present state of things, exposed to injury in their persons, liberties and property? If it be so, would granting the privilege which they claim, relieve them from that oppression? I am not one of those who believe, that, although women are, in some instances, oppressed and denied their rights, that their condition is much worse than that of men; or, that the restrictions upon them, increase their unhappiness. I think, that to grant them these privileges, would do nothing whatever towards relieving them of any of the burdens of life which now rest upon them. Women have power which is as great as that of men, although it is of an entirely different nature. We consider that it takes a man and a woman to make a whole human being; and, therefore, the powers which men possess, are very different from those which women possess, and vice versa. If women are deprived, by law and custom, from participating in the privileges, and sharing in the powers which men enjoy, so are men deprived, by nature—a much higher law—from participating in the exclusive powers and privileges which she possesses. It is said, that a single female sigh can shake the whole universe. Now, if women are dissatisfied with their condition in life, and are disposed to interfere in those things, which, by custom and usage, are assigned to men, it follows that men have an equal right to enter their field, and partake of what they have heretofore enjoyed as a special monopoly of power and privilege. How would it appear, if men should claim the same right in regard to the privileges and powers heretofore, according to custom and usage, monopolized by women? Suppose that men should seek to imitate that delicacy, the rosy cheeks, the ruby lips, bewitching ringlets, sunny smiles, and all the paraphernalia of rouges, pomatums, pantalettes and parasols, by which women now sway the grand and universal empire of the heart? What if men, in order to rival the charms of the fairer portion of creation, and thereby increase their influence, should abandon the duties of the farm, the workshop and the sea, and shut themselves up in boudoirs and shady retreats, in order to become softer-fingered and more delicate? They have the same inalienable right to do it, that women have to transgress the boundaries which appear to have been set by nature, and which have been fixed by the customs of all civilized nations.

But there is another argument. As I have already said, if women wish to come into the arena with men, and take a share in the government, they must expect to receive the same kind of treatment, and to be met with the same kind of arguments which are meted out to men by each other. Therefore, we should ask these fair petitioners, where is your majority? If but a small number of men come to the Convention with a petition for some change in the government, we immediately ask, how many people demand it? What is the exigency, &c. &c. If only a few names are signed to the petition, we ask, where is your majority? I confess, Mr. Chairman, if a majority of the ladies of this Commonwealth should petition for this change, the condition of the question might, in some sense, be altered, although the question of right would not be affected thereby. Inasmuch, however, as in entering into society, all persons are called upon to surrender a portion of their rights, in order to enjoy, with more security and comfort, the balance of them, the question of right, in many cases, resolves itself into a question of expediency, and demands to be treated as such, and this is one of them. It ought not to be forgotten, however, that woman possesses a power which is altogether different in its nature from that of man, and wholly independent of it; a power as great, if not greater, than any which man possesses. All history, as well as our own experience, shows us, that women influence the action and government of the world quite as much as men. At Aix-la-Chapelle, at the meeting of the allied sovereigns, the Princess Leven and Lady Castlereagh exercised as much power and influence as any of those high functionaries on whose diplomatic shoulders rested the authority of kingdoms and empires. Henry IV. was a just monarch, but he was controlled by a certain "Gabrielle," whose arms, and whose power encircled him. The way that women exercise power, it is true, is not exactly by voting; it is a power which is far more omnipotent than any which they could acquire at the ballot-box. Who does not know that the humble and philanthropic Miss Dix has controlled majorities in the legislatures of nearly all the States in the Union, and yet she never cast a vote. See how it was with the memorable Isabella of Spain. She proved greater than Ferdinand, for it was she, and not he, who provided the means for the discovery of this country. It was not because she possessed greater powers of statesmanship, or prophecy, or that she had a larger and more capacious understanding, as we interpret these words; but her greatness consisted in those traits and characteristics which are peculiar to woman, and which well up from her heart, as pure spring water from the sides of a mountain. The Hon. Edward Everett, in his late address before the New York Historical Society, describes precisely the nature of the power which she wielded. After Columbus had wandered a supplicant from court to court, appealing in vain for aid in behalf of his magnificent enterprise, when even the sagacious Henry VII. had turned a deaf ear to him, much to his subsequent regret, it was the "womanly compassion" of Isabella which overcame all scruples and doubts. It was that feminine characteristic which caused her to sell her jewels to fit out the immortal navigator, for that expedition which resulted in adding a new hemisphere to the geography of the world. I am well aware that that power is not called greatness, by the world; but it is greatness, nevertheless, inasmuch as it brings to pass those great results, the achievement of which constitutes greatness in the estimation of mankind. A man is said to be great in proportion to what he can accomplish—the fields he can win, or the nations he can conquer; but the "womanly compassion" of the other sex oftentimes exercises a power infinitely greater than that of conquerors. Edward could conquer cities; but Phillis could conquer hearts; and in conquering hearts she could more than conquer cities. Nobody believes that Queen Victoria is the greatest genius in the world, or the greatest in the art of statesmanship; but who does not believe that sitting on that throne of our mother country, she wields a power more potent in all that tends to promote internal and external peace and harmony, than

Tuesday.]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS. — KEYES — CRESSY — WHITNEY — KNOWLTON.

[July 12th.

could the mightiest of kings. It is in this form then that women possess a power which they are found to exercise, and which is more potent than that of men and ballots. The moment, however, they step over the line which seems to divide them from men, as by the fiat of nature, they lose that power, by losing those enchantments and charms which characterize them in their present position. As I had occasion to repeat, when speaking somewhere else upon this subject,

"While man possesses heart and eyes
Woman's bright empire never dies."

I have thought proper to say these few words, because, not only have I been made the medium of introducing some of the petitions which are the occasion of this debate, but, because a large number of my constituents—if I may presume to speak of the fair ladies of Abington by that title—are among the petitioners; and I wish to treat the matter with that deference which is ever due to the delicacy and sincerity of the sex. I do not know, indeed, but that women are sometimes denied their rights in other cases; but I do know that this Convention has, to all intents and purposes, over and over again, acknowledged their right to vote. I have not admitted this myself in so many words, but this Convention, in adopting a provision that all persons in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are free and equal, and have a natural and unalienable right to vote as members of society, have acknowledged that women have a right to vote. What other construction can you put upon such language? I do not quite believe in the doctrine myself; but the Convention has decided, again and again, that such is the fact. What more can be done? How men can admit that doctrine, and then refuse to comply with the demands of the petitioners, I cannot conceive. I suppose they justify themselves upon the ground of expediency; because, when they say that all men are free and equal, and all have an equal right to vote, they do not mean it in an entirely unrestricted sense, for all men even have not the right to vote on all occasions. So it is in other respects. When we enter into society, we are obliged to surrender a portion of what are called our natural rights for the safety and security of the rest. For example, I believe that there is nothing in the ten commandments, or in the twelve tables, forbidding men from putting on women's apparel, or women from arraying themselves in our less graceful attire. According to these authorities, men and women can dress as they please; but until the days of the heroic and intrepid Emma Snodgrass, [laughter,] I believe that the authorities have interfered and decided that it was very improper, if not illegal, that women should put on men's apparel; and no doubt the rule is intended to apply both ways. It is, therefore, a settled fact, that the abstract, natural and inalienable rights of men and women are not rights that are at all times, and on all occasions, to be exercised. They are to be restricted and confined to particular occasions. If, therefore, it seems unjust that the woman who is taxed should not have the privilege of voting, under a system which declares that taxation and representation should go together, it must be regarded as one of those accidents and misfortunes which is irremediable directly, but which is amply compensated for in a thousand other ways. Men of every grade and condition of life are on some occasions deprived of their inalienable and natural rights for the good of the rest of the community. It is, therefore, as a matter of expediency, and, in accordance with the belief which I entertain, that women are stronger and more powerful, and better protected in the position they now occupy than they would be if their prayer should be granted, that I have concluded not to give this proposition my vote. I am satisfied that the moment women should enter into conflict with men, in political and governmental affairs; the moment they enter into the same arena, and tread the same fields of employment, or ambition, they would have to become subject to the same rules, the same toils, the same hardships the same slanders and misrepresentations, to which men are subjected; and at that same moment, that softness and delicacy of character, and those bland enchantments which bind the world in silken chains, would be lost, and lost forever, and with that loss would follow the entire demolition of that fascinating and almost omnipotent power which they now possess, and which they so happily and delightfully exercise for the glory, happiness, and salvation of the race.

For these reasons, I shall vote, as I suppose every other member of the Convention will vote, that the Report of the Committee shall stand as it is, and that the power of woman over us shall still be clothed with smiles and beauty, rather than with "sealed envelopes."

Mr. CRESSY, of Hamilton, moved that the Committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I have but a few words to say to the Convention on the subject of this Report.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject of the Report is not debatable on a motion that the Committee rise, and the question must be taken on that motion before further argument on the general Report can be heard.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Hamilton, by striking out the words "ask leave to sit again," and inserting, "recommend the Convention to concur in the Report of the Committee."

 The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not amendable in that form.

Mr. CRESSY. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Worcester, and hope my motion may be considered as so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is that the Committee do now rise and recommend the Convention to concur in the Report of the Committee. On that motion the member for Boylston, (Mr. Whitney,) has the floor.

Mr. WHITNEY. I am quite aware, Mr. Chairman, that it has been intimated that the time which has been spent on this discussion has been wasted, and as such seems to be the general impression of the Committee; I promise to occupy but a very few minutes in what I desire to say.

I once knew a man who sent to a minister of religion, for the purpose of having him come and argue his wife out of her religious belief, because that belief did not suit him. The minister replied to him, that his wife was never reasoned into her religious belief, and that, therefore, it was by no means probable that she could be reasoned out of it, and for that reason he declined to try. This Committee, I apprehend, is much in the same situation. They have come to a conclusion; and it is not reasonable to suppose that any one—especially myself—can reason them out of that conclusion. I wish to say a few words, however, upon this subject. It seems to me, that the Committee have indicated the best reasons in the world why the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, and yet they have given them "leave to withdraw" their petitions. Sir, I contend, that he who denies the "divine right of kings" to govern men without their consent, will have very hard work to prove the divine right of men to govern women without their consent. I apprehend that there will be some difficulty attending it, and am of opinion that the greatest point has been granted in the case of women. We should, indeed, be but brutal beings, were we to forbid our wives from enjoying that religion which they believe to be the best—whether Baptist or Methodist, or Episcopalian, or even Catholic. I say, that if there is a difficulty and a division between men and women in this greatest of matters, and the man proposes to tyrannize over the woman, it cannot be so great an evil that there should be a difficulty and a division in regard to minor matters. If a woman has a right to exercise that faith for herself, which she believes, under God, is right—and I believe no man in this Convention, at this time of day, will be bold enough to deny that—certainly she may decide for herself in matters of less importance.

The Committee say that women have interests and rights which are not, and cannot, be regarded by a government in which they are not allowed any political privileges or influence. They say that this was considered by the Committee, and who can deny it. It has been asserted again and again by this Convention. They are not treated fairly. Your higher institutions of learning are closed against them—your colleges and your higher seminaries of learning of every description. But all equality in the land is not yet dead. Is it creditable to Massachusetts, that her daughters who desire to pursue a collegiate course of study, should be obliged to go into Ohio and New York for this purpose? Is it creditable to America that her gifted daughters, who are determined to pursue a thorough course of medical study in order to qualify themselves well for the practice of medicine, should be obliged to go to Paris for this purpose? The door of learning in some portions of America, as well as in some of the European States, is open to women, and they are determined to enter. The learned professions are within their reach, and they are entering, and will continue to enter them; and, I thank God, that it is not within the power of ministers, presbyters, or synods, to control the action of the churches in all respects. The churches are independent, and they will, if they choose, have female pastors. The case has already been tried; and a young lady who was refused an ordination by her own denomination, has accepted an invitation from a church to become its pastor. This is as it should be. So with the medical profession. A gifted woman, who took her reputation in her own keeping, proceeded to Paris to qualify herself in the very best manner for the practice of medicine, and is now, as I am informed by members of the faculty, fast advancing towards the head of the profession in the city of New York.

The reasons given by men why women should not enjoy with them a course of medical study, are that the subject is too indelicate for women.

Tuesday.]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS, &c. — WHITNEY — MARVIN — BOUTWELL.

[July 12th.]

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a proper reason for men to give who have decided for woman in all her arrangements in life; who have determined what was proper and what was improper for her to do, and have decided for themselves that it was proper for them to exercise the office of midwife. I hold, Sir, that in this branch of medical practice, at least, women are better qualified, by nature, for its just and proper, and delicate performance, than men. I hold further, that in this matter, as in all others pertaining to woman, she is better qualified to judge for herself and to determine the matter, than man is to judge and determine for her. Leave her to herself, and she will work out the problem in a way which will be creditable to herself as well as to man. This, at all events, is my judgment in the case.

Another point, Mr. Chairman. We lay down the principle continually, that taxation and representation should go hand in hand. I believe, Sir, that this is true as applied to women as well as to men; and if you refuse them a right to a voice in the government, you ought not to tax them. I say, Sir, that it is a shame that woman should be taxed upon her property—property acquired under the hard laws imposed upon her by man—to the full extent to which man is held, while by law and custom she is held under so many disabilities in acquiring and holding property; and I earnestly hope that the legislature of the State, at its very next session, after the adjournment of this Convention, will pass a law exempting the property of women from taxation. This is clearly their right, Sir, the very best reason which can be given why the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, is the statute book of our State, as it stands at this day with reference to the rights of women. It is clear, from the history of the past, that men are not prompt in doing justice to the claims and the rights of women.

The Committee gave, as another reason, why the prayer of the petitioners should not be granted, that only about two thousand, out of about two hundred thousand women in the State of Massachusetts had asked for, or demanded their rights. Sir, these two thousand women are nearly all of them legal voters by right—as many legal voters as are found at present in seven or eight, or ten, of our smallest towns.

And let me say one word further, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the number that desire these rights. I had not the honor of circulating this petition, myself, but I inquired of a friend who did circulate it, how many women he found who were unwilling to sign it? His reply was: “not one whose husband was willing to sign it.” Several of them replied—and I hope you will put this down to the credit of the women—that they would prefer to see their husbands’ name upon the paper before they undertook to put theirs upon it. I think, Sir, that women are as little inclined as anybody, to introduce discord into their families, and that they are fully enough inclined to ask their husbands in regard to this matter, as to any other, in regard to what is their duty; but I do hold that if men are ready and willing to grant the rights of the women, they are, on the other hand, ever ready and willing to exercise those rights.

Now, it is said in this Report that the women have always had the right of petitioning this government, and that they never have before asked for those rights which are claimed by the petitioners. The Committee also make a comparison between the women and the slaves of this land, showing, or attempting to show, that as the slave has no right to petition for his liberty, there is no parallel between their situation and that of the women of Massachusetts. Now, Sir, those who defend the institution of slavery tell us that when the slaves are asked if they want their liberty, they almost invariably reply that they do not; that they are well enough off as they are; that they enjoy all the rights which they wish to enjoy. This is also asserted of the women of Massachusetts—that they do not desire to have any more rights than they at present enjoy. Sir, I believe that there are very few slaves in this land, or in the world, who, when they are assured that their masters are in earnest to give them their liberty, would not very readily accept it. When we find a case to the contrary, we say at once: “here is a man on whom slavery has done its worst work; it has blotted out from his nature that primary and fundamental principle so dear to all enlightened men—an appreciation of his own liberty.”

Sir, I hold that there is a good deal of human nature in woman as well as in man; and that when their husbands are ready to yield to them their clear and indisputable rights they will be ready to accept them. So much for the Report of the Committee.

A word or two now, with regard to other propositions which have been discussed before the Convention, in relation to this question of woman’s rights. It has been asserted here that the common sense of mankind forbids that woman should exercise political power. I have to say, Mr. Chairman, that the common sense of mankind does not agree as to what is the proper place for woman to occupy.

The common sense of the savage makes woman a beast of burden. The common sense of one class of men shuts her up in the seraglio, and the common sense of another class assigns her still another place. Now, Sir, in every stage of society, from that of the savage up to the present state of civilization, the condition of man has improved just in proportion as the rights of woman have been extended, and it is for those who deny to woman the right of the elective franchise to show that she now occupies just the place in human society which the Creator designed she should occupy. Can they show that? I doubt it. Another one declares that he objects to granting to women what they claim in this petition, from the fact that it will result in bringing them into political life, and that political life is so corrupt that they do not want women to meddle therewith. The mantle of politics is so defiled that they do not want it to rest on the shoulders of women. I say in reference to this matter, that men are probably no more chaste, no more refined, no more elevated, no more God-fearing, in their own homes than they are in their public assemblies. We must remember that women live with these men at home. They must endure them there, however brutal. And to continue the same figure, you will have to put your soiled tunic of politics into the woman’s washtub to be cleansed, before it will be fit for either men or women to wear. It has been intimated by the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) that the queen of England controls England for good, and exercises her influence for peace in a greater degree than any man could; and I think it a pity that we have not had a woman for president of the United States for some years past, and thus been saved from several very expensive and very disgraceful wars.

However different may be the opinions of men in different degrees of civilization as to the place that women should occupy, they all agree in this one point, that it is for man to determine what place women should occupy. Now, I submit, that from the experience of the past, it is time that we should leave women to decide for themselves what place they shall occupy, and what position God designed them to fill. I do not believe that there exists that difference which some gentlemen have supposed between a pure-minded, manly man, and a pure-minded, womanly woman. What is offensive to the one is equally offensive to the other. As woman’s advancement has hitherto been beneficial to man at every step, so I believe it will continue to be till she stands by the side of her brother in rights, his acknowledged equal.

I offer the following amendment. Strike out all after the word “that,” and insert the following words: “The prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted.”

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. I should like to say something upon this subject, but do not wish to do it at this time, as there is another subject which members desire to bring before the Convention at this time. I therefore move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put and there were, upon a division—ayes, 170; noes, not counted. So the motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and the chairman, Mr. Butler,

IN CONVENTION,

Reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Report referred to them, had made some progress therein, and had instructed him to report the same to the Convention, and ask leave to sit again.

Leave was granted to sit again.

Death of the Hon. Francis R. Gourgas.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin, rose and addressed the Convention as follows:—

It is, Sir, my sad duty to announce the death of a member of this Convention. Mr. Francis R. Gourgas, delegate from the town of Concord, died at his home this morning, at fifteen minutes past twelve o’clock. Mr. Gourgas was about forty-two years of age. Of all the men who welcomed this Convention, or entered upon its labors, none had brighter prospects of life, or higher hopes of the future, than he who now, first of all, has fallen.

A considerable part of his manhood was spent in the public service. His townsmen often elected him to the chief of their municipal trusts, and he was successively a member of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the Executive Council. This varied experience ripened a mind naturally sound, and gave to his counsels the value of maturest wisdom.

He was my friend, and I may say that those best appreciated his character who knew him best. Firm in his opinions and honest in his purposes,

Tuesday,]

DEATH OF MR. GOURGAS.—WILSON—SCHOULER—BURLINGAME—WALKER—HOBBS.

[July 12th.

he never sought success by improper means. His life, Sir, as we judge men, was a fortunate one. He was blessed in his domestic and social relations, honored by the uninterrupted confidence of his fellow-citizens, and ever conscious, as I believe, of the faithful discharge of his private and public duties.

Our friend and late associate has fallen early, but who, Sir, shall say he has fallen too soon. Life is not truly measured by the changes in the material world, but by the progress of the immaterial intellect of soul. Life and death, death and life, teach one lesson,—that in all that concerns this state of existence, we should live as though it was to have no end, and in all that concerns a future life, as though eternity had now begun.

I move, Sir, that a Committee be appointed to consider what appropriate notice this Convention shall take of this dispensation.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I rise, Mr. President, to second the motion which has been made by the delegate for Berlin. The death of a member of this Convention could not but be received with emotions of mournful sadness by all of us. But, Sir, he who has fallen was a friend of many years, and an associate of many of us, and his death cannot but excite in our bosoms painful emotions.

In 1842, eleven years ago, it was my privilege to meet him upon the floor of this House. Then I formed a personal acquaintance with him, an acquaintance which ripened into a personal friendship, which has been continued from that day to this. I have ever found him a man "Of soul sincere,

In action faithful, and in honor clear."

During the last five years, it has been my peculiar fortune to meet him on many occasions connected with public affairs; and, Sir, I can truly say that among all my acquaintances and friends, I know of no one among the living who excelled him in ripe and sound judgment, in discretion and prudence. He was a man of inflexible purpose, of integrity undoubted. He entertained his own opinions with the tenacity of sincere conviction, and at the same time, in carrying out those opinions, he always exercised the greatest prudence, discretion, and wisdom. It was his fortune, years ago, to enter upon the duties of editor of a leading political journal, in the town of Concord. In the severe political conflicts of those times, he doubtless had many strong opponents, but in his own town of Concord he enjoyed the confidence, the respect, and the affection of men of all parties. His townsmen and neighbors loved and honored him, for they knew his worth.

Having a family of three children, an accomplished, intelligent, and faithful wife, he has, during the past few years, devoted himself, when not engaged in the duties of public life, to the welfare of his family, and to the cultivation of his beautiful garden. His library, for which he had recently fitted up an appropriate room, reflected the refinement of his taste, and the cultivation of his mind. He was surrounded by everything to make life agreeable and desirable. But, Sir, he has fallen—fallen in the vigor and maturity of his manhood—mourned by all his neighbors, and deeply regretted by all his associates and friends in political life. In him I have lost an associate and friend, whose name and memory I shall ever cherish with affection until my heart shall cease to beat.

A comrade has fallen. We may pause for a moment and drop a tear of affection to his memory, but duty compels us to close up the ranks and hurry on in the performance of life's labors.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. The quiet silence of this House upon the announcement made by the gentleman for Berlin, of the death of one of our number, shows how quickly we can bring our minds back to contemplate the mortality of man.

He whose death has been announced, as was said by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) was long associated in, or connected with a profession of which I also was a member. We lived together in the same county, and took opposite sides in political matters; but, Sir, the personal respect which I always had for him, and which I believe he entertained for me, was never for a moment broken, however much we may have differed in respect to public affairs.

To all that has been said of the deceased, I can say, amen. And I could not allow this occasion to pass, standing as we do, and feeling as if we were passing through the dark valley of the shadow of death, without saying one word of humble tribute to the merit and worth of the deceased.

I rise, Sir, also to support the motion of the gentleman for Berlin, that a Committee be appointed to take into consideration what measures shall be adopted as a tribute of respect to our deceased brother.

Mr. BURLINGAME, for Northborough. Having known the deceased for some years past, and recently quite intimately, I cannot refrain from mingling my private sorrow with this public grief.

We heard some days since of the alarming illness of our friend; and then there came a rumor that his capricious disease had taken a favorable turn. But scarcely were we cheered by the report, when there came the sad intelligence of his death.

It seems but yesterday when we saw him here among us, full of life and full of hope; his fine face beaming with intelligence, and wearing a kind smile for every one—and now he is no more. He was modest and retiring in his manner—so much so, that the stranger would scarcely, from his appearance, take him to be the man he was. He revealed himself to us only by some practical manifestation in direct aid of our deliberations. He was not, as we can all bear witness, a forthputting man. He was the hero, rather, of the committee room. He suggested thoughts upon which other men built reputations. He was a man of a good deal of culture, of excellent character, and, as has been said, of sterling integrity.

It is true, as stated by the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) that he was "fearless" in the expression of his views, but he was, at the same time, tolerant of the views of others. In a word, he was a true friend, and a generous enemy.

In his public affairs, he was so clear in his office—he held it with such honesty and such dignity—that he received alike the commendations of his friends and his foes.

His private relations are sacred to us. A shadow rests upon his hearth-stone; let us not seek to penetrate it. There is a grief which our public and our private sympathies cannot assuage. Time alone holds in its generous bosom the balm that can heal the wound we cannot heal.

Since our sittings commenced, death has come near, and taken away the friends of many of us. To some of them he came with appalling suddenness—to others, after lingering disease. We have felt his chill; his stillness has settled in the chambers of many a loving heart, and now he has trodden with his skeleton foot the floor of this Convention.

Let us, in view of this sad event, be admonished; let us, standing by the portals of the grave of our fallen brother, remember that we are responsible to a higher than any earthly power. Let us, as we remember this—as we remember "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue"—rise to the dignity of the consideration of the grand questions of how we should live and how we should die.

Our friend is no more; he has gone to that mysterious land where we can follow him alone with the eye of faith. Who will fall next? It is only a question of time for us all. Let us then be prepared—let us so conduct ourselves that when our time shall come, we can depart in peace, and leave behind us something that—

"Shall resist the empire of decay,
When time is o'er and worlds have passed away;
Cold in the dust, the perished heart may lie,
But that which warmed it once can never die."

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. The deceased was my friend. I knew him in private life, and was associated with him in public duties. It even appeared to me, that he exemplified in a remarkable degree those peculiar traits of character for which that particular class of people from whom he sprung, have ever been distinguished. He was, Sir, a descendant of the Huguenots, whom the revocation of the Edict of Nantes sent into exile from all parts of France. Those men, so strong in their attachment to the principles of the Reformation, formed the moral elite of that unfortunate country, from which they were driven to the number, as history tells us, of more than 600,000. This large body of persons, of all ages, and both sexes, compelled to flee from the wrath of a persecuting priesthood, and a tyrannical government, amid untold hardships and suffering, made their escape into various parts of Europe, into Switzerland, Germany and England, and even into our own country. The ancestors of our friend, if I recollect aright the formal detail he once gave me, fled first to England, and subsequently to America. The numerous portraits of his ancestors with which the walls of his dwelling are adorned, show us that he well knew the fortunes and history of those who had gone before him; and the official costume in which many of them are presented to us, shows that they were persons of distinction, who held many high offices in civil and military life. Our deceased friend was a worthy descendant of such an ancestry. His life did honor to that love of human freedom, and that stern regard for moral principle, which has rendered them so illustrious.

Mr. HOBBS, of Weston. It may seem a little presumptuous in me to rise now, and for the first time during the session of this Convention, to express any thoughts upon this occasion. But, Sir, perhaps no individual upon this floor has had a longer acquaintance with the deceased than myself.

Tuesday.]

DEATH OF MR. GOURGAS.—BROWN—BIRD—DURGIN—CROSS—BRIGGS.

[July 12th.]

Other gentlemen who have preceded me here, have spoken of him in public life, but I have known him in private life. I knew him in early life—I have been associated with him in the walks of life, and I rise to bear testimony to the truth of the remarks which have fallen from my distinguished friends around me, who have spoken of his character, so clearly pointing out those striking characteristics, which marked his life.

I rise, Sir, as a mourner for him. He has been my warm friend—he has been my early associate, and I embrace this opportunity, to bear to his memory, before the gentlemen of this Convention, that tribute which is due to him.

Sir, may we here, on this solemn occasion, while the attention of the members of this Convention is called to this subject,—may we remember, and ask ourselves the question, who among us may next be called from the public duties of life to give up his final account? May we, each and all of us feel the solemnity of the occasion, and remember that all our public as well as private duties, are intimately connected with our interest in the world to come.

Mr. BROWN, of Medway. Having formed an acquaintance with the deceased at a period already referred to—1843, and improved it by ten years association, I am constrained to offer my feeble response to every sentiment of respect and affection which has been expressed by the Convention on this solemn occasion, for the memory of the deceased and of condolence and sympathy for his afflicted family.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. Disinclined, as I am, to break in upon that silence which is the best tribute of praise to our departed friend, I must still bear one word of testimony to the regard which I entertained for him.

My acquaintance with the deceased has been comparatively limited, dating back only to the beginning of the last year; but since that time, it has been of a very intimate character. During the whole of the last year, I was more intimately associated with him perhaps, than any other man in the Commonwealth, outside of the circle surrounding his own home. It was my privilege to sit by his side during the whole year in the council chamber, and it was in such a sphere as that, that his best qualities became known. He was a wise and safe counsellor; and I may be allowed to add, what I have often said during his life, that I never met a gentleman, whose judgment I was prepared to take, with so much confidence, as his. Without disparagement to others, I must say, that the man does not live whose opinions I would adopt—if I were to adopt the opinions of any man, without reasons—or whose steps I would follow with such entire convictions that I was following safely, as those of my friend whose decease we now mourn.

I respond, therefore, most heartily, to all the tributes of praise which have been rendered to the memory of the deceased. But I rose mainly for the purpose of saying that I would not have these testimonials pass as mere matters of form. Sir, all, and more than all, is true; but the crowning excellence of Mr. Gourgass's character is expressed in these words: Entire fidelity to his convictions. Careful in examining premises, cautious to the extreme in adopting conclusions; but when he had reached them, he stood by them with unalterable firmness. And the more firmly, because over all the conclusions of his judgment, incorruptible integrity presided. He was an earnest politician; but no man who knew him ever dared to suggest personal advantage as a consideration to influence an official opinion or political act.

My friend for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) has remarked, that we may hardly, perhaps, say that he has fallen too soon. I would not indulge a murmur at the dispensation of Providence, which has taken him from us; and yet, when, since we have had reason to fear that his sickness was unto death, I have tried to bring myself to a feeling of reconciliation to such a loss, I must confess that I have rarely found it so difficult to bring myself to that feeling. I would not say that I cannot come to the conviction that I must submit, but I have not brought myself to see and understand why such a man as he should be taken, and such as me, left. I have never before felt so strongly, with the single exception of the death of the lamented Rantoul, that it could not, must not be. This is the first shaft which has struck the ranks of those who formed the political organization with which the deceased acted. Alas! that, as too often is the case, it should have fallen upon the foremost rank. Never before, except when the cloud darkened my own fireside, never before has the prayer—"Show me wherefore thou contendest with me?"—so constantly risen to my lips. Never before has faith been so unwilling to take for an answer—"Be still, and know that I am God!"

Why was he taken, and why are we spared? It has come to me, personally, with startling warning. Why was he, with vigorous health, with temperate habits, with passions chastened, with appetites controlled, with calm and equable temperament; why was he cut down, and I, with shattered constitution and failing health, left? To my weak faith, shadows, clouds and darkness rest upon this event. May Heaven help me to learn, that righteousness and truth are the habitation of His throne.

Mr. DURGIN, of Wilmington. When the very solemn announcement was made, that the angel of death had entered these walls, and that a member of this Convention had fallen to rise no more, a deep solemnity pervaded this assembly which has not been witnessed before during all our deliberations. We have the fullest evidence that an honest man has fallen—a man of high social, moral and political integrity. And viewing it as a dispensation of the providence of God, it behooves us, with contrite and subdued hearts, to adopt the language of another, and say: "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth, and the faithful faith from among the children of men."

Mr. CROSS, of West Boylston. Having never addressed this Convention upon any occasion, I trust I may be pardoned for saying a word at this time, and I speak now because God himself has spoken. I wish to make a remark of a general character. Much has been said, properly and justly said, in regard to the character of the deceased. It was not my happiness to be intimately acquainted with him, but God has spoken to us all; and it is with reference to the instruction conveyed to us by this providence, that I wish to say a word. It was the remark of the wisest of men, that "it is better to go to the house of mourning than the house of feasting, for that is the end of man, and the living will lay it to his heart." This house to-day has become the house of mourning, and it is better for us to be here at this hour than anywhere else upon the earth, if we will lay to heart the lesson of practical wisdom conveyed to us by this solemn providence. I have been forcibly reminded to-day of the great truth, that God's providence illustrates, confirms and enforces the truth of his word. It is said, by the voice of inspiration, that every man, at his best estate, is altogether vanity. What an illustration of that truth we have before us to-day, and how important it is, in faithfully and conscientiously discharging the duties of this world, that we should not neglect the higher duties of that world towards which we are rapidly hastening.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I did not know the deceased, only by reputation, and what little I have seen of him since the commencement of this session. The testimonials of personal friends, of political associates, and of his friends in early life, all confirm what that reputation told me before, he was. I noticed him in the early part of this Convention for his modest and gentlemanly propriety of demeanor, and for the promptness and fidelity with which he discharged the duties that devolved upon him by your appointment, Mr. President. I do not know why, but it so happened that in that respect my attention was particularly directed to him upon more than one occasion. It seems that that was only a trait of his character through life. While here he performed diligently what his hand found to do, and he worked while the day lasted. Now, to him, that night wherein no man can work has come; and it has gathered its dark and impenetrable cloud around him, and his work is done. A friend of his, this morning, said, in my hearing, that when he reached that period of his disease, when the mind became wandering, as it most always does in a disease of this nature, he seemed to be entirely taken up with the proceedings of this Convention, and evinced a great deal of solicitude for the results. This shows how deeply his heart entered into the matters which engage our deliberations. We should improve this dispensation of Providence to our moral benefit, and work diligently while here. The dying moments of our late associate, though under the influence of a mind deranged, show how intently he was devoted to the great duties which we are all of us called upon to perform as members of this body. Would it not be wise for each one of us in our intercourse with one another, in our discussions, in our thoughts, and in all our actions, to have reference to the death of the deceased. As has been said, no one knows where the next blow may fall; and how important, then, that we act here, as well as everywhere else, as though we expected immediately to be called to our final account. Our deliberations would be improved, and the result of all our actions would be more wise. Let us then heed this voice, which comes to us from above, this dispensation of Providence which has taken from our midst one of our companions, who but a few days ago was in the enjoyment of vigorous health and robust manhood, younger than many of us here. This dispensation of Providence "comes to us not out of the ground." This blow that has crushed the heart of a wife, and left little children fatherless, was wisely directed. I may say that we have great cause of gratitude to an Omniscent Being who created and preserved us all, that out of a body of more than four hundred men, and in four months since their election, that this is the first instance of mortality among us. Let us then proceed to pay the proper respect to the memory of a worthy associate, cherish his virtues, imitate his example where it is worthy of imitation, and faithfully perform the residue of our duties here.

Wednesday,]

DEATH OF MR. GOURGAS, &c. — HOPKINSON — WALKER — THOMPSON — HOBBS.

[July 13th.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. Impressed as I am, in common with every other member of this Convention, by the event which has been announced this morning, I would not attempt, by any eloquence of mine, to deepen the impression which it is calculated to make. Death is always eloquent, and its lessons, although repeated for six thousand years, are always new and always impressive. Upon an occasion like this, where we have been assembled and associated for a common purpose, it is well to pause and remember the virtues and character of the deceased. I rise to pay my tribute to the deceased, because it happened to me to be associated with him in an episode of his life, of which no one hitherto has spoken. We first met together as classmates in college. He entered college very young in my class; remained but a single year, I think, and then he parted from us. It is a source of pleasure to me to remember that during that short time I had considerable intercourse with him. I remember most vividly many peculiar traits of his youth. At that time he had quick and lively sympathies; social among those with whom he came in contact, but never went abroad to seek for society. His friendships were warm and generous, and his indignation at wrong quick and susceptible. He loved his books, and the statement made here that he had gathered about him a library containing the wisdom of those men with whom his spirit sought intercourse, reminds me that even then he had collected his books in a small closet, which he was pleased to show as his little library, and he took great pleasure in gathering his books carefully together. He was then a young man of eminent truth in all his feelings. I did not see enough of him then to learn how well adapted his talents might be for grasping strong subjects. His tastes rather led him in the direction of literary pursuits. He was a youth to be loved and cherished by the hearts that had access to his thoughts and inmost feelings, and he was one to be remembered long, and whose memory will come back fresh to us upon an event like this. We parted, and he entered upon the active duties of life. Those feelings which are so readily cherished, and which gather about us in college life, because we have there not only objects of common interest, but also common hopes, took deep hold with all who shared his acquaintance. I was therefore pleased, after a series of years, to hear that he was settled in the same county where I had resided, and was taking an honored part in active life. My acquaintance with him was not renewed at that time to any great extent, although upon my own part I always desired an opportunity of renewing an acquaintance commenced so early in life. I was always delighted to hear of his success politically, although we were of opposite parties, and the character I heard of him by those who knew him better than myself, drew me towards him. Now, when I have heard his friends who knew him best, testify to his life and character such as it was, I am peculiarly impressed with the fact, that that life was just such an one as might have been anticipated from his youth. It is, therefore, with a sad heart that I add my tribute of respect for the memory of the dead to those that have preceded me, and join in the expression as to the propriety of our taking time to pause and consider what tribute of respect and regard we should pay to the memory of an honored member of this Convention and of the community in which he resided.

The motion of the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) was unanimously adopted, and the following gentlemen were appointed the Committee:—

Messrs. Boutwell, for Berlin,
Briggs, of Pittsfield,
Wilson, of Natick,
Schouler, of Boston,
Alley, of Lynn, and
Bliss, of Longmeadow.

The Committee, after a brief interval, reported the following resolutions:—

Resolved, That the Convention has heard with regret of the death of Mr. FRANCIS R. GOURGAS, a delegate from the town of Concord.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with those relatives and friends upon whom this great calamity has fallen.

Resolved, That as a token of our respect for the deceased, a Committee of twenty members be appointed to attend his funeral to-morrow, at Concord.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolves be forwarded to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That these resolves be entered upon the Journal of the Convention, and that, in sorrow for our loss, this Convention now adjourn until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, July 13, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

 The Journal of yesterday was read.

Termination of Debate.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, moved that debate in Committee of the Whole, on the Report of the Committee on the petition of Francis Jackson and others, cease in thirty minutes after the Convention shall again go into Committee on that subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Committee to attend the funeral of Hon. F. R. Gourgas.

The PRESIDENT announced the following gentlemen to compose the Committee, under the resolution adopted yesterday to attend the funeral of Hon. F. R. Gourgas:—

Messrs. Boutwell, for Berlin,
Briggs, of Pittsfield,
Wilson, of Natick,
Schouler, of Boston,
Bell, of Somerville,
Weston, of Duxbury,
Morton, of Andover,
Upham, of Salem,
Earle, of Worcester,

Gilbert, of Plainfield,
Whitney, of Conway,
Stevens, of Clinton,
Bliss, of Longmeadow,
Ward, of Newton,
Bird, of Walpole,
Thompson, of Charlestown,
Hobbs, of Weston,
Ide, of Attleboro',
Phinney, for Chatham,
Norton, of Tisbury,
Meador, of Nantucket.

Communication.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention the following communication, which was read by the Secretary:—

OFFICE OF THE FITCHBURG R. R. Co. }
BOSTON, July 12th, 1853. }
HON. N. P. BANKS, President of the Convention, State House, Boston.

Dear Sir:—I notice, by the newspapers this afternoon, that a Committee of the Convention are to be appointed to-morrow morning, to attend the funeral of the late Hon. F. R. Gourgas, at Concord. I enclose a free pass over the Fitchburg Railroad, to Concord and back, for said Committee, and such other members of the Convention as may wish to attend.

Very respectfully,

JACOB FORSTER,
President of the Fitchburg Railroad Co.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown, moved, that the thanks of the Convention be tendered to the President and Directors of the Fitchburg Railroad Company, for the invitation extended to its members, in the communication just read, and that the Secretary be requested to communicate the same.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Hour of Meeting.

Mr. HOBBS, of Weston, moved, that when the Convention adjourns to-day, it be to meet to-morrow, at nine o'clock, A. M. I make this motion, said Mr. Hobbs, on the supposition that there may be many gentlemen in the Convention, who desire to attend the funeral this afternoon. Many gentlemen have also expressed a wish, that the Convention should adjourn, it being repugnant to their feelings to remain in session here while one of their number is being borne to the tomb. I do not know whether it is the wish of a majority of the Convention, that we should adjourn over, and I make this motion to ascertain whether such is the case.

The question was taken, and there were, upon a division—ayes, 53; noes, 70.

So the motion did not prevail.

Petition presented.

Mr. DUNHAM, of Savoy, presented the petition of James Cain, and one hundred and sixteen others, inhabitants of Savoy, for the preservation of the system of Town Representation.

The petition was laid upon the table.

Qualifications of Voters.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, of Andover, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,
Mr. Butler, of Lowell, in the chair, on the unfinished business of yesterday, being the Report

Wednesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS. — MARVIN.

[July 13th.]

of the Committee on the petition of Francis Jackson and others, that it is inexpedient to act upon the subject of the Qualifications of Voters, as prayed for by the petitioners, the question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boylston, (Mr. Whitney,) viz.: "that the prayer of the petitioners be granted."

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. Mr. Chairman; I have an amendment to offer before I sit down, which will be stated at the proper time. In the meantime, I desire to submit some remarks on the subject now before the Committee, although it is with extreme reluctance that I venture to solicit your attention. It is a matter of regret, also, that I am obliged to speak under restraint, since the vote just passed confines the whole discussion within very narrow limits,—limits so restricted, that it will be impossible for me to say all that has a direct bearing on the subject before us. But I shall endeavor to condense my remarks, and get through as soon as possible.

I suppose there is some impatience in respect to the discussion on this question, though it may fairly be inferred from the course of the Convention yesterday, that there is a willingness to hear something farther. It strikes me, Sir, that this is a subject well worthy of discussion. It is my belief that many of the fundamental principles of free government are intimately and indissolubly connected with the subject brought before us by the Report of the Committee which we are now considering. The question as to whom the right of suffrage belongs, cannot be settled without searching into the very foundations of a democratic or a republican government; and I have no doubt, that if the Convention should spend as many days on this question as they did in the consideration of the Berlin case, they would arrive at conclusions which would be useful—results which would amply repay us for such an employment of our time. I would not take up a moment in speaking upon this Report, if I did not consider it a matter of great importance. Not that I suppose the prayer of the petitioners will be granted; not that I can say anything to increase the vote in favor of the Report of the Committee, because I suppose the minds of gentlemen are made up, and that nine-tenths, at least, of this Convention, intend to vote in favor of that Report, or something equivalent to it.

But, Sir, the question has been asked, with an air of confidence, as if it could not be answered, why should not women exercise the right of suffrage? Why should not women vote in all our national, state, county, district, and town elections? And here I will freely grant, that if the commonly received notions about the social compact are true and well founded, no good reason can be given why women should not vote in all elections, as well as men. If the so-called social compact is a fundamental principle of government; if it lies at the base of free institutions, then there is no answer to be made to the ingenious argument which was presented yesterday by the gentleman from Brookfield, (Mr. Greene). For the idea of the social compact implies, not that a certain class—not that any number less than the whole—have united themselves under the government of their choice, but that every individual has given in his adhesion to it. You have a government founded on individuals, every one of whom is supposed to have assented to it, if he did not have a hand in its formation. But if this were the fact, it would be found that the right of suffrage must be extended not to women alone, but also to children. Indeed, no limit to the right to vote could be found, till you come down to children too young to make an intelligible sign in answer to a question. Now it seems to me that an argument that is run into the ground by this simple reductio ad absurdum is not well founded. It lacks reasonableness, and will never gain anything like general assent. But of this, more in another place.

Here let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I sympathize with the petitioners in all that can really promote the interests and the true elevation of the female sex. They shall have my hearty coöperation in every rational endeavor to promote the welfare of woman. Not one word shall escape my lips in ridicule of the most extravagant claims and pretensions, as I would not wound the feelings of any earnest heart. Whatever a company of respectable women ask for should be treated with respect, and I am sure that no gentleman can feel disposed to treat the prayer of the petitioners in any but the most courteous manner. There is no question that women are afflicted with many evils, and exposed to many privations, and it is gratifying to know that her sufferings and wrongs are receiving increasing attention. But it is likewise true, that all classes of mankind are subject to evils, wrongs, and sufferings. Misfortunes and disabilities are not confined to a class, and our sympathies should not be confined to that class. The philanthropic spirit which is abroad embraces all the sons and daughters of affliction, and therefore it receives my sympathy. The whole race—men, women, and children—must be elevated by intellectual and moral culture, and then the object we have in view, as friends of humanity, will be secured. I rejoice, therefore, that so much interest is manifested for that class of the community whose claims are now before us, and for all classes—the rich and the poor, the bond and the free, the native born and those who had their birth in foreign lands. The great effort is to civilize and Christianize mankind, and thus to establish freedom and secure the administration of justice. But I must be allowed to say, that however much woman may be oppressed, it is my sincere belief, that in all lands where the Christian religion has much influence, she is happier than man, inasmuch as she is more virtuous and lives nearer to her God. And this leads to the remark, that the way suggested by the petitioners is not the best and most practical method for promoting the elevation and securing the rights of woman. In connection with all reformatory movements, it will always be found that somebody will bring forward unwise and impracticable measures, which seem only to impede the efforts of its true friends, and throw an air of ridicule over the whole subject. I fear that this grand design of elevating the condition of woman, and in connection with it, the condition of all classes, has not escaped the general fate.

To come nearer to the main subject, I propose to consider it under three divisions, in their order. The question is this: shall the right of suffrage be conferred on woman? Or, shall woman exercise the right to vote?

In adhering to the negative side of this question, I take the ground, in the first place, that women—and here I include the whole female sex—have no right to vote in any elections provided for by the laws of the State. Her rights in corporations, in churches, and in all voluntary societies, are not now in question. I take this ground, because, if they have a right to vote, I am not the man to give my vote against them here. If their case can be made out, and it can be shown that they have a natural right to vote, then all I have to say is let them exercise it, without delay, and to the fullest extent. I have heard gentlemen say that they should vote against granting the prayer of the petitioners, while they had no reasons to give in justification of such action. Such a course does not seem fair and reasonable to my mind, and I intend to follow my convictions. If these convictions led me to the conclusion that the right of suffrage belongs to woman, my vote on this subject would be freely given in accordance with such convictions.

The true doctrine is this, that in a democratic government, or a republican government, which is really under popular control, all the people are represented. And under the term "the people," I place all the inhabitants, men, women and children, without exception. The right of representation is not confined to the male sex, nor to legal voters; but every person, even the infant in his mother's arms, and the idiot boy who does not know his rights, has a natural right to be represented in the meetings, legislatures and conventions, where the laws are enacted. In saying this, I do not mean to intimate that every person has a natural right to vote, or to be a representative; but simply that he has the right to be represented by one who is under the most solemn pledges to take care of his interests and rights. The government which really secures this right of representation to every individual, and thus makes the constituency as broad and as numerous as the whole body of the people, is really founded upon families, and not on individuals. The only free government of ancient times; the only government which came anywhere near securing the freedom and equality of all the inhabitants, was that of the Jews. In that state the men, the women, and the children, were in the enjoyment of the essential rights of man. Under that government there were no slaves, to any appreciable extent. Those captured in war and those who sold themselves into bondage,—in a word, all who in any mode became slaves,—were speedily set free. They had a provision that every person who was so unfortunate as to be in bondage should be at liberty in seven years, except a certain class; and these, by simply becoming Jews, were entitled to the same privilege. And it should be remembered that the motives to induce foreign born residents in Judea to become Jews, or citizens of the Jewish state, were stronger than those which operate upon the minds of aliens among us to induce them to become American citizens. Moreover, among them, the servant, when harshly treated, had as full a right to run away from his master as has an unintended apprentice in Massachusetts. This right was solemnly guaranteed to him, and all persons were prohibited from sending him back to service. Thus personal freedom was secured in the Jewish state and that state was founded upon families. The state was an aggregate of families, and not of individuals, except as members of families. The rights of the family were represented in the state

Wednesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.—MARVIN.

[July 13th.

by the father in every way in which representation existed under the Jewish polity, and thus the welfare of all was provided for. In fact, among the Hebrews, all families were represented in the church as well as in the state, as units, since the church and the state were inseparably united, which is not the case with us. Every free church, at least among us, is founded on individuals, who come into it voluntarily. No persons are members, in full, in any church, I believe, except as they are received on profession of their faith, or by the rite of confirmation, in accordance with their own consent. But it was not thus under the Hebrew polity, since the church and the state were laid on the same basis and were aggregates of families, although each dealt, in many cases, with individuals.

It is unfortunate for the cause of republican government, that our public men draw so many of their ideas of government and of human rights, from the ancient republics instead of studying the Hebrew polity. We cannot safely argue from Greece and Rome, where a large portion of the inhabitants were slaves. In Athens, there were several slaves to every freeman, and there was no provision for changing slaves into freemen, which had a tendency to put an end to slavery. In Sparta, when the slaves became too numerous for safety, they were not manumitted, but put to death. Slavery grew to such a height in Rome, that the empire fell to pieces by internal decay. It therefore is of very little consequence to us, as republicans, or democrats, or philanthropists, to know on what basis those governments were founded, except for the warning they may give us. They were nothing but oligarchies, under which slavery flourished in its most horrible, and terrific, and debasing forms. Nor can we derive much aid from such authors as Fletcher of Saltoun, and other Scotch and English republican writers of his school; for though they were fierce republicans they maintained that the great mass of the population ought to be held as slaves, or at least, as serfs. And this is the same doctrine that is now prevalent in South Carolina, and other slaveholding States, where this strange plea is put in to justify holding human beings in bondage, that freemen will be able to appreciate more highly their privileges, while surrounded by those enduring the degradation of slavery. We are not to resort to such States, or to such authors, to learn the origin, the basis, or the principles of a free government.

It will be found that in the constitutional government of Great Britain there is an approach to this idea; where if the government is not founded on families, the family is recognized as an important element in the state. In the time of Alfred, families, as units, were gathered into small groups which also were units in relation to larger groups, and to the state. In later times, those who have exercised the right of suffrage, have been, for the most part, heads of families. A few years since, the right to vote was extended to many thousands who were generally the heads and representatives of families; and as the principles of freedom shall make progress in Great Britain, the right of suffrage will, by degrees, be extended farther and farther. The present ministry is pledged to increase the number voters on a large scale; and the time is hastening when universal suffrage will prevail there as it does in our own preeminently free and happy land. The idea is simply this,—and it might be illustrated and fortified by referring to all countries which have any title to be called free,—that as fast as a government becomes democratic, it will be found that it is a collection of families banded together, each family of which is represented in the local municipal assemblies, and in the national councils. We have arrived to that result in all the free States, and to this conclusion must every real republican or democratic nation come at last. This is the universal tendency in all countries where the principles of free government are gaining ground, because it is the only basis on which a government that secures the equal rights of all the inhabitants can rest.

The family is a unit, and it has a unity of interests. It matters not whether the family consists of two persons, or of twenty, if it is, in the proper sense of the term, a family, its interests as a family are one. Identity of interests enters into the essential idea of a family, and any man who should argue for a diversity of interests in the family, or who should create such a diversity, would be warring against the welfare of families, and sowing discord and confusion, so wide-spread and destructive, that no national government, however strong and wise, could apply a remedy. As a matter of fact, there is in some cases, diversity of interests in a family, and recent legislation, though well intended, has a tendency to aggravate that evil; but it is nevertheless true, that the correct ideal of a family excludes all diversity of this nature. The husband, and the wife, and the children, are not only one household, but their interests are one and inseparable.

Such is a family. What now is its connection with the state? It is a unit, though composed of several persons, and it has a vital connection with that great aggregate of families which constitute the state. In order to secure the rights of these families—these units, including all the individuals in them, however young, or weak, or imbecile—each family must be represented; must have a voice and a vote in those representative bodies where the laws are made. But it does not follow that each individual in the family has a right to be a representative, or to vote for one. In some States, representation is founded wholly on towns; and these States are but aggregates of towns, as Connecticut and Vermont, not to mention others.

Take the former State for example. A few hundred emigrants went from the neighborhood of Boston, and after a journey of a fortnight through the pathless forest, reached the fertile banks of the beautiful Connecticut, and there, in locations which proved their good taste and judgment, founded the towns of Windsor, Hartford and Wethersfield. Under the cultivation of these settlers and their descendants, that section of country assumed such an amenity and beauty as to call forth the admiration of the passing traveller. Midway between the time of their settlement, and our own day, John Adams rode through these towns, and at night wrote in his journal: "I have been in Paradise to-day." But, turning from this pleasant course into which I have unconsciously strayed, I proceed to say, that these three towns, a short time after their settlement, sent representatives to Hartford, and thus the government of the State of Connecticut originated. In process of time, other towns were found, and were united with the rest, on an equal footing, and the State grew up in that way. The same fact holds good, to a considerable extent, as to the early history of Massachusetts; but it does not follow that every man in a town has a natural and inalienable right to represent the town in which he resides. If that was so, then every man in a town might claim a seat in the legislature, at every session. The town has a right to send its delegate or delegates to the general court, or legislature, and every man has a right to be represented; but no man has a right to be the delegate, unless he is elected for that purpose. The town as a unit, must be heard in the general council or assembly, by its chosen representatives. In this way the rights of all the men in the Commonwealth are secured; and in securing the rights of the men, you likewise secure the rights of families, including all the members. In like manner, to give a somewhat similar illustration, this State is a unit, and it bears a certain relation to the Union. It goes into the United States Senate as a unit, and as an equal. We, as a State, have two senators in that Senate—and it happens at present, that they are two very accomplished gentlemen—and we are all represented by them in that body; but it does not follow that every man in Massachusetts has a natural right to be the representative of this State in the Senate of the United States. He has a right to be a candidate for that high office, but he has no right or title to the office until he has been chosen to fill it. And now, to apply these illustrations, what I say is, that the family is a little government, which is a unit, and which has its representative, as a general thing, in our local bodies, and in our State and national governments. Take this position, and everything is clear and intelligible. It fully comes up to the idea of a free government, under which all are protected, represented and treated as equals.

It is possible that some gentleman will admit the soundness of the above position, who will raise the question why the mother shall not represent the family as well as the father? Let me say, in the first place, that it makes no difference so far as the rights of the family, or which is the same thing, of the individuals who compose the family, are concerned, who is the representative of the family, whether the father, or the mother, the eldest son, or the youngest daughter, provided the interests of that family are well looked after by its representative. The great thing, so far as its rights is concerned, is, that it shall have a delegate who is competent to defend and secure its interests and welfare. The only rational and practical question to be settled is this: who is best qualified in every respect, to represent the family in the general council or legislature? But, if gentlemen insist that it is the natural right of all persons to represent the family, it will be seen that their right will not be secured, by merely extending this right to women. Sons and daughters will come forward with their demand to be allowed to exercise their rights in this regard. On this ground there is no stopping place; there is no point where you can say the right of suffrage, and the right to be a candidate, which two rights always go together among us, shall end. There are many sons and many daughters, not sixteen years old, who, by their talents, information, and sobriety of mind, are far better qualified to vote, than many who exercise the right of suffrage. Many of them are better qualified to be representatives, than some who at times contrive to get into halls of legislation. But, farther, on the ground of natural right, as it is sometimes held, and as it has been advocated in this hall, the youngest child has a natural right to vote, as good and as inalienable as that of his father. For, if government is founded on individuals, and if all the inhabitants, in their individual capacity, have entered into a social compact, infants have the same rights as their fathers. Recoiling from a doctrine which leads to a conclusion so absurd, we are led to inquire into the real ground of distinction which gives one person a right to vote, and to be eligible as the representative of voters, while that right is denied to others. Why, then, should man exercise this right, while women and children are debarred from its exercise? So far as children are concerned, it is enough to say, that their interests and welfare are perfectly safe in the hands of their father. He votes for them and represents them all, unless they have interests incompatible with those of the family, in which case, the happiness of all parties would require them to be divided into two or more families.

Wednesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS. — MARVIN.

[July 13th.

To the question, why the wife should not represent the family, by her votes, and other ways, in connection with the body politic, as well as the husband, let nature and reason answer. Bear in mind that their interests and ours are the same, which is the case in every marriage from which happiness, or even comfort, can arise; and that whichever happens to be the representative of the other, will take care of the rights of both. This being understood, which of the two does nature and reason say shall exercise the right of suffrage? We find that in all civilized society, there is a division of labor, and that this goes on almost to infinity. The advancement of society requires this division. And even in the least civilized parts of the world, there is a division, to some extent, for everywhere there are certain duties assigned to one class of society, and certain other duties laid upon another class. There is in all nations a broad line of demarcation between labor in the house at home, and labor out of doors; between influences exercised within the family, and without the family; between taking care of the family within the house, and providing for it, and taking care of its interests, by thought, labor, and other exertions, in the field, the shop, the store, and the assembly. God has made a distinction in duties; the Author of nature has informed us to whom these respective duties shall be assigned, by the distinction of sex. This distinction of duties, and of rights also, will exist as long as the human race shall retain their present nature. It can never be altered or repealed; it cannot be ignored or tampered with, without causing great confusion and mischief. On this ground, therefore, I hold that women have no natural right to vote, or to represent the family in the body politic. The family has a right to be represented in the state, and nature teaches which class this representative shall come from. And as there is a perfect unity of interests in the family, there should be, and there is, no want of a representation of the interests of the women and the children belonging to the family. Whenever and wherever you have a free government, and Christian morality pervades society to a considerable extent—and you cannot have a free government anywhere else—there the rights of woman will be guarded and secured, by securing and guarding the rights of the family. And there is no use in talking about the rights of woman or of man, unless there is morality and religious principle enough to secure the permanency of such a government.

One or two objections come up at this point, which it may be well to dispose of, before taking up another division of the general subject. The first objection is, that there are voters who are not heads of families, and who do not, in fact, represent families. This is granted, but in the best state of society, marriage generally takes place in early life. It was so in early times; such was the fact among the Hebrews, where the tone and condition of morals was higher than among the surrounding nations; and with the early settlers of our country, early marriages were encouraged. The same thing prevails now in all our new settlements, and it was almost universal here until very recently. Indeed, it is still true, that the vast majority are married in a few years after attaining to their majority. I believe this comes to pass in accordance with a beneficent law of our nature, which should not be resisted or evaded, whatever may be the demands of fashion, or of family pride. Whatever may be the sympathies or antipathies of nature in regard to other things, I must say, with all proper respect for my bachelor friends, that nature does abhor celibacy. It is proper that men and women should be married; and, as a general rule, whenever considerations of a mercenary or fashionable nature do not interpose a barrier, they marry in early life. In consequence, men become heads of families while they are still young, so that the objection cannot affect the general rule, except to confirm it. Besides, it is very well for young men still under the parental roof, who are soon to become heads of families, to have an opportunity to commence the exercise of the right of suffrage, and thus become familiar with some of the most important duties of life.

Again, it will be objected that there are widows and maiden ladies, who have no fathers or brothers to represent them. But cases of that kind are very rare, in comparison with the whole number of females in the State. Nearly all have fathers, brothers, or sons, who may and do represent them, if they have no husbands; and the few who have no near relations are so united with all others of their sex, that when the rights of womankind in general are secured, their rights are guarded also.

Thus, it appears, that by basing the state on families, and by securing the equal representation of these families as units, the rights, privileges, and immunities of all, even the humblest and weakest, are placed under the most sacred and vigilant guardianship. And we see, also, that as the beneficent Author of nature has laid the foundation of human government in human nature, so, likewise, has he laid the basis of free government, in the family institution, and thus indicated not only his design, but his determination also, that free governments shall finally be established among all peoples.

Though fearing that this point has not been so stated and explained as to be fully understood, I hasten to the second part of my subject, which is this, that women, not only have no natural right to vote, and to represent the family in the state, but that it would be of no use to them if they should have it, and should attempt to put it in exercise. Where men are not willing to recognize a right of this kind, supposing such a right to exist, it is vain for women to attempt the exercise of it; it is useless to claim it, for it cannot be used. Even in this Commonwealth, where you cannot deed away certain kinds of property without a wife's consent, there are men who would urge and tease, threaten and cajole, perhaps deceive, and descend to unworthy arts, in order to coerce her into signing a deed. And I have heard of a man, a very respectable man too, who after hearing of a lady who declined to sign a deed, said in a menacing and threatening tone: "I would like to see my wife refuse to sign a deed under such circumstances." It is to be hoped, however, that cases of this kind are rare, in our community, since they are so cruel, mean and disgraceful, to whoever may be guilty of them. But where civilization and Christian morality has not prevailed to any considerable degree; where mankind are still under the sway of the appetites and passions, what success could woman hope for in claiming rights which man might not be disposed to yield? In all cases where there might be a clashing between the claims of women and of men, the latter, being superior in physical force, would prevail, and it would be dangerous for women to attempt serious opposition. The attempt to assert and use such a right—one so essential to government—would lead uncivilized man to exert his brute power, to put woman in a state of subjection. In such a state of society it would be preposterous to think of securing the right of suffrage to the weaker sex. But on the other hand, just so soon as society advances so far that men are willing to accord to women all their just rights, there is no use in granting them the right to vote; there is no use in their having the right of suffrage; because in that case, by the supposition, the stronger sex would be ready to make all laws necessary for the protection, safety, and honor of the less strong. Thus it stands then; where man is not willing that woman should vote, the exercise of that right, if she should dare to exercise it, would lead to confusion, strife, and violence in families; and as soon as he should be willing to accord to her that right, provided it was her natural right, then woman's rights, pretensions, and desires, would all be consulted and cared for, in town meetings, and in the assembly of the great and general court, as well as in such a convention of the people as this. Now, Sir, it is my belief, that the men of this Commonwealth are entirely willing and ready to accord to the women in it—their mothers, sisters, wives and daughters—all their natural rights, and to protect them in the use, and exercise of these rights, by their own right arms, and by all the force of the State. This being the case, they are just as ready and willing to pass all good and wholesome laws, for the sake of protecting the property, the persons, the honor and the lives of those who are dear to them as their own lives. In either case, therefore, the right of suffrage, if she possessed it, would be useless to woman.

Time forbids my pursuing this argument farther, therefore, merely throwing it out, I pass to the third point, which is, that women do not need the right of suffrage. It is not necessary for them to vote in order to secure their rights, protection, reputation, and influence. The way is open for them to exert power enough at present; and avenues to employment, usefulness and honor, are spreading before them on every side. It may be that they are passing into some departments of business, where they will be subject to influences of injurious tendency. I am free to confess, that I am not particularly anxious that young girls should become clerks in our stores, unless they are to inaugurate a different kind of trade and of morality from that which prevails in some quarters. If they are to be initiated into all the tricks of trade, and become familiar with all that petty rascality, which is sure to cheat all buyers except those who are adepts in the art of cheapening goods, then it is very questionable policy, to bring them into this line of business. If, on the contrary, they can introduce a new order of things, and put an end to the chaffering and the deception which is too common; if they can establish such an order of things, that a person ignorant of the value of articles, a child, or a blind man, will be able to make as good a trade as one who is acquainted with the quality and the market price of goods, then the practice of employing them in stores should be hailed with lively hope.

Wednesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS. — MARVIN — KINGMAN.

[July 13th.

But passing this, there are openings on every hand, into which they may enter with the prospect of success. Omitting housework, and the various uses of the needle, some are already betaking themselves to the fine arts. It has been found that they are accomplished engravers on wood, and other substances, and thus a noble field of exertion is before them. There is an increasing demand for their skill in the use of the brush and the pencil. A wide field in the great domain of authorship is theirs by a peculiar right, because they can cultivate it with the greatest success. It is a fair field, adorned with flowers of delicate hue and delicious fragrance, and bearing precious fruits. The number of female authors in our country, who can secure intelligent readers, is rapidly increasing; many of them are prized wherever the English language is spoken, and one of them has recently acquired a universal reputation. Besides, the important and almost sacred employment of teaching, is fast passing into the hands of young ladies. The tendency is that way, and the obvious propriety of the thing is such, that this tendency will be permanent. Thousands will thus find a business as honorable as that of the lawyer or the legislator. But I must refer to another employment in which they may engage, and that is designing. Of all the designs of this designing age, I regard the School of Design as among the best, and most worthy of encouragement. I heard of its formation with delight, and it is my earnest desire that the young women of New England, and throughout the country, may engage in the business, and cultivate the art of designing, not only that they may thus obtain the means of independence, but may also aid in diffusing, among all classes, the idea of beauty, and the love for it, which dwells in their minds, as a general thing, far more fully than in the minds of men. I want the time to come when the figures on our carpets, and on the walls of our rooms, and on the beautifully flowing garments of our ladies, shall have a design, and convey an idea. Why should not this art be cultivated until all the rooms of our dwellings should become picture galleries—cheap, indeed, but beautiful? Look at the figures which now cover the greater part of our carpeting, papering, and apparel, and you will find that they are not only an unmeaning, endless maze, but will consider yourself fortun-nate if your eyes are not forced with pain to turn away from the crooks and turns, the cycles and epicycles, the orbs on orbs, having no beginning, ending nowhere, and conveying no meaning.

But passing all this, the great sphere of woman, after all, is at home, with her family—with her husband, and among her children. And if she wishes to increase and strengthen her influence in the community, and over society, there is a sure and direct road to that result, as it is entirely within her power to form and control those who are to be the makers, the interpreters, and the administrators of our laws. It is quite as honorable, also, to attend assiduously to the great task of making a household comfortable and happy, as it is to vote in town meeting, be a representative to the legislature, or contend at the bar; it is quite as elevated an employment, intrinsically considered, to bring up a family of children so that they shall be good citizens, as it is to represent a district in congress. Let us get rid of this false standard of honor, Sir, by which certain pursuits and positions are called honorable, par excellence, while they are no more exalted in their nature, and require no more virtues and abilities in those who follow and occupy them, than many others. As much taste, as much judgment, as much goodness, may be shown in the varied affairs of the household, as in polishing a song or a sonnet, delivering an eloquent speech, or preaching a good sermon. Nor is there any reason why women should complain that their influence is too limited, and I am glad to know that but a small portion of them join in such complaints. Why, Sir, I venture to say that every member of this Convention, from the eldest to the youngest, is pretty much such a man as his mother made him. His mind received its tone and bias from her, so that all his power, all his acquisitions, are now, in the maturity of his faculties, under the control of influences which she set in motion. In illustration of this, take the remark of Napoleon, that France needed mothers. He did not mean, as some have supposed, that France needed mothers merely to raise up soldiers, to replenish the endless drain made by his wars; that was not his idea. He felt that France needed mothers to train up children to be intelligent and virtuous citizens. It is probable that he was essentially a republican in his ideas, but he soon found out, what all the world have learned since his day, that it was impossible to establish a free government in France. He knew that self-government was impossible in that country, until it was filled with reasonable, moral, and religious women. When that comes to pass, France will be a free country, and republican institutions will take root on her soil. It has been lamented here, that France is without local institutions, like our towns, where the people might learn, in the management of their local affairs, the art of self-government. I wish they had such municipalities, but if I supposed that liberty was not to be enjoyed in France until she could possess these local governments, I should be forced to believe that the time of her deliverance would not come until a period beyond which the farthest ken of the most far-seeing prophet never reached. Liberty, if it comes at all to France, must come through the spread of truth, and by the instrumentality of free, independent religious societies, and of virtuous families. In the family, which is the germ of the state and the church, must the seed of liberty and virtue be sown; in the family must the basis of free government be laid, by the education of intelligent and virtuous children. You might as well attempt to place the granite shaft which rears its lofty summit from Bunker Hill, on the heaving billows of the Atlantic, as to build up republicanism in France, without the aid of such mothers as I have spoken of. To such mothers, to women of this stamp, who have never sought the notoriety of public life, and never panted for the "high places of the field," we are greatly indebted for the liberties we enjoy; and so long as their daughters follow in their footsteps, we shall have freedom and justice, liberty and law. Good mothers never nursed the tools of tyrants, and they never will.

I have thus, Sir, just touched upon a subject which requires a treatise for its elucidation. I have dealt with it seriously, both because it is a matter of importance, and because those who have brought it to our notice should be treated with respect. When women come before us with complaints, they do not wish to be turned off with compliments; when they make a demand for what they consider their rights, they will not feel satisfied with flatteries; when they come with words of remonstrance, it will not suit their purpose to be answered with honied words. On this account I have endeavored, in as brief a space as possible, to show that they are suffering under no wrongs, disabilities, or restraints, which we, as a Convention, can remedy.

In conclusion, I only ask a moment of time for the sake of recapitulation, and then I will relieve the patience of the Committee, with thanks for the attention with which my remarks have been heard. I maintain, then, in the first place, that while women have a perfect right to be represented in the body politic, they have no natural right to vote, or to be eligible to office as representatives, since all their rights are secured by securing the rights of the family; of which family, the father and husband is the natural representative, in its connection with the state. In the second place, that the right to vote, if possessed, would be of no use to women, since, in a bad state of society, they would not dare to exercise it; while in a country where justice and courtesy prevailed, their fathers, brothers, husbands, and sons, would make such laws as would promote their highest welfare. And lastly, that they do not need any such right, since their Creator has given them a sphere to fill which will task all their powers, enable them to exert a commanding influence not only in social life, but on the policy of the nation, and satisfy the cravings of the most pure and exalted ambition.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater. I suppose, Sir, that it is the intention of this Committee and of the Convention, to dispose of this subject rather summarily. I wish to say a word or two upon the subject, and I will not detain the Committee more than ten minutes—perhaps not half of it. I wish simply to bear my testimony to the principle which is involved in the amendment to the Report. I am in favor of granting the prayer of the petitioners, and therefore I am opposed to the Report of the Committee as it was originally made. The honorable gentleman for Berlin, in alluding to this subject in the discussion of another, remarked that women were precluded from voting by the arrangement of nature; and to illustrate that idea he went on—I will not pretend to use his language, but I will endeavor not to do violence to his ideas—he went on to illustrate it by saying that Providence had arranged the human race into families, and that government was necessarily put over the family. Every family must have a head; and that head must be controlled by one will, and that will is the true representative of the family. I submit to this Committee, that if the ruling will is the true representative of the family, there should in many cases be a considerable number of female electors. I believe, Sir, for one,—and I appeal to the observation of the honorable gentleman for Berlin, and other gentlemen present, if in quite a large number of instances the ruling will of the family is not the female will. [Laughter.] Therefore, according to that idea, woman should be the true representative of the family; she should be the elector and the voter. Now I dissent entirely from that conclusion. Another very distinguished gentleman, from Pittsfield, in alluding to this subject in the early part of our session, said that females were now governors. I submit, then, that if they are governors, where is the right of denying them the privilege of being electors? The gentleman who has, addressed the Committee this morning, carried out the same idea with the gentleman for Berlin, that the head, or ruling will, is the representative of the family. The gentleman did not go into details very much; but he carried the idea to my mind that a young man who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and who has no family, has no right to vote, because he is a member of his father's family, and the father is the representative of the whole family. But let me suppose a case, of a widow, who may have a large family of children, and may own a considerable amount of property; and let me ask, if the right of representation lies in the family, who is to represent that family? But, it may be said that they have rights to be protected, and that they will be protected in the same manner that other people's rights are protected. Now if the ground is to be taken that rights may be protected without representation, let me ask what necessity there is that clergymen should vote. (I understand the gentleman who argued the other side, to be a clergyman.) Would not their rights be as well protected as the rights of women are, without their having anything to do with it? They might, perhaps, be well excluded from participation in political affairs, because they have another work to perform—to sustain and support another and a higher kingdom.

Wednesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS. — KINGMAN — MARVIN — WALKER.

[July 13th.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that the time has arrived which was appointed for taking the question.

Mr. KINGMAN. If it will be in order, I will move that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the yeas and nays cannot be called in Committee of the Whole. The Chair will further remark that the motion of the gentleman from Winchendon is not now in order, it being merely a motion to strike out, while the motion of the gentleman from Boylston is a motion to strike out and insert, which, therefore takes precedence. After the question shall have been taken on the motion of the gentleman from Boylston, the motion of the gentleman from Winchendon will be in order.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Whitney, of Boylston, being to strike out all of the Report of the Committee after the word "that," and to insert the words "the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted;" and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MARVIN then moved to strike out all of the Report of the Committee between the word "that" in the first line, and the word "and" in the last line but one, so that the Report as amended would read as follows: "that it is inexpedient for this Convention to take any action in relation thereto."

The question being taken, upon a division, there were—ayes, 108; noes, 44—so the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth, moved that the Committee now rise, and report to the Convention that the Report of the Committee, as amended, ought to be adopted.

The motion was agreed to. The Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

—THE CONVENTION,

The chairman, Mr. Butler, of Lowell, reported accordingly.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, Mr. President: I hope that the amendment which has been reported by the Committee of the Whole will not be adopted by the Convention, but that we shall agree to accept the whole Report as it is. It was adopted by the Committee with very great unanimity; I do not know that there was any objection to it, except from one member, who proposed that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted. With that exception, the Committee were unanimous, and I certainly hope that there will be a like unanimity in the Convention. It was the feeling of the Committee that these petitioners ought to be treated with respect, and as they asked for something that had never been proposed before, it was thought proper that reasons should be given why their request should not be granted. We have, therefore, given reasons such as are set forth in this Report, viz.: that we did not consider ourselves called upon to act in the case,—the circumstances in which we were placed did not demand of us any decision with regard to the several positions which the petitioners took when they appeared before the Committee.

These positions were:—

1. That women are human beings, and therefore have human rights, one of which, is, that of having a voice in the government under which they live, and in the enactment of laws they are bound to obey.

2. That women have interests and rights, which are not, in fact, and never will be, sufficiently guarded by governments in which they are not allowed any political influence.

3. That they are taxed, and therefore, since taxation and the right of representation are admitted to be inseparable, they have a right to be represented.

4. That so far as education and general intelligence are concerned, they are as well qualified to exercise the elective franchise, as many who now enjoy that right.

5. That in mental capacity and moral endowments, they are not inferior to many who now participate in the affairs of government.

6. That there is nothing in their peculiar position, or appropriate duties, which prevents them from taking a part in political affairs.

The Committee did not attempt to decide upon the truth or fallacy of these positions. It was enough for them to know that only some two thousand out of two hundred thousand of the women of Massachusetts asked for enfranchisement, and they believed, that under such circumstances, it was sufficient for this Convention to say, that the petitioners were so small a portion of the whole number of their sex, as not to impose on this body the necessity of acting in the premises. There the Committee have left the matter, and there I trust the Convention will leave it.

It does not seem incumbent on us to anticipate the wants of the future, or to determine whether or not any share of political power may be allowed to women. If we turn to the history of any people, and make observation upon the past, we cannot fail to perceive that the position and influence of the female sex has been constantly increasing with the advancing civilization of every people. There has been a constant improvement and progress. Another important fact is, that the influence of woman is, and has been always in inverse ratio to the amount of brute force employed in the government under which they live. I suppose this to be a fixed law of nature, as much as any other law. If we compare the history of different countries it will appear that under those governments that are founded wholly on brute force, we find woman the most degraded, while under those governments into which the moral element is infused, as for example, the government of England, we find her enjoying a more exalted position, and exerting a wider influence. In this country, I suppose, that woman enjoys a higher position and greater social influence, than in any other country whatever, and this results from the fact that we have the least amount of brute force employed in the organization and administration of our government.

Now, if all this be true, are we prepared to say that the time may never come, or that it ought never to come when woman shall have any more political influence, in some form or other, than she now does? Are we certain that the female mind has arrived at its highest point, so far as its influence is concerned, and is never destined to go beyond what it is at present? I think not. I think that we should leave that question for the future to determine; and that it will eventually become a serious question, I have no manner of doubt. We are educating our females too well, if we do not intend that they should rise in social position and influence. The females of Massachusetts under the age of eighteen years, I have no hesitation in saying, as a whole, are educated better than the males. They are quite as apt to learn, and parents are quite as ambitious to educate their daughters as their sons.

Now, Sir, it is said that if women are to enter the arena of politics, it would destroy their influence in other respects, particularly in the domestic circle. I am not at this time disposed to argue that point; but I do say that I suppose a time may come, and a state of things may exist, in which they might enjoy political rights, and perform political duties, without in any respect

Wednesday,]

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.—HOOPER—WALKER—GREENE—MARVIN—DENTON.

[July 13th.

compromising either their dignity or their delicacy; and I am led to believe this from the peculiar characteristics of the sex, as developed in the Society of Friends. It is well known that this society allows their females to speak in public, and have a concurrent voice in all their affairs; and let me ask whether any one can say that the exercise of such right or privilege—call it either as you choose—has any unfavorable influence upon the female character among that very respectable portion of the community? On the other hand, do we anywhere find a finer intellectual, moral and social development of character, than among the females of that society? So far as my knowledge extends, I must say that I have never found a more exalted development of character, than amongst the females of that denomination of Christians. I do not think that we have the slightest evidence at all that the position the females of that society are allowed to occupy is derogatory to their influence or delicacy, or has the least tendency to lessen or impair that dignity and propriety of conduct and manners which, to all of us, is so much an object of admiration.

But, Sir, I have no wish to occupy the time of the Convention on this subject; and as the decision of the Convention on the matter is doubtless a forgone conclusion, I will only say that in my own mind, I fully concur in the Report of the Committee, and think it is proper that it should be adopted as it is by this Convention.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I would ask the chairman of the Committee that made this Report, whether the reason assigned for not granting the prayer of the petitioners is not simply the fact that a majority of the women of the State have not petitioned, and whether the inference from that, which I think is fairly deducible, is not that if the majority of the women of the State had so petitioned, their prayer would have been granted. It seems to me that such will be the inference which will inevitably go out from the adoption of the Report as it now is.

Mr. WALKER. I understand that the Convention, by the adoption of this Report, merely decide that when a majority of the women undertake to petition, their petition should be duly taken into consideration, and its prayer answered or denied, as the circumstances of the times, and the nature of the case, may suggest.

Mr. GREENE, of Brookfield. I did not expect again to say a single word to the Convention on this subject; but if the Convention will indulge me, I will not occupy more than ten or fifteen minutes, at most.

I think that if we adopt the motion of the gentleman from Winchendon, (Mr. Marvin,) to strike out the whole of this Report, except the words indicated, we shall neither be treating the petitioners themselves, nor the Committee that made the Report, with the courtesy which, to my mind, appears to be due to both.

There are two things which I desire to say. In the first place, I have heard it denied that the Convention has the right to submit the proposed amendments of the Constitution to the whole people, including women. I will only undertake, upon this head, to read a short extract from the act of the people themselves, decreeing that this Convention should be called. In the third section of the Act, I read as follows:—

"They (the Convention) may take into consideration the propriety and expediency of revising the present constitution of government of this Commonwealth, or the propriety and expediency of making any, and, if any, what alterations or amendments in the present constitution of government of this Commonwealth. And such alterations and amendments, when made and adopted by the said Convention, shall be submitted to the people for their ratification and adoption, in such manner as the said Convention may direct; and if ratified by the people in the manner directed by the said Convention, the Constitution shall be deemed and taken to be altered or amended accordingly."

The alterations and amendments are to be submitted to whom? To the legal voters? No, but to the "people." And how are they to be submitted? "In such manner as the Convention may direct." Evidently, the Convention has this whole matter under its own control; and it must be borne in mind, that the Convention has once for all determined, by a solemn vote, that women are "people."

Mark you! I repeat that the Act does not say, "shall be submitted to the legal voters," but "shall be submitted to the people." If it be said that the word "people" is used in the sense implied by the present state of things, I have to remark that such an idea is altogether erroneous, for the reason that in other parts of the Act there is an essential distinction made between the people and those who are qualified to vote. I adduce the following words in confirmation of my statement:—

"The inhabitants of the several cities, towns, districts and places, within this Commonwealth, qualified to vote for senators or representatives in the general court, shall, on the second Monday of November next, at the meetings to be then held in the several cities and towns in the Commonwealth, for the choice of governor, lieutenant-governor, senators, and representatives in the general court," &c.

The Act calling this Convention was enacted by whom? By the whole people? No, but by the legal voters—by that portion only of the people who are qualified to vote for senators and representatives. The Act does not pretend to bear the direct sanction of the whole people; and because a strong qualification exists in this passage, the distinction exists which I am endeavoring to point out. For there is a wide difference between the act of the people and the act of their representatives, the legal voters.

Secondly, I would have the Convention bear in mind that we are now acting on first principles; and I take it that the question which is here raised as to the right of the Convention to submit this matter to the people, is the same which was so thoroughly discussed when the Berlin question was under consideration; and I take it also that, on that memorable occasion, the backbone of Absolutism in this Commonwealth was snapped asunder, right in the hollow, never again to be knit together, so long as the world stands.

The gentleman from Winchendon tells us that the government of the Commonwealth is founded, not on the individual, but on the family. He says that if the doctrine contained in the Bill of Rights be true, and worthy of the consideration of this Convention, then no argument can be maintained in opposition to the arguments of those who advocate the rights of women. I grant that he is correct in that; but he says that it is the family which is the foundation of the government, and that the doctrine in the Bill of Rights is all false; and the gentleman for Berlin, if I correctly understand him, maintains the same ground. Now, if the doctrine of the Bill of Rights is a humbug and an imposition upon the people; if that is so—and gentlemen would seem very strongly to imply it—then change your Bill of Rights, and come out like men. Face the music, gentlemen! and say: "We have all been wrong; it is all nonsense to stand upon the democratic doctrine of the Bill of Rights." I do not understand this new dogma, that there is a divine right in the family; but I know that it is not the old, authentic tradition of democracy. Let it be explained, therefore, so that we may take up our work from the beginning, and make a Constitution that is based on some principle. Let us be consistent.

Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, for the remark, but I must say, that there is nothing I like so much as to see things done clean. Let democracy have her perfect work, and if the Bill of Rights is a humbug and an imposition, let us say so, that we may know where we all stand. If, on the other hand, it shall appear that the declared principles of democracy are no humbug, but the contrary, then say that, and stand by your affirmation. Sir, the declarations contained in the Bill of Rights smite on the ear of the people like the blast of an awakening trumpet. Let the man say it that dares, that the natural, inalienable and indefeasible rights do not inhere in the individual, which the Bill of Rights attributes to the individual; let the man who will say that, face the people! For my part, I will never confess that man has no natural, inalienable and indefeasible political rights, if he be not at the head of a family. I stand by the old democratic dogma, and by all the consequences that flow from it.

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. I desire to say a few words upon this matter, and—

Mr. DENTON, of Chelsea. I rise to a question of order. Was there not a special order assigned for this day at ten o'clock?

The PRESIDENT. There was—the Report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DENTON. Then as it is now after ten o'clock, I call for the special assignment.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. This question will be settled in a very few minutes, and I think it had better be proceeded with until disposed of, so as to save further time in debating it.

Mr. DENTON. If there is a probability of this matter coming to a speedy termination, I will not persist in the demand for the special assignment, but I do think it is time we should proceed to the substantial business for which we are met. I withdraw the call for the special assignment, hoping this business will be disposed of in a few minutes.

Mr. MARVIN. The gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) a few moments ago, said that it was discourteous to the petitioners as well as to the Committee, to strike out so much of this Report as was stricken out upon a motion made by myself. In reply to that remark, I think it is hardly necessary for me to assure either that gentleman particularly or the Convention generally, that I disclaim any intention of discourtesy towards either of the parties named, in the motion which I made. I am not very

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — MARVIN — WHITNEY — HOOPER — DANA.

[July 13th.]

well acquainted with the rules of proceeding in such bodies as this, but I certainly had no idea of anything of the kind. I need not say that for womanhood I have the highest possible respect. I do not know any of the petitioners, but I will say this, that I never treated a woman with disrespect in my life, and trust that I never shall.

In regard to the Report itself, I think it is a very ingenious one; the idea of it, as far as I can understand it is, that while we are not disposed to give the petitioners any relief, there are very good reasons why we ought to take the prayer of their petition into consideration. I suppose that this is just exactly what these women desire—all that at this time they had expected or hoped for, viz.: that the Convention should say that they had no reason to give why their demands should not be acceded to. If the Convention wishes this Report to be thus understood, as it unquestionably will be, so be it; but I trust the Convention will not so stultify itself. I said that the Report was ingenious, and so it is. It conveys the idea I have just intimated, and the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) has given plausible reasons why the prayer of the petitioners should be granted; and his remarks, taken in conjunction with the Report itself, seem to me to concede everything that is asked for. The case, then, stands thus. If we restore the Report as it was, we shall commit the folly of denying the prayer of the petitioners, while virtually confessing that the argument is in their favor.

A word now in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Brookfield, (Mr. Greene.) He seemed to entertain the idea that from the remarks I had made, I had given up the old democratic doctrine of the sovereignty of the people. I have done no such thing. I say that the doctrine maintained by that gentleman is founded upon the position that leads to this result—universal suffrage, without restriction as to age or sex; that if you give to women the right to vote on the ground that government is founded on individuals who have entered into compact, you must give the same right to children. They are a part of the people. But if you take the doctrine that the family is the basis of the State, and that the State is an aggregate of families, each having the right of representation, then the doctrine of our Bill of Rights is substantially true, because the family, as a unit, is represented by the man; and when you get down to families you get down to the foundation of society, the "hard pan" on which it securely rests; the primary, granitic stratum of free government; and you cannot in this Convention ever get below that. This appears to me to be the key which unlocks all the wards of this difficult question.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I think sufficient has been said upon this subject, and I therefore move the previous question.

The motion for the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered.

The question was first taken on agreeing to the amendment of the Report made in Committee of the Whole as reported to the Convention, and the amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurred on the acceptance of the Report as amended, and the Report was accepted.

Special Assignment.

On motion of Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the special assignment, being the resolves of the Committee on the Judiciary, in relation to the Election of Judges.

An amendment having been made to the resolves in Committee of the Whole, the pending question was upon concurring in the amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. I desire to modify the amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole and which was agreed to. I propose to strike out all after the word "court," in the third line, and insert the following words:—

Whenever a vacancy shall occur upon that bench, shall be elected by the qualified voters of the Commonwealth for the term of years, so arranged that two shall not be elected at the same time for the same term of years.

The resolve, if thus amended, will then read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is proper and expedient so to amend the Constitution as to provide that the justices of the supreme judicial court, whenever a vacancy shall occur upon that bench, shall be elected by the qualified voters of the Commonwealth for the term of years, so arranged that two shall not be elected at the same time for the same term of years.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. Mr. President. I suppose the Convention will agree with me, without argument, that the subject which we are now upon, is one of more enduring interest, and more universal concernment, than any that has been before us. It often happens, I may say it usually happens, that those subjects which are followed by the most serious consequences, are not those which attract at the moment the greatest attention. They come often, like the Kingdom of Heaven itself, without observation. So it would be if we should make this great fundamental change in our Constitution without full consideration.

Why, Mr. President, we propose to change one of the great organic departments of the government. The government of Massachusetts is divided into three departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The feature which most characterizes the judicial department, is the manner in which it obtains and holds its power, and that we propose to change essentially. A system which has existed in England from the birth of liberty to the present time; a system which has existed in Massachusetts from the origin of the State to this hour; a system which has existed in our national government from the beginning; a system which exists in nearly all New England, and in almost all of the States of the Union; a system under which our judiciary has grown up, and under which every man in the United States of America has grown into manhood—for those changes which have been made have not yet reared a generation—that system you threaten to subvert. And why? I ask, why?

It was said here when we came together, and it met the approbation of the Convention, and it has since been repeated frequently by judicious men, that we should make no change unless there was some abuse. Is it not a fundamental maxim of America, that no change should be made until you find an existing evil to be remedied? After achieving our independence, though smarting under the tyranny of England, almost hating the very name and sight of an Englishman, we yet adopted a Constitution very like that of England, more like it than any other that ever existed. Why? Because it was formed out of institutions which stood here. I take the liberty to say that the American system is this: a system which recognizes existing institutions; a system of adaptation; a system of reforming abuses. The American system is not to speculate, not to theorize, not to make experiments in government, but to take things as we find them, and adapt ourselves to them; to recognize the state of society and then make reforms where there are evils to be reformed. Now I ask how, this being our philosophy, do you propose to treat the judicial department? In the first place, is there any abuse existing? Has any man heard of an abuse? I have not heard of it. Has it been said in this Commonwealth that the judicial department has encroached upon the executive? I have never heard it. Has it been said that the judiciary has encroached upon the legislative department? Has it been said that the judicial department is oppressing the people? Nobody has ever whispered it. Has there been a petition to the legislature to change the Constitution in that particular? Petitions on other subjects have been presented; but I do not know of a single instance where a petition has been presented to either branch of the legislature, asking them to change the judiciary department. Is there a gentleman in this Convention who knows of an instance? Is there any indication of a popular wish that this should be done? You may read articles in the newspapers written by one man; but have we any indication that the public wishes any change here? I have looked in vain for any indication of the kind.

In the first place, I find a document emanating from a distinguished committee in 1852, of which the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) was chairman, on the subject of this proposed Convention. It takes up all the subjects which it is proposed to present to the people, on which it is supposed that the people desire a change. The first is the subject of the Senate, the second, the House of Representatives, the third, to provide for the election directly by the people of all officers now appointed by the governor and the council, "except those of a judicial character;" I see my friend from Northborough, (Mr. Burlingame,) has forgotten the character of the report to which his name stands second;—the fourth relates to the plurality system.

Then comes the report, and it takes up each one of these topics, and finally comes to the subject of the judiciary, and says:—

"The expediency of making other, and more important judicial offices elective, has received the careful consideration of the committee. On the one hand, the same argument which operates in favor of the election of other officers by the people, applies, to some extent, to our judges; besides, it is difficult to understand why the people are not as competent to select proper men for judicial offices, as they are to select the executive, who himself appoints all judicial officers. We have also the example of some of the principal States in the Union, where this practice has been adopted, and, so far as we can learn, is now in safe and successful operation. On the other hand, we have had, in the past history of our own Commonwealth, under the present system, a pure, upright, and learned judiciary, who have commanded the confidence and respect of all classes of the community, and whose decisions are quoted as high authority, in every State in the Union. And, deeming it unwise, in a matter touching the organic laws of the State, to tread upon doubtful ground; and, being unwilling to take a step, which, by any possibility, may tend to sully the purity, injure the character, or lessen the dignity of that department of the government, in the pure and learned administration of which, are involved the great interests of property, reputation, liberty, and life, whatever may be the private opinions of the committee, we do not now feel justified in recommending this important change. Should a Convention be called, we doubt not it would number among its members, many of the most distinguished men in the Commonwealth, men selected from the bench, the bar, as well as from the more common, but not less useful avocations of life. Men, who, by their age and practical learning, experience and observation, would be much better qualified to settle this important question than we can claim to be.

Wednesday.]

THE JUDICIARY. — DANA — KEYES.

[July 13th.

"It has been suggested, that judicial officers might be elected by the legislature, and their term of office be limited to a definite number of years, but our present judiciary system has worked so well, we feel unwilling at this time, to recommend even this change, preferring to leave this as well as the former branch of the same subject, to the wisdom of the Convention itself; it being our object to point out only those parts of the Constitution, where palpable defects exist, and where the remedy is not of a doubtful character. Every change is in itself an evil, and unless the ills we now suffer are greater than the evils inseparable from the change itself, it is not the part of wisdom to attempt to change our condition."

Then, Sir,—for I am not going to confine myself to documents,—I come to the political parties of the State. It is not, perhaps, necessary to say, that the Whig party, in its address, indicated no intention to make the judiciary elective. The Democratic party, in its address, after discussing the right of calling a Convention, says:—

"The objects we seek, through the agency of the Convention, are these:—" [Then follow seven subjects, numerically arranged.]

1. Election by the people, of Executive officers.
2. Single Senatorial Districts.
3. Restoration of Town Representation.
4. Districting the Cities.
5. Limitation of the sessions of the Legislature.
6. Establishment of the right of the people to alter the Constitution.
7. The Secret Ballot.

Nowhere is there an allusion to a change in the system of the judiciary.

Then, I have in my hand the address of another political party, not so large, nor always considered so healthy, as the other two. [Laughter.] It is dated January 29th, 1853, and sets forth as the purposes of this Convention:—

1. Reform in the Constitution of the House of Representatives.
2. Single Senatorial Districts.
3. Election of Councillors by the people.
4. Election, by the people, of Secretary of State, Treasurer, Auditor, Adjutant-General, Attorney-General, Sheriffs, and other officers where it is practicable, so as to "diminish the power and patronage of the Executive."
5. Limitation of the sessions of the Legislature.

6. Change in the mode of organizing the government, each year.

7. Change in the day of the annual election.

8. Assertion of the right of the people to revise the Constitution.

9. The Secret Ballot.

There is no indication here, of a change of the judicial system, no indication of an intention to increase the power of the executive, by giving him the right of appointing the judges every ten years, but, on the contrary, an indication of an intent to diminish that power and patronage. This address bears the signature of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) the gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) the gentleman from Duxbury, (Mr. Weston,) the gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) the gentleman from Lynn, (Mr. Alley,) the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Graves,) the gentleman from Fitchburg, (Mr. Wood,) the gentleman for Montague, (Mr. Alvord,) and the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis).

As regards offices, two things were proposed to be done: to elect certain officers, not being judges, and to diminish and not increase the power and patronage of the executive. We have, then, the voice of a majority of the legislature in 1852, and the voice of two of the great parties in 1853, in favor of this Convention; and I look in vain for the slightest indication of any intention to change the tenure of the judicial department. I do not wonder, therefore, that my friend from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) said yesterday, that he could not vote for an elective judiciary without an appearance of something like bad faith. He told this Convention, and he told them truly, that by his addresses and speeches, and by the one hundred and fifty letters—I sympathize with him—which he had written to all parts of the Commonwealth on the subject of this Convention, he was so committed against an elective judiciary that he could not sustain it here. But he does not stand alone. If there is any gentleman of prominence enough to be noticed, who has gone into one town of Massachusetts, and presented the case of this Convention, and included in the issue an elective judiciary, I should like to know who and where he is. Every gentleman to whom I have spoken, has told me that he has done no such thing, but quite the contrary,—that he has studiously avoided raising that issue.

Let us recollect the history of this Convention. In 1851 the proposition for a Convention was rejected by a majority of some four thousand, and it was very doubtful whether it would be adopted in 1852. It was therefore necessary to conciliate all persons. I do not wish to state it upon my own knowledge, but I put it to the honor of every man, whether this question of a Convention was not put to the people last November upon an understanding that the judiciary should not be changed; whether there were not thousands of votes obtained throughout the State for this Convention, which would not have been given if it had been understood that an attack was to be made upon the judiciary system? I confess that is not precisely the appearance with which I should wish to see so great a change auspicated.

But I do not confine myself to the subject of an elective judiciary, for there are two propositions, the one is to make it elective, and the other is to limit the tenure of office.

Mr. KEYES, (interrupting). There has been some reference, not only to-day, but heretofore, to names and signatures appended to certain papers, and I would not weaken any argument the gentleman proposes to found upon it, but I trust he has a great many better ones behind, for if he has not he will surely fail in his efforts. I trust that this Convention is not going to take these papers as the charter upon which they are to act. Now my name, in favor of calling this Convention, appears upon one of those documents, and thus I appear to assent to some things to which I am opposed; for instance, the principle of electing by plurality, to which I always was, and now am, opposed. But, Sir, I did not consider that in voting for that we were making a charter for this Convention. That we were to strictly carry out the provisions recommended in that address,—that we were neither to endorse anything that was not contained in that address, nor to refuse to pass anything that was contained in it.

Now, Sir, it is well known to the gentleman for Manchester, as it is to every-body else, that political parties are always cowardly. As he said, the Convention failed at the first trial, and we had to be very careful what we proposed to the people in order to get their endorsement upon the second trial. We knew that this question of an elective judiciary would be made a bugbear of then, as I am afraid it is going to be now. We knew that the Whig party would go unitedly against any such measure, and that if we put this forward as a prominent feature of reform we could not get the proposition for calling a Convention endorsed by the people.

But, Sir, I do not think it necessarily follows that we are to take that address as our charter. I do not think that is to be the procrustean bed upon which we are to be stretched; if it is, I am afraid my friend for Manchester would find that his limbs, though not very long, would be cut off. [Laughter.]

I do not wish to interfere at all with the gentleman's line of argument; but so far as I am concerned, I wish to say to the Convention that I do not consider myself at all bound by what is contained in that address.

Mr. DANA. If the gentleman had considered the line of my argument, he would see that I was speaking of the absence of a public call for this change; and that I proved it by showing the manner in which the issues had been brought before the people by leading public men. I said that in view of the manner in which this Convention was called, and the inducements held out to the people to vote for it, this proposition to change our judicial system did not come up under auspices the most desirable. I do not expect to hold gentlemen strictly to their signatures.

The twenty-ninth article of the Bill of Rights says:—

"It is essential to the preservation of the rights of every individual, his life, liberty, property and character, that there be an impartial interpretation of the laws and administration of justice. It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial and independent as the lot of humanity will admit. It is therefore not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, and of every citizen, that the judges of the supreme judicial court should hold their offices as long as they behave themselves well."

Now, I say, the amendment of the gentleman

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—DANA.

[July 13th.]

from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) is fundamental in its character; because it changes a provision which has existed since 1780, and which, since 1780, we have declared to be essential to the security of the rights of the people and of every citizen. He proposes to place the judicial department more or less under the control and patronage of the executive.

Now, Sir, did it ever happen that such fundamental changes were made by the representatives without some notice of a desire upon the part of the people that they should be made? Do such changes come from the people with no note of preparation, no petition, no resolution, no speech, no public meeting, no signature, no address, with no man daring to open his mouth in a public meeting and speak for them? Was there so great a public demand for the change, such a rush of public sentiment, calling for the change, and yet five months ago the boldest dare not advocate it before the people?

Now, Sir, I am not particularly incredulous. My temperament rather inclines me to superstition than to skepticism, but it would require greater credulity than mine to believe that there is such a demand. If there be, the secrecy of it is the greatest miracle of the nineteenth century. It is very difficult to believe, that if such is the fact, even my friend from Natick, who feels the popular pulse better than most of us, should not have felt a single throb last November, nor a single throb last February, and yet that the public is now, with a fevered excitement, calling for this great change. I cannot believe it.

Why, Mr. President, what is the nature of the amendment proposed? I have said it was fundamental in its character, and to be sure it is. The judicial department, as it exists here, is a peculiarity of republican institutions. They have a judiciary in England, but they have it under very different circumstances from ours in the United States. The judiciary of England has no control over the acts of parliament. They have no right to pass upon any act of parliament and compare it with the constitution. They have no constitution there except as an idea,—they have no written or legal constitution. But in this country, the judiciary passes upon the validity of the acts of the legislature. It is a coördinate as well as independent department of the government. Yet, even in England, where they have not the same motive for making it independent, they have guarded it in every possible way.

You know, Mr. President, that up to the time of the Revolution, in 1688, the judges were dependent upon the crown for their appointment and for their tenure. The crown removed a judge whenever it pleased, and, therefore, the judges being dependent upon the crown, the people could not have as fair and impartial a tribunal as the lot of humanity would admit. After the Revolution, a clause was introduced into the Bill of Rights that the judges should hold their offices so long as they behaved themselves well—not a life tenure, for it is not the same thing, but so long as they behaved themselves well. They were liable to be removed by impeachment for misconduct official, or by the address of parliament for misconduct unofficial, or for any other cause. They were made responsible in an eminent degree, but they were made independent. They, however, went out upon what is technically called the "demise of the crown;" that is when the king died. This is very much such a rule as the gentleman from Natick proposes, that upon the demise of the executive, which is once a year, one or more judges shall be placed at the mercy of the crown. He provides that six judges shall go out in ten years, which, allowing for deaths, resignations, &c., would make about one a year, so that one judge of your supreme court, every year, will be at the mercy of the crown. Now in England they thought that was wrong. It left still a high degree of independence to the judiciary. As long as the king lived, the judges were absolutely independent of him. The judge had his salary, he had his office, and he held them entirely independent of the will of the king. But, then, each judge would feel that it might be that the king would die during his term of office, in which case, for one moment his office would be at the mercy of the crown. It might not be, and again it might be, that the king would die during his term of office. To prevent this chance affecting his impartiality, when George III. ascended the throne, at his majesty's own suggestion, a law passed providing that the judge's commission should survive the demise of the crown, so that in no case could the commission of the judge be placed at the mercy of the crown.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, (interrupting). I desire to ask the gentleman a single question. Was not the reason for the adoption of the law in England, to which he has just alluded, because upon the death of the king some time would elapse in the coronation of his successor, and in starting him in his government, in which, unless some such provision was made, there might be a failure in the administration of justice?

Mr. DANA. No, Sir; that was not the reason. The reason given by the king, was in these words, because "the independence of the judges is essential to the impartial administration of justice, best for the security of the liberties and rights of my subjects, and most conducive to the honor of the crown."

Now, I want the people of Massachusetts to-day, to be as magnanimous as that. We have the power—the people of Massachusetts have the power—to elect their judges every month or every year, if they choose, but I want them to come forward and show no less magnanimity than was shown by George III. I want them to recognize and act upon the principle that the "independence of the judiciary is essential to the impartial administration of justice, best for the security of the liberties and rights of the citizens, and most conducive to the honor of the state." Therefore let us surrender, as a people, that prerogative. Let us put upon us this SELF-RESTRAINT. There is no greater virtue in a free people than the willingness to exercise self-restraint.

When gentlemen tell me they are not afraid to trust the people,—and that is the favorite cry here; trust the people! trust the people!—I must say to them, that is not the issue. The question is, will not the people who have got the power, impose upon themselves some self-restraint? Is not that essential to republican government. Cicero once said that the Athenian Republic could no more exist without the Areopagus, than the world could exist without the providence of God. Now, Sir, a constitutional government can no more exist without a power to assert the supremacy of the Constitution, than the world can exist without the providence of God.

Sir, what is a Constitution? Why are we here, in a Convention, to revise one? Why are we taking the time and money of the Commonwealth, and our own, to make a Constitution? Is it not enough to have judges, legislatures and governors? The legislature is elected by the people, and why not trust the people? Why have a Constitution at all? Why not trust the people? I put it to those gentlemen, who ask me why I will not trust the people to elect your judges, to tell me why they do not trust the people to make our laws? You do not do it. The most radical man in this Convention would not trust the people to make the laws; but by our own will we impose upon ourselves a restraint. In the exercise of judgment, prompted by humanity and a sense of justice, we say we will make no laws except within the range and limit of that Constitution. And, further than that, we not only take care to say that we do not intend to do it, but we take care to provide against any possibility of our doing it. We provide a tribunal and give it the power of deciding, when we have passed a law, whether that law is in accordance with the Constitution or not. That is what the people do in making a Constitution, and when it is made, when our labors go out to the people and are ratified by them, the people take care that that Constitution shall not be changed except through a laborious, complex, and difficult process.

The legislature comes together every year, elected by the people, and makes laws. The government executes those laws. But notwithstanding all that, the poorest man in the Commonwealth—one man alone against the whole people of Massachusetts—can set those laws at defiance if they are not made in pursuance of the Constitution. The poorest woman, the alien, the infant in its cradle, is protected against the will of the majority of the people of Massachusetts. The foreigner, whoever he may be, barbarian, Scythian, bond or free, may assert and maintain a constitutional right against the will of the majority of the people of Massachusetts.

Now I ask if it is not the feature that distinguishes our republican government, that an individual has some rights against the powers that be—that the minority have some rights against the majority—that one man has rights which he may assert against the people? That is the great and honored distinction, and how are you to preserve it? It is not enough to say that it shall be preserved. There must be a power to preserve. That power is the judiciary. Every act passed by the legislature must undergo the scrutiny of that tribunal, and if it is not in pursuance of that higher law of the Constitution, it must be set aside. And for that reason, chiefly, I wish to have that judiciary made independent. Does not the essential theory of our government require it? It must be independent of the executive, otherwise, he will execute the laws as he pleases. It must be independent of the legislature, otherwise they will make such laws as they please. I have a right to demand that the governor shall not execute such laws as he pleases, but only such as the Constitution allows. I have a right to say that the majority of the people, upon sudden popular impulse, shall not do just what they choose to do, but only what the Constitution allows. If the majority of the people of Massachusetts, by any sudden caprice or passion, should insist upon taking my life, or liberty, or my property, without due process of law, I wish to be protected against it.

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—DANA.

[July 13th.

Mr. President: I can protect myself against one man, alone. The majority can always protect itself, but a single man needs to be protected against the multitude. The minority needs protection against the majority. And how can that be had, unless you establish a tribunal above the mere will of the majority? If you constitute the supreme court as that tribunal, how can it accomplish that purpose unless you make it independent, not only of the executive but of the legislature, and of the temporary will of the majority of the people.

I have heard it said, and I think it has been said by some one upon this floor, that our ancestors, John Adams, John Hancock, and those who made the Constitution of 1780, blindly followed the English precedent, and adopted an independent judiciary as they found it in England, where it was made independent to prevent the encroachments of the crown, and that they had sought to make it independent here where the same reason does not exist. Now, Sir, I undertake to say, not upon my own judgment alone, but upon the judgment of the soundest men in this republic, who ever have written or spoken upon this subject, that an independent judiciary is more important in a republic than it is in a monarchy. Sir, I repeat, without fear of intelligent contradiction, that an independent judiciary is more important in a republic than in a monarchy. And why? In a monarchy, you may always appeal from the sovereign to the people. In a monarchy, the power is lodged with the sovereign, and you may always appeal from him to the people, even if the judiciary is false. But I ask you, in this country, where the people are sovereign, to whom is a man to appeal from the people? Where does an appeal lie, this side of Heaven, from the majority of the people? Suppose a popular majority carry through the legislature a law which infringes upon the rights of an individual, I ask any gentleman to tell me where that man's appeal lies against the will of the popular majority? Sir, it lies nowhere unless we can have a judiciary independent of the changes of a popular majority. We can have no protection for the Constitution unless we make independent our guardian, the judiciary, which is to say whether a law is constitutional or not, and say whether the executive executes that law constitutionally or not. If we go from hence, not leaving behind us as independent judiciary, our labor in this Convention is in vain.

Having spoken of the history of this institution in England, I wish to call the attention of the Convention, one moment, to the history of the institution in America. In 1780, our ancestors adopted their State Constitution, in which they declared it was essential that the judges should hold their offices as long as they behaved themselves well. I wish to know if John Adams, and James Bowdoin, and John Hancock, who made the Constitution of 1780, with halters about their necks, followed blindly the English precedent? I wish to know if they did not feel, as keenly as we do to-day, that they were exempt from English precedents? They did understand that matter fully. They knew that in a republic, there was no appeal from the sudden action of the sovereign people, unless to a judiciary; whereas, in a monarchy, there is an appeal from the sovereign to the people. They knew that we had a Constitution which the judiciary must pass upon; whereas, in a monarchy, they have no constitution for any judiciary to pass upon. For these two reasons, they saw that it was even more important to have an independent judiciary in a republic than in a monarchy. Such is the language of Chief Justice Marshall, of Story, Kent, Hamilton, Jay and Madison.

When the Constitution of the United States was formed, the resolution giving the judges a tenure during good behavior passed by an unanimous vote. As much as they differed in all other subjects, when they came to the question of an independent judiciary and the good behavior tenure, there was an unanimous vote of the Convention in its favor. That system has continued from that time to the present day. Such, too, is the Constitution of New Hampshire, of Connecticut, and of many other States of the Union. In Rhode Island, it is substantially the same. I grant you that the experiment of an elective judiciary, for short terms, is in the course of trial in several States. It has not yet been tried, for you cannot try an experiment of this sort until a whole generation has grown up under it. That has not been done. We have grown up under an independent judiciary. Our noble institutions—the security of life, liberty and property here—have been acquired under an independent judiciary. The experiment of a dependent judiciary has not been tried through one generation, or anything like it. It has been tried to some extent in New York and Maryland. I think the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) was quite right in saying that judicious persons from New York had advised us not to try the experiment of an elective judiciary in Massachusetts. I hold in my hands a letter from an eminent lawyer, in which he says:—

"It is short of the truth to say that their united influence (election and short terms) has brought our judiciary into decline and decay."

I have another letter, from one of the most distinguished men of the United States, resident in Maryland, who says:—

"It is generally admitted, in this State, I believe, that the change in our system has altogether disappointed the promises of its authors, and that if it could now come before the voters of the State, as an isolated question, it would be rejected by an immense majority."

There are gentlemen in this Convention who have been in Maryland within the year past, and who can bear testimony, I know, to the correctness of this statement. I saw an article in the New York Evening Post, the other day, in favor of an elective judiciary, which spoke volumes of warning to us. The writer was in favor of the elective judiciary as a matter of theory, but at the close of the article he advised the people of Massachusetts to be careful not to allow the election of judges to come at the same time with the election of the other officers, saying that what had been a fatal mistake in New York, and that the consequence had been that the judiciary had fallen into the political cauldron. That admission is inestimable. The result is admitted. The judiciary is in the political cauldron. The reasons assigned, I doubt. I do not believe that the judiciary has fallen into the political cauldron because it happens to be chosen on a particular day of the year. I believe it is the inevitable tendency of things, certainly in a State like New York, and will be the tendency of things almost everywhere. You recollect that, in New York, when the elective judiciary first went into operation the system worked very well. The first election was made irrespective of parties, and all parties came forward and nominated a mixed ticket. Nearly all the old judges were reelected, and every-body was delighted. The next year it was not quite so well managed; the next year less so; and now the system has fallen helplessly into the political mill—and the well is deep and there is nothing to draw with. The reason assigned is not sufficient, because, for the first two years, although elected on the same day with other officers, the judges were kept clear of all political connection. The march of political parties is irresistible, and office after office has fallen before that march. Although I am yet young, I can remember the time when the removal of postmasters by General Jackson was considered an enormity. I can remember when the removal of custom-house officers was considered an enormity. But the work of removals from office has gone on increasing, until, at last, every executive officer falls before the march of political parties. The spoils belong to the victors. The thirst for blood has come on, and is not to be slaked. The leviathan is not so tamed. Human nature is not to be thwarted by changing the day of the year upon which you are to elect your officers. All offices that parties can control, fall before them. How were the trustees of Harvard College to be chosen by the legislature? The first year they were chosen irrespective of parties; but the very next year the dominant party met in caucus, nominated an entire ticket, and carried it through. In New York, the Evening Post says, that judges have fallen into the political mill. They beg in New York that we shall not elect our judges on the 7th day of November, for fear the same thing will happen here. I say, make it surer than that. Let us not choose them at all, and so we must be safe.

It may be said by some persons, why should not it fall into the political mill? I think sound reasons can be given why it should not. The law must be independent of the changes of the popular will, because this same venerable Constitution, some of which, I trust, will remain, with or without its rust, says: "In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them, to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men."

I have heard arguments made on this floor upon the assumption that this is a government of men, and not of laws. But our Constitution says it is a government of laws, and not of men. I have heard gentlemen speak here, under these sacred auspices, as though whatever a majority chose to do at any time, was the law of the land. If so, we do not want any Constitution. The Constitution is designed for the protection of individuals and minorities against majorities, and therefore it is that the judiciary must not be made

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—DANA.

[July 13th.]

dependent upon the popular will. One party and another comes up, and then comes the third party, that sweeps the board. But these changes must not affect the organic law. One reason why they would affect the organic law I think to be this—that you would inevitably elect party judges. That has been done, and it will be done again. There is another danger I apprehend far more than this, and which has not been often adverted to. Take, for instance, the case of the “Maine Law,” as it is familiarly called. Suppose the judges of the supreme court were equally divided as to the constitutionality of that law. One of the three goes out of office at the end of this year, and the people of Massachusetts are to pass upon his reelection. If he is reelected that law perishes, but if another man, of a different opinion, is elected, that law survives. Earnest men will say, at the polls: “We admit that Judge Doe is a very good man, a very capable, and a very honest man, but you know that he believes that law unconstitutional. You know the terrible consequences of intemperance, and how it is spreading over this country. You know that it burns up human habitations faster than accident or crime burn up the habitations that the mechanic rears. We can give you a judge just as honest, just as capable, just as learned, whose opinions upon that subject we know to be correct. Now every vote for Judge Doe is a vote for ruin, though he is a good man; and every vote for Judge Roe is a vote for temperance, and happiness, and salvation.” How is that argument to be resisted? It will not be resisted. In times of great popular excitement, for a moral cause, or any other cause, it will not be resisted. Take the Fugitive Slave Law. Suppose the court equally divided upon that subject. A new judge is to be elected. Fugitive slave cases will come up before that court for a hearing. I wish to know if the people will not wish to ascertain something about the antecedents of their judges upon that subject. I wish to know whether they will vote in the dark. I tell you nay. The votes will be given for principle, and not for men. Yes, says my friend opposite, (Mr. Burlingame,) as I see by the nod of his head, he is ready for it now. That is young America. [Laughter.] “Principles, and not men,” will be the cry. Furthermore, the choice of the people will be considered as an expression of the law. If a majority of the people should vote for that judge, then it would be said that the people had spoken, and that they had instructed the court, and that the court must follow the voice of the people. I do not know but that the argument which I consider to be conclusive against the change, will operate on some minds in its favor; but let me beg every gentleman, before he allows himself to be influenced in that direction, to consider that he is not put here by his Maker to carry out his will upon the earth. The people of Massachusetts were not put here to carry out their will upon the earth. We were put here to do justice, to protect the weak, to resist the mighty, and to secure to each his right. The democratic doctrine that I know anything about, and that I respect, though I have not enrolled myself under that name, is not that which says that the people may do what they can and will, but that which declares every man equal before the law, and that he should have his right. I ask professed Democrats here, which of these two is the democratic doctrine: that every man may do his will, and that the majority may do whatever they can and will, or that every man, even the humblest, has his rights, and that under the Constitution all men, without distinction of caste, condition, property, or education, are equal, and that they all shall have their due before the law. We can now protect the rights of every man by saying to him, you have a tribunal, and if the multitude pursues you, you can flee to the horns of the altar and lay hold thereon. Although the avenger of blood may pursue you, and the multitude follow hard after you, lay hold for your life on the horns of the altar. We will give you a tribunal which shall protect you until the danger be overpast. That I understand to be the genius of our Constitution, and therefore it is, I say, that the judicial office should not be blown about by every wind of doctrine. Therefore it is that the people, by a transient vote of the majority, should not settle the law. They may make their law through the legislature, but, with the Constitution in my hand, I can say to the poorest and humblest man—the poor trembling African, to the foreigner, who has first landed on our shores, and who does not know his way through the streets of the city, and does not know the elements of our constitutional law—I can say to him: “You have come to a country where no man can oppress you, where the government, where the legislature, and where the people itself cannot oppress you. If a sudden movement of popular opinion should turn against you, and you should become odious, or stand in the way of their will or their interests, you may come to my humble office, and with a piece of paper no bigger than a man’s hand, I can set at defiance a majority of thousands of the people of Massachusetts. I can point to the Constitution. I can go to the tribunal and assert your rights.” “Aye,” says my client, “you may, but how do I know that that tribunal will assert it?” My answer is: “I admit, a tribunal would be of no use, unless it has power. It has the arm of the executive, it has the whole arm of the State to enforce its decrees.” “But,” says my poor client, “that is not enough. How do I know they will sustain that Constitution against a popular majority? How do I know they will sustain it against the legislature? Your legislature has passed a law abridging my liberty and taking away my property, and the people are bent upon executing it, and at once. How do I know, that your tribunal will stand against it?” I can give but one answer. I can say: “the men who formed this Constitution—wise, noble men—said it was essential to the preservation of the life and liberty of each man, that he should be tried by a tribunal as impartial and independent, as the lot of humanity will permit. Therefore they say, ‘the judges should hold the offices, so long as they behave themselves well.’” I say to him, that I admit it is said, that a man who controls the subsistence of a man may control his will; and we have provided, that the salaries of these judges cannot be touched while they are in office. I admit, that whoever can turn a man out of his office, may control his will,—not must control it, but may. Now, I say to the poor trembling suitor: “these men whom you see before you, hold their offices so long as they behave themselves well; they cannot be removed, nor can they in any way be affected in their persons, property, hopes or fears, for their decision in your case.”

But, if I had to say to him, here are these five judges, I hope they will do you justice, I believe they will, and I pray that they may; but I know, that two of them are candidates for reelection to-morrow, and party excitement runs high, and the feeling is very strong in the community; or if I had to say, that the Convention which had lately been in session, had provided that these judges should depend for their reappointment upon the executive, and he should ask me, how is the governor disposed? I must tell him, that the governor agrees in his views, with the people. The bill has been passed by the legislature and the governor has signed it, and he is to appoint one judge to-morrow, and the next day he is to recommit another or not, just as he may see fit. Now, I could not say to that man that he had as independent a tribunal as the lot of humanity would permit. I want to say to him that all the law can do to make the tribunal independent and impartial, has been done. I do not say that it will then be impartial. Our judges now, may not be impartial. They may be governed by social feelings, and to some extent they are. They may be governed by the influence of a clique to which they belong. That may be true; and so it will be under any system. That is human nature. Our Constitution has not said that every man shall be tried by an angelic tribunal; nor that every man shall be tried by a superhuman tribunal; but by a human tribunal, as impartial as the lot of humanity will permit. I cannot warrant judges against personal, social, and party feelings; but for that very reason, I do not want to add another and a certain operation of a power over his subsistence or his office.

And when this man has stood before our tribunal without fear, as far as a man can be without fear before his fellow men, and when he has gone away with justice done to him against the popular will; when that tribunal, standing higher than anything this side heaven, making the most noble exhibition that humanity can make—protecting the right of a single man against power—when that has been done, I turn to my grateful client and say: “now, I wish you to acknowledge that the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts deserves some gratitude for a self-imposed restraint. When the people of Massachusetts might have made a law which would have walked right over you; when the people of Massachusetts might have provided that there should be no tribunal and no Constitution, and nothing but the action of the public will; when they might have mocked you with a tribunal dependent upon the will of that very majority against which you are to be protected; when they might have mocked you with a tribunal dependent upon that very executive against whose enforcement you are to be protected, they have restrained themselves, and said,—in order that justice may be done to the weakest—in order that in any moment of excitement, in any hour of frenzy or mistake, we may not touch the hair of the head of the humblest man, we will give him a tribunal which shall be independent of the fluctuations of our opinions or passions.

Having shown gentlemen why we should have an independent judiciary, let them point to me one single reason why we should make the change. There is no popular demand for it, and there has been not one single case of complaint. We have the power of impeachment. How many

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—DANA.

[July 13th.

judges have been impeached in this State? Not one, in my day. Has a judge been removed by the legislature? But one, and none in my day. What does that indicate? It indicates that it has not been found necessary. And what does that indication prove? It proves that we have had a tribunal as impartial as the lot of humanity will permit. Our judges, let gentlemen bear in mind, are not irresponsible. They may be impeached; they may be removed by a vote of the legislature. Do gentlemen recollect that, at this moment, it requires no more power to remove a judge of the supreme court, than it does to change a man's name; that, on a vote of the two branches of the legislature, the governor can remove a judge of the supreme court; that a conviction in one tribunal, after impeachment by another, may remove him from all office forever? What more responsibility do gentlemen want? It is not a question of responsibility. It is a question of dependence. Now I admit, freely, that all these gentlemen who hold that there ought to be no Constitution practically; that there ought to be no tribunal independent of the changes of the popular will,—they ought to support an elective judiciary, and the sooner the better, and make them not elective once in ten years, but every year. They cannot stop short of that.

Tyranny is simple. It is as simple as the rule of three. But these complex governments in which liberty exists are not to be made or changed easily. They grow. Institutions, as was said by the gentleman for Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) grow out of men, and are not imposed upon men. Now, this institution has been hundreds of years in growing. We have lived under it to this day and without any complaint. I must take the liberty to say that if this Convention were to destroy this system with no complaint made against it, and should rush out upon the road of experiment, possessed by a mere theory, when there is no abuse to be remedied, it will be the rashest act that a sober community ever committed.

In New York the change was excusable; for they had suffered under their judicial system. They had suffered till the cup ran over. Although the abuses had no connection with the life tenure, yet I should not have thought it a very strange thing if they had thrown the entire judiciary overboard and done everything in town meeting. So it was in some other States where they have abolished the independent judiciary. But we have not suffered. No man, or woman, or child, can say that the judiciary has tyrannized over them, or encroached upon any other branch of the government. It has not been pretended.

I wish to say to this Convention that the judiciary is the feeblest department of the government, and needs protection. It is the feeblest department of the government. So say Hamilton, and Jay, and Madison; so says Marshall, so says Story, so say Kent and Rawle and all the writers on the Constitution. And is not that perfectly plain? What is the judiciary? It passes upon private questions between man and man. It interprets the laws. The powerful department of the government is that which makes the laws. The legislature holds the purse; the legislature creates offices; the legislature establishes the compensation; and in the legislature, distinction, conspicuity and political power are to be acquired. But the judiciary creates no offices; the judiciary fixes no compensation; the judiciary makes no laws. It has merely a voice and a head; it has no arm; it has no purse; it has no will. The legislature has a will, and the executive has an arm; but the judiciary has neither power nor will; it can only pronounce. When it has pronounced, it can only throw itself upon the executive to execute its decrees.

The judiciary is not the popular branch. It does its business in quiet and stillness, and with but little conspicuity. The legislature is the place where all men go who are bound on a course of popular preferment, and who wish to stand high in the popular affections. The judiciary has no strength except in the public confidence and in its own integrity.

Many persons have been prejudiced against the present system of the judiciary because of events which have occurred in our own State, within the last three years. Many have sat uneasily under the existing system, for they have thought that the judgments of the court have been construed against what they considered—and I agree with them—the true interpretation of the Constitution on the subject of fugitive slaves.

Now, I take it upon myself to say that I suffered as much in my feelings as any man under those decisions of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and of the circuit court of the United States. I thought them then, and I think them now, wrong. I say this with diffidence, after decisions in such places. But I can truly say that in my greatest distress there was one drop of comfort left me. I knew that those decisions came from men who were not making them for their judicial lives. I knew that they came from men who were not making them because their offices or salaries depended upon their making them.

I felt that we had a tribunal, not entirely impartial—I cannot say that, because it was a human tribunal—but a tribunal for which the law had done all it could do to make it impartial. I knew, and I wonder other gentlemen do not remember that had those judges been elected, we should have stood no better chance than we did then; for the popular majority was against us. Had these judges known they would be obliged to go through a popular election the next week, I wish to know if we should have argued our causes with any more confidence on that account. No, Sir; the confidence felt in going before these judges was this; and it was of unspeakable comfort to me, that I had a tribunal as independent as the law could make it. When this alarm, this fear—and fear is always cruel and always unjust—was spreading over the country; when political parties and great leaders thought it necessary to take a certain position; when men thought that the Union and the shoe trade, [laughter,] and I do not know how many other things, were in peril, and certain things must be done, I felt, Mr. President, the comfort of knowing that these judges held their offices and their salary, utterly irrespective of these popular determinations. Gentlemen are fond of talking as if the people were always in the right. Now I have not lived long, but it has been my misfortune not always to have thought them in the right; and I submit to gentlemen who have sustained the democratic doctrine in this State through these long years of defeat, up to this day, whether they have always thought the people right. I ask the Whig party, who have gallantly maintained their position before the nation—beaten three times out of four—whether they have thought the people always right. I submit to my own associates whether they have thought the people of the nation, or of this State, always right on the great question of resistance to the spread of slavery and the slave power. No, Sir; this always has been, and always will be the case, that among all the changes of the government, and changes of popular opinion, the public is sometimes unjust. No man has considered his own nature well, without feeling that he has something within him to satisfy him that he ought not to be trusted with arbitrary power.

Is there one man here who in a moment of resentment, in a moment of passion, in a moment of supposed insult, has not thanked God that he was not possessed of arbitrary power? I suppose every man feels the necessity of self-restraint; and if he cannot restrain himself, he thanks God for putting somebody over him who can restrain him. So it is with the good people of Massachusetts. They know that they cannot trust themselves with arbitrary power, and, therefore, they make a Constitution which will restrain them. They know that they can neither trust the legislature nor the executive with arbitrary power, and therefore they make a tribunal, to decide whether they have acted in accordance with their general will, and done nothing which it was not their general will should be done. So it is with an individual. He may have a general will to serve God, and a special, temporary will to do wrong when a temptation presents itself; but his desire is that his special and temporary will shall be overruled and restrained, so that his conduct may conform to his general will. Now the general will of the whole people is expressed in the Constitution; but there may be some act of the legislature, some sudden freak of the executive, contrary to that general will. We, therefore, wish to get such a faithful witness to this our general will, as shall protect every man against the consequences of what we or our servants may have done, in a moment of rashness.

I have trespassed very much on the patience of this Convention, and I will now merely say a few words in relation to this matter of reappointment. I have said all that I propose to say now, upon the subject of an elective judiciary, for I do not conceive that on that point we are in any very serious peril in this Convention. Gentlemen may be disposed to say, if we cannot make judges elective, we will make them, in some manner, dependent upon the executive for their term. I wish to ask those gentlemen who are in favor of an elective judiciary, what they have to say to this proposition of the gentleman from Natick. What kind of a proposition is it? In how many States of the Union has the experiment been tried, of having their judges hold office for ten or for seven years, and then be reappointable by the executive? There may be some such, but I do not know of any myself. Upon what principle does it rest? I can very well understand upon what principle an elective judiciary rests, but I cannot so easily understand upon what principle you base the doctrine that the judges are to be made dependent upon the executive. Why, Sir, I thought that gentlemen were afraid that the executive had too much power and patronage; and we have, therefore, been stripping the executive of the power of appointment of numerous minor offices. Yet we are now asked to clothe him with the power, every year, to appoint a judge of the supreme court, and to reappoint him at his pleasure. I do not understand how this is carrying out the principle, that "because the power of the executive has increased, and is increasing, it ought, therefore, to be diminished." I ask those gentlemen who stood by the Report and Address of the Free Soil Committee, only nine months ago—nay, not so much, not nine—less than five months ago, which declares that the power and patronage of the executive must be diminished, with what face they can come here and advocate the clothing of the executive with this transcendent power, which I do not know that a State in the Union has clothed him with. The executive designates and nominates the judge now, but after he is so nominated and appointed, he is entirely out of his control. I say it is of little consequence who appoints, if the appointment is made by an intelligent body, provided the judges hold by an independent tenure. I cannot see any fatal objection to the judges being elected by the people in the first instance, if they are to be independent of the changes in the public will, and responsible only for misbehavior, although I think a judge is the better for not having been through a political campaign, and not being connected with its issues. I assure every gentleman here, that I will go to the fullest extent to make a judge responsible to the people, if any charge of misconduct can be brought against him. I will consent to anything that is judicious, if your power of impeachment and address does not make them sufficiently responsible. It is the fact of a judge's looking to a reappointment, that makes the danger. I do not see that the danger is very much affected by the question whether they look to the executive who sits in that chamber, or whether they look to, a party caucus that meets somewhere in School or State Street, for their reappointment. Whether, as the fatal day approaches, his friends besiege the doors of the ante-room, for a week or a month beforehand, while he is expected to sit all unconscious, on his bench, "as impartial as the lot of humanity admits," or whether they take by the button-hole the members of the State Central Committees. I cannot see that there is much to choose between them. Gentlemen who suppose that our judges would stand just as they have stood, are mistaken, in my judgment; for the chance of reappointment, or the chance of reelection will depend very much on their decisions.

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—DANA.

[July 13th.]

The people and the political parties will be governed in that matter by these considerations. The executive will be elected by a party. That party has principles—I do not mean the low purposes of party, but the great principles of party—and those men who have got principles are the dangerous men of whom I am afraid; I am not afraid of the rogues. I am not afraid of the camp-followers, who hang about parties, but it is the party that has great principles to carry out, that gets excited and loses its balance, and when the moment of election comes, and the whole community is stirred up, then I am afraid that the calm and quiet retreat of the judiciary will be invaded.

I see that my friend from Fall River, (Dr. Hooper,) is making out a recipe against me; [laughter,] but I want him to understand that I am only afraid of party principle because it will operate in giving direction to the laws of the land, whereas the laws of the land should stand far above all such influences as those of party principle. The law should rest upon fundamental principles, should be given out wholly irrespective of the divisions of party. The law is a science. The judges are professors of a science. Their own will must not intervene. The will of popular majorities, unless in the form of laws constitutionally made, should not intervene.

I do beseech gentlemen not to be deluded by these arguments, that if you cannot get an elective judiciary, you must take all that you can get; because, in this case, you have got to take a very different sort of thing from what you wish. What gain is it to popular power, or the popular principle, that the judge holds for ten years, with a transaction at the end of that time between himself and the governor, instead of holding independently during good behavior, averaging thirteen years? You increase the executive power, and create a feeling of dependence and a risk of partiality, for no adequate compensation. The tables show us, that the judges tenures average only thirteen years, allowing for deaths or resignations. The governor would have, in doubtful cases, the control of a majority of the supreme court every year. He will appoint a judge every year, and that may turn the majority in close cases. So you will have a supreme court with the majority, in the balanced cases, in the hands of the governor. If there is a new judge to be made, he must find him; if there is a judge to be reappointed, he has to reappoint him or not, at his option. In ordinary cases, I doubt not that judges would be appointed according to their behavior; but, in the highest tribunals, judges would be appointed, eventually, according to their opinions. They must have their platforms, and they will have their platforms, and we shall have the mortifying exhibition, of our judges, or their friends, at the door of that executive chamber, petitioning for reappointments. Now, Sir, I do not want to make them dependent upon the changes of popular elections, either upon one man or a dozen men, I do not think it makes a great deal of difference which. This principle—I call it a principle, out of respect to my friend from Natick—this experiment, which, I believe, he is almost the first, if not the very first to embark in, is putting the judicial department substantially under the control of the executive department.

Mr. WILSON. I will inform the gentleman that he will find the same thing in Maine and in several other States of this Union.

Mr. DANA. "Several States." That is rather indefinite. There are thirty-one States in the Union, and three makes several! and I am told there are but three out of thirty-one. It is founded upon a violation of principle. Our Constitution says that the departments shall be distinct—no one department "shall exercise the power of another." Our ancestors never even dreamed that we would give the head of one department power over another. They never supposed that in the course of affairs it would ever happen that one department would be bound, hand and foot, and delivered over to another. They thought it quite enough to provide that one department should not exercise the powers of any other. "The executive shall never exercise legislative or judicial powers, or either of them."

But they can do it indirectly, if your judges are to be dependent upon the executive for reappointment. I maintain, therefore, that if you adopt the experiment of the gentleman from Natick, you will violate the great substantial principle of this government, in relation to these three departments. If you make the judges dependent for their reappointment upon the executive, how can you tell where that dependence begins or where it will end? Gentlemen may say that they will not be influenced; but you cannot tell how far they will be influenced, and the great difficulty is, that the judges themselves cannot always tell whether they are influenced or not. I have no doubt that in such circumstances most judges will pronounce decisions which they believe to be impartial, but they do not know themselves. It is tempting Providence. This self-deception is one of the most subtle and most easily besetting sins incident to humanity. If you make the judges dependent, you will not discover, and they will not discover what an influence this has upon their inmost thoughts and feelings. If the office is not a desirable one the judge would not have accepted it. Will not this feeling increase and strengthen with the time in which he should hold the office. I submit to every gentleman upon this floor, if, after a man has held an office for ten years, a reappointment is not eminently desirable. Suppose a man takes an appointment at the age of fifty, and holds it until the age of sixty, and then goes back to his profession. You put the salaries so low that a man cannot lay up anything. He goes back to his profession, and he finds himself incapacitated, as it were. His hand is out. Competitors, younger and more energetic, have entered the field and have gathered the business into their garms. His old clients are gone. Imagine such a man going back into his profession, his head whitened by the snows of three-score winters, competing at the bar with the young and middle aged, with the advantage of ten years' daily practice on their side. This judicial office is a peculiar one. You cannot get a man to take it as he would an executive or legislative office. The judge must study a long time to qualify himself for its duties; and if he is thrown out, he must begin the world anew on a little chamber practice, for he cannot ordinarily resume the active duties of the profession. Thus, Sir, his office is a desirable one, and he knows it, and his family know it, and his friends know it. Suppose he looks to the governor for reappointment. As the day approaches, his mind naturally looks forward to that time and dwells upon it. As it comes nearer and nearer it enlarges until it fills the whole horizon. This idea is something which cannot be set at naught. It will have more influence upon some than upon others, but you are bound to remove all such temptations from their path. There is nothing else in the whole range of subjects which we have discussed, whether the plurality system or the majority system, the executive council, the town system of representation or the district system, upon which you may not experiment more safely than upon this. Do not experiment upon the impartiality of your judges. Do not experiment to see how much temptation they can withstand, with their office and salary on the one hand and conscience on the other!

I ask if anybody has petitioned us that this experiment might be tried? Has anybody complained of anything wrong? Oh! save your judges from this humiliation—save them from temptation! Save from distressing doubts and suspicions the men who go to them for justice! I cannot conceive of a distress more cruel than that of a client whose life and all is at stake, with a doubt resting upon his mind as to the impartiality of the tribunal. That doubt of the impartiality of the final tribunal will be a doubt that will try all the institutions of this country. Save the client from that doubt! Banish from his mind the constant impression, as he looks over the faces of those five judges: "You, Sir, next year, are to be reappointed by such a party," and "you, Sir, this year, must be reappointed by such a party," and "I am standing upon the very platform which that party has denounced—I hold the opinions which that party is sworn to overthrow!" The first thing that I should wish is, that all the citizens should feel perfectly secure from that doubt; and in the day of our great extremity, if it should ever come, let us be able to thank the old Commonwealth that she has saved us from that distress. You have only to stand where you are, and you secure it. Why not do it? Why venture on this experiment? Who has required it at your hands?

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — DANA — KEYES.

[July 13th.

Stand where you all stood in October, 1852, or where the people thought you stood. Stand where you stood in February, 1853, and where the people believed you stood, when they went to the polls, and sent you here. Stand where all three of the political parties stood on the day when the people sent us here. Do not exhibit the spectacle of making this fundamental change, with no call from the people to have it made; with no notice to the people that it was to be attempted, and with no chance for the people to elect men with reference to its being attempted. Stand by it because we have had an independent and honorable judiciary under it. Stand by it, because no experiment has ever been tried under the other; for no generation has grown up under an elective judiciary. And I say to the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and to the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) by all means, let it stand until they have agreed what they will substitute in the place of it. I say, make no reform until your institutions need reform, and until you have agreed what reform you will make. Do not exhibit to the world a spectacle, as we shall in Massachusetts, of a Convention called to make changes which the popular voice had indicated, taking in hand to make substantial changes of which the people had given no intimation; making change for the sake of change; without any admitted evil to be remedied, and upon a theory about which themselves cannot agree. Sir, the gentleman from Fall River will see the force of the illustration, when I tell him it is bad enough to see two surgeons sitting by the side of a sick man, quarreling between themselves what they will do with him; but to have them seize hold of a man in health, and bind him hand and foot, to try experiments upon him, and not to be able to agree what they shall do to him! that is cruelty as well as folly. And yet, Sir, that is precisely the state of things here.

A VOICE. That's a fact.

Let gentlemen lay this to heart. They are not in a position to try this experiment here. Nobody has discussed this project; yet without discussion, gentlemen would force it upon the people. Gentlemen are uneasy. We are coming towards the close of the session, and gentlemen say that we must not delay an hour. But I say to the friends of the Convention, if they wish to save time, do not save it by rash and rapid work. Save it by letting alone what you have not time to do well. If the people want the change, it can be afterwards made through the legislature. But my word for it, Sir, the people do not want it. I so judge by the symptoms. If there be no symptoms of a desire, I judge that there is no desire. Sir, we hold our seats here under an implied obligation not to touch the judiciary; not merely, as the gentleman from Natick says, not to make it elective; but not to change the tenure at all. Therefore, I say again, stand by the Constitution until you see a difficulty to remedy, and seeing the difficulty, stand by the Constitution still, until you can agree as to what that remedy should be. Stand by it until the people have called for the change; and when they have called for it, and the evil is apparent, and the remedy agreed upon, I promise to give you my humble aid, but not till then.

Mr. KEYES. I have risen at this time, not for the purpose of making an elaborate reply to the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, because I am not fitted to do so; and supposing that if there is to be any reply, those who are to make it would not like to get up and make it at this time, and as all the speeches which I make are made upon the spur of the moment, and without much consideration, I will say a word or two now, and others who are more able than I am can follow me. Now the argument, so far as I have heard it, in favor of the Report of the Committee, is founded mainly on what I would call an assumption—it is founded on what I would call a questionable position.

In the first place, it is assumed that there can be no such thing as an independent judiciary, unless the judicial officers are appointed to hold their places for life. Now I deny that position altogether. In one sense, Sir, there is a kind of an independence in men holding that station; but, Sir, the question is, whether that independence ought to be carried to the great extreme which has been assumed by the gentleman for Manchester. If we are to carry out the doctrine which that gentleman has laid down here to-day, I want to know what is the use of having a republican government at all? What is to become of our republican doctrine of responsibility to the people, if any officer, for all time to come, is to be placed beyond their control? If a man who is appointed to perform any duty cannot do it unless he is to do it for the term of his natural life, I want to know if our whole system of republican government is not rotten at the core. Every-body knows that there is not a public officer of the United States so influenced by partizanship, or who may promote his reelection by the patronage of his office, or who is so anxious to retain the power which the people have placed in his hands, as the president of the United States. Sir, take any man—no matter who—take any block of wood and place it in that high station, and the population of the United States will bow down in the dust before it at any time, and at all times, and on all occasions. And, Sir, with such a power, and especially if that power were granted for life, how could it be expected that any man would administer a government impartially? If this doctrine of independence is so important in order to make a man do his duty, then of course, the people of the United States ought to ordain that instead of the president being elected every four years, he should be elected for life. Whatever might be the effect in regard to the election of judges, every-body knows that the power exercised by them, is not one millionth part of the power exercised by the president of the United States. And if judges of our courts are to be elected for life, in order to render them independent, why not, for the same reason, elect the president of the United States for the same period, seeing that the entire welfare of the country is, in many respects, committed to his charge? Why, Sir, I had always supposed, that the doctrine of republicanism is not only that there is no danger in these short terms of office, but that on the contrary the danger is in having too much independence. The idea that there is a power held over them, which power is lodged in the hands of the people, is the very beauty of our institutions—the very thing which keeps all our public officers properly in the path of duty.

Now, Sir, after all that has been said in regard to the tenure of the judiciary, we have seen that although the term has hitherto been for life, our judges have rarely held the appointment over thirteen years. We propose to fix the term of office at ten years; and yet it is contended that we cannot elect a man for that period without taking away his independence! When we elect a man to an office, we do not seek so to elect him as to make him totally irresponsible. We do not want to place him above all power. We do not want to place him beyond the control of the power which appointed or elected him. This is the very thing that we desire to avoid—the very thing that we seek to remedy in every other office which the people have to bestow. And, if so in regard to all other offices, why not so in regard to the office of judge. The argument of the gentleman for Manchester would go to place such functionary entirely beyond our control, so that no power on earth could reach him. Gentlemen may talk about impeachment; but I take it that that is altogether a farce, for there will always be character enough either in the executive or the people, not to place men who are known to be open scoundrels and villains in such positions; and unless that should be done you will never hear of such a proceeding as that of impeachment. The gentleman for Manchester has stated that no cases of this kind have ever happened, and hence went on to infer that our judges had at all times been immaculate and infallible, when every-body knows to the contrary. Sir, it is not in common and ordinary cases that judges are reprobated and rebuked in the community; nor do the people expect infallibility; but the idea that any set of men cannot be trusted under a republican form of government unless they are to be entirely removed from all reach of the people, seems to me to be a new idea in this age, or rather the resuscitation of an old one, which is totally hostile to republican freedom. So much for that part of the argument. For myself, I am willing to trust our judges, whether they are elected or appointed, for seven or for ten years. This tenure will make them feel a sufficient degree of dependence to remind them of the power which appointed or elected them. They will thus

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—KEYES.

[July 18th.]

know that they are in the hands of the people, and knowing that, and feeling that their business is to administer the law to the people, they will be more likely to discharge their duties with fidelity. This, instead of having an evil and dangerous tendency, I cannot but regard as one of the best safeguards we can have, under all circumstances.

The gentleman commenced his speech by stating that we were going to change the nature of this branch of our government. Is that so? I deny it. There is no change whatever, except in the mode of appointment, and the length of the tenure of the office. The judiciary department, in all its functions, rests precisely where it is, with all its present powers and organizations, and without any change except in the two points which I have named. As I have already stated, the office under the present system, is not held, on an average, for a longer period than thirteen years. Here are only three years cut off from the period, and yet the gentleman says that we are going to bring about a revolution in the judiciary department. Sir, the powers and duties of the judges are to be the same, unless this Convention see fit to alter them.

But I must not forget to remark that the gentleman at least five or six times returned to the matter of the calling of the Convention, and stated that the people had never considered this question, and did not desire any change. If the gentleman had read on a little further in the report from which he quoted, I think he would perhaps have come to a different conclusion, and he would see also, that the question was not settled by the committee to whom he referred, but that it was referred to this Convention to determine, as all other questions are to be determined. I will begin to read exactly where the gentleman left off. This report goes on to say:—

“Should a Convention be called, we doubt not it would number among its members many of the most distinguished men in the Commonwealth; men selected from the bench, the bar, as well as from the more common, but not less useful avocations of life; men who by their age and practical learning, experience and observation, would be much better qualified to settle this important question than we can claim to be.

“It has been suggested that judicial officers might be elected by the legislature and their term of office limited to a definite number of years, but our present judiciary system has worked so well, we feel unwilling, at this time, to recommend even this change, preferring to leave this, as well as the former branch of the same subject, to the wisdom of the Convention itself.”

The circumstances under which the Convention was called; the powers of opposition which were brought to bear against it; the first defeat of the proposition to hold the Convention itself, and that natural Yankee fear which quakes before the public at all times, and which is sometimes necessary, and sometimes unnecessary; from all this you can see at once the object of the committee in deferring a direct decision on the question. If there were other reasons why the Convention should be called without that, then it might well have been called for these reasons, without embarrassing it with more delicate or doubtful ones.

The gentleman referred to what he was pleased to call the mixing up of different branches of the government, as if he thought it would be unwise and impolitic on the part of this Convention to make this change on that account. But if I recollect rightly, the gentleman was for mixing up the legislative and executive departments of the government by doing away with the council, and providing that the senate should exercise a check upon the governor in regard to appointments to be made. He contended that we should take things as we find them, unless there was a positive demand for a change. He argued that we should not change the system of government as it was established by our fathers; that he would make such emendations as appeared to be absolutely necessary, but in most respects would prefer to have things as they are. Yes, Sir, the plan of the “majority” he found in the Constitution, but he was willing to alter that. This system, under which we have lived for two hundred years, the system under which we have grown up, and which has been the glory of our good old Commonwealth, he would abandon and destroy at one fell blow.

He seemed to think—and I will allude to only one or two other matters contained in his speech—that a judiciary appointed for life is more necessary in this country than in England, but I could not see the reasons for that opinion. Now that was very wise, when the appointment of the judges was in the hands of the king—a king not only there for life, but one receiving the crown from his ancestors and bequeathing it to his posterity, when not only the blood of one man was to govern that generation, but the same blood, from the conqueror down perhaps to Queen Victoria—which almost amounts to a perpetuity of the same individual—that was well enough, I say, when the appointment was in the hand of such a man as that, to be used under all circumstances, and as a part of the great power of the crown itself to make the tenure of the judges for life. Supposing that the king of England was to be elected annually, the appointment of the judges might be left safely in his hands, because if he made villainous appointments; if he appointed such butchers as Jeffreys and Scroggs to furnish victims for the gallows and stake all over the land, they could turn him out and elect another king, and therefore the power might be, under those circumstances, comparatively safe in his hands. But because the king is not elective, and without control, and the power of appointing and reappointing judges might be used for the purpose of carrying out, if he chose, his murderous purposes—as was the case with many kings who have filled the throne—it was of the highest importance to the safety of the people of the realm, that the power should be taken out of his hands, and lodged somewhere else, and as the people of England had not the opportunity of election as we have, they could only secure their independence of the king by a life tenure. That was the only way in which they could find security. If our governor should appoint villains or incompetent men, or men unfit by their natures and dispositions to discharge properly their duties, the people stand behind him and right the matter at the next election.

It has been asked here, why the people do not make the laws themselves? I answer: “they would make the laws if they could.” It was, originally, the system in this country for the people to assemble together, as did the democracy of Athens, and make the laws themselves; and when they did that they had no need of a Constitution. Why do they not make the laws? It is because they cannot now assemble together, on account of their numbers, and therefore they delegate their power to a legislature, and put a Constitution upon them. But the people do not want a Constitution in that sense. They can trample the Constitution under foot any day they please. The Constitution, in their hands, is like laws in the hands of the legislature—subject to their constant control and revision. The people would make the laws themselves were it practicable, but as it is not, they delegate this power to the legislature, and place them under the restraints of a Constitution. The people hold the Constitution as a piece of parchment, and can repudiate it whenever they please. For that reason the judges should be made amenable to the people. They should be elected by the people and be held responsible to them. However independent they might be of political partizanship, I would never have them actually independent of the control of the people.

Now the gentleman left out of his case one idea which I would have ever kept in mind, that is, these officers are not elected, they obey no authority on earth, looking upon the power of impeachment, as well they may, with perfect contempt. They have no other restraint than their own consciences and the law of God above—and that, according to a doctrine which I read of yesterday, is not always to be trusted.

Now, Sir, the judges, as I said before, are to be influenced. They are men, and they are influenced by the communities, the societies and the classes in which they live, and the question now is, not whether they shall be influenced at all, or not, but from what quarter that influence shall come. Now I do not believe there is a judge upon the bench of Massachusetts, either in the circuit court, or in the supreme court, who, if the skeleton of the fugitive slave law had been offered to their decision two years before it was enacted, would not have pronounced it unconstitutional, infamous and absurd. If they would not have done that, they would not have been regarded by the people as fit to be judges. I have no doubt that every man of them, a year before, would have agreed with me, in the infamy and unconstitutionality of that law, although they now, under some influence or other, hold a different opinion. When that power which does influence judges was brought to bear upon them, they bowed in abject submission to it, and took pains and went out of the way to tell the people that a halter was around their neck, and the iron heel upon their throat, and that they must yield subjection and submission to a law which no other nation upon earth is abject enough to submit to in silence.

I allude to this to show that there is an influence, coming from some source, which is brought to bear upon the judges, as well as upon other men, and the question is, shall that influence come from the atmosphere in which they move, or shall it come from the people, whom this Convention supposes to represent the conservatism, the virtue and the wisdom of the land.

The idea of electing judges every year is absurd, because they would hardly get in their seats before their terms would expire. But to say that because once in ten years they shall go back to the appointing power, they will be so dependent,

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — KEYES — FRENCH.

[July 13th.

so cowardly, so mean that they cannot transact and discharge their duties properly, for fear that their bread will be taken out of their mouths, and their children will be turned starving into the streets, is an argument against republicanism altogether. I do not believe that the effect of it will be anything like that. I believe that the argument made this morning, if heard in foreign lands where the people are mistrusted, and where the ruling power is placed in the hands of a small minority, would be held up, in the face of the institutions of the old world, as an evidence that here in the new world, we, living under the light of a republican government, are dissatisfied with it, and do not believe that the people are capable of governing themselves. They tell us that the people cannot be trusted with the powers necessary for their own safety and their own salvation, and we shall virtually acknowledge it if we refuse to adopt the amendment. I believe, if there are any officers whose election can be safely intrusted to the people, they are the judges. I regard it to be so on the ground that the office of judge is one in which all the people are interested, and the integrity and respectability of those who are to occupy that office, is near and dear to the hearts of all the people. Because the people are liable, in some degree, to feel their power, and to be affected by their decisions, they will exercise a criticism and judgment in their selection, that are not exercised in regard to any other class of public men.

Now, gentlemen have received and read some letters from other States. We know how easy it is to get letters. If voluntarily given, they are of little authority. If given in reply to letters sent, those letters would be most likely directed to right quarters to get such replies as are wanted. How many in Massachusetts might say the same things as are contained in those letters. I believe the majority of the people in this Commonwealth would utter similar sentiments, as they have not tried this new experiment, and they have been frightened by bugbears held up before their eyes.

Reference has been made to the great men of 1780. I like such references as those, and I wish we could follow the doctrines they inculcated. But, instead of following them we have gone back, and have lost that moral courage which we should have derived from their example. If we could stand up in opposition to the oppressing power of this nation, as they did against the oppressive power of England, we should show some specimens of bravery and courage worthy of commemoration. But the wonder is that they went so far as they did at that long distant period. They had had no experience in our kind of republican governments, though they had had some freedom under the colonial and provincial governments, yet not entirely independent of the ruling authority at home. That that they should on that occasion have gone to such extremes—as it would have been called in this day—is remarkable.

But, Sir, there were many things which that Convention adopted, and there were many sentiments which were orthodox in that day, which are entirely repudiated in our day. The Convention, even of 1820, composed of men who inherited the spirit of their fathers to a greater degree than we have, adopted things which the people rejected, and which we shall repudiate, as one man, upon this occasion. Seeing how essential it was under the British form of government to have a judiciary independent of the crown, they adopted a similar provision, because they felt that that was the great palladium of their liberties. They were thinking of kings, and forgot that they were to be thereafter independent of kingly influences.

Now the gentleman says that the judicial is a very weak power. That struck me as a remarkable saying, though I am aware that he knows much more about it than I do. It appears to me that the judiciary is strong. It has seldom to give any reason for its action, and it is supported and upheld by all the veneration and reverence of the people, the influence of which they can scarcely overcome. The power, too, in their hands, is unquestionable, except by the process of impeachment. They may give reasons for their actions, or not, just as they choose, and when their fiat is announced there is the end of it. It strikes me that a body composed like that is a strong body in this country; strong in its own intrinsic weight, and incapable of being interfered with by the people.

Now the gentleman says that a man who is appointed judge at the age of fifty, will dislike to yield his office at sixty, and that will be an objection to his accepting of it in the first instance. I have already alluded to the fact, that by a law higher than this Convention, only the term of thirteen years is the average time the judges have held their offices under the present system of life tenure. But let the tenure be what it may, if the people exercise the same faculties, and have the same disposition as they have exhibited heretofore, there would not be one case in a thousand, where a judge had properly discharged his duties upon the bench for a term of years, and remained in the full enjoyment of all his faculties, in which he would not be continued in the same position. I leave it to the experience of gentlemen, and to the history of this Commonwealth, to decide if such will not be the almost certain result. That dependence on the people, which we propose, will keep him in such a condition that he will be prepared to receive their "well done, good and faithful servant," when his time shall have expired.

These are the impressions, hurriedly and briefly expressed, made upon my mind in consequence of the speech which has just been made upon this subject. I know the power of that gentleman directly to impress and influence the minds of others. There are men whose arguments and whose statistics seem logical and forcible, yet never produce any impression upon the mind. That is not the case with the gentleman who last addressed us. Not only his argument, but his eloquence and persuasive voice force themselves right into the hearts and minds of men. But in this case, I ask you to reflect upon the arguments which he has brought forward, and see whether they are not more beautiful than strong; whether there is anything really alarming in what he would make us believe would amount to the destruction of this department of the government, which has stood so long and is so necessary to our liberties, and the enjoyment of our just rights. I believe not, Sir. I confess I came to this Convention, opposed,—if my mind inclined either way,—to the election of judges by the people. But I was situated like most other people of Massachusetts, having been influenced, upon this subject, by the bugbear representations of the newspapers, and alarm cries issuing from the mouths of lawyers who live in the courts and are subject to a kind of opinion and influence peculiar to themselves. But the more I reflect upon the subject, the more I am satisfied that of all the officers in Massachusetts to be elected by the people, the judges are the most proper ones to be intrusted to their wisdom and discretion.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I am sorry to differ with the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) upon this subject. I agree with him generally, and I believe he is sincere in whatever he may offer to this Convention, but in this one instance, I think he is in an error.

The main ground, and, indeed, the only ground upon which I can understand he places his objection to the election of the judges is, that he fears they will not be as independent. Now, Sir, I do not believe the judges are more independent than any other class of people, or more than any of the officers of the government. Why should they be so? They are mortal men. They have feelings like other men, and they are influenced by the atmosphere with which they are surrounded, like other people. And how should their appointment by the governor make them less so? I confess I am unable to see it.

But, Sir, I have been told that an officer appointed by the governor, who had considerable duty to perform in this Commonwealth, made quite a distinction between the different classes of the community. In other words, between those who held different political opinions. I understood that when a certain class of people were fined for violating the laws of the State, this agent would see a necessity why their fines should be remitted, why they should be released from paying them; while another class of persons, guilty of only the same crime, were made to pay their fines to the last farthing. This, Mr. President, was an officer appointed by your governor—an independent officer, according to the doctrine of the gentleman for Manchester.

Now, Sir, I do not believe in this mode of making these officers independent. I know we have always been taught to revere the judiciary as a sacred set of people, who are always to be feared and their designs never thwarted. But, Sir, in my opinion, they are like other people, many of them good and honest—I hope they all are—but they are liable to these influences the same as others.

But, Sir, all I have to say upon this subject is, to show to this Convention, if I can, and to the people of this Commonwealth, that the idea so much talked of, that these officers are to be made independent by being appointed by the governor and his council, is, in my humble opinion, entirely an error. Why should we continue to keep this last vestige of aristocracy which we have inherited from our mother country, and call it one means of preserving republican principles? Why should we continue to hold on to that anti-democratic doctrine? Some gentlemen tell us that the people will not accept this reform if we adopt it. Well, Sir, why should we not at least give them a chance to try it? If we pass it and they will not accept it, we shall have done our duty. The people may do as they please. I am not afraid to trust them, as some gentlemen are, and I believe very honestly afraid, too. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River will be sustained, and that this reform may be furnished to the people for their

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — HALLETT — KEYES — KINGMAN.

[July 18th.]

consideration. I have no doubt as to the result, but all I ask is to give them a chance, and not say in advance that they will not accept it.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. Before the question is taken upon this subject, I was in hopes some gentleman would at least have referred to an argument which was adduced by the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes). If I rightly understood the argument of that gentleman, the effect of it was to show that it was desirable to give the election of the judges to the people because, if we had judges upon the bench who flinched in violating their oaths, in particular cases, the people could remove them and elect men who were not such cowards, and who would not hesitate in particular cases to violate their oaths.

Now, Sir, that is rather a remarkable position for a member of this Convention to occupy, and one which I think should not pass without observation by the Convention; because the application of that argument was to a case in which the judges of the supreme court in this Commonwealth were sworn to regard the laws of the United States as the supreme law of the Commonwealth—and they did so regard that law. Yet they are charged with cowardice, in acting simply in conformity with their oaths. Sir, even if he entertains different opinions upon the subject upon which he is called upon to act; if the judge upon the bench entertains doubts as to the propriety of the law, yet, as a State judge, when called upon to decide, he is bound to decide in conformity to the laws as they have been construed by the supreme court of the United States. I know of no other system of judicial power by which we can preserve the Union—first, in its general organization, as embracing laws which are to govern the whole Union; and second, the local laws as construed by local tribunals which are to govern the communities within their jurisdiction. Therefore, I do not believe the gentleman for Abington, or any gentleman, upon reflection, will regard it as at all complimentary to the people, to suppose that they would reflect to office, or that they would take care to elect to office, men who would not hesitate to violate a solemn oath, because they, as individuals, do not like a particular law, or because they supposed the majority of the people did not like it.

Mr. KEYES. If I had not heard the gentleman name the place which I represent, I should not have supposed that he was referring to anything I said, for I do not recognize in his remarks anything I have said. My object was to show that judges, like other men, might be influenced. Then I said that it was my belief, that if, before the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, a skeleton of that law had been placed before them, I did not believe one of the judges of the supreme court would have declared it constitutional; but after it was adopted by congress, I do not express any opinion as to what their duty was. I only expressed the opinion that judges, like other men, were influenced from some quarter. I did not say that they did not perform their duty, or that I would have them violate their oaths.

Mr. HALLETT. I am glad the gentleman for Abington has modified his suggestion.

Mr. KEYES. I did not intend to modify my suggestion at all, I only stated what I said when I was up before.

Mr. HALLETT. Then the gentleman still adheres to his position that if a judge entertains a private opinion one way in relation to what may possibly become a law, and it is afterwards enacted into a law, he is not bound by his oaths of office to sustain that law, but, on the contrary, it is a mark of cowardice—it is bowing down to some power behind him, if he does not declare that law to be unconstitutional, even in violation of his oath, and in violation of the construction given by the highest tribunal in the land.

Mr. KEYES. I beg pardon of the gentleman, I said nothing of that kind.

Mr. HALLETT. The gentleman's suggestion is either that, or it is nothing. If it is nothing, then, of course, it should have no weight in the Convention. If it is to have that construction, I am sure it will have still less weight.

But I was going to say, that if the judges were made elective, and they were found to yield to their private political opinions, and carry out their judgments and decisions against their duty, and in violation of their oaths to support the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the Commonwealth, I believe those judges would be hurled from their seats by the people more readily than if they had been guilty of a higher degree of corruption in any other direction; because, I believe the quality which the people most require in a judge is independence. So that I should be willing, if I deemed it expedient, to trust the people with the election of their judges, for the reason that they would be more likely to respect a man, and would be more likely to select one who had shown himself independent, even of themselves—independent of the popular will—who would carry out the laws of the United States and of the Commonwealth in conformity to the construction which he was bound to observe.

Now, Sir, having said all I desired to say—and I thought it due the Convention to say this much, because I did not wish to have a false impression prevail upon this subject—I merely wish to add, that I am not in favor of an election of the judges directly by the people, but I am in favor of their election in the same form that we elect the president of the United States—by electors chosen to elect him. We elect the governor and council by the people, and I am in favor of thus choosing the judges. And I should like to know where there is any more departure from the popular principle by electing the judges in that form, than there is in the form we exercise every four years in choosing electors to elect our president. It is true that these electors are instructed to elect a particular man to the office, but so are your governor and council instructed every year, and we know that they will carry out the will of the people. That is an election by the people indirectly, and I prefer it to direct election in the present state of our judiciary.

On motion of Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston, the Convention adjourned until three o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

Reconsideration.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the Report on the petition of Francis Jackson and others was adopted by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The motion will be placed upon the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

Mr. HOOD, of Lynn, moved that the rules be suspended, in order that the motion to reconsider the vote referred to be considered at this time.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being on the motion of the gentleman from West Bridgewater, (Mr. Kingman,) to reconsider the vote by which the Convention adopted the Report of the Committee on the petition of Francis Jackson and others, respecting the qualifications of voters.

Mr. KINGMAN. I wish to assign some reasons, why I have made this motion to reconsider. I have not the vanity to suppose that any thing that I can say, will change the purpose of this Convention in the least. But, Sir, I consider that I have rights, as a member of this Convention, and that those rights were cut down, this morning, by the action of this body. I do not charge any one with the intentional design of depriving me of the right of speaking upon this subject, but that was the effect of the adoption of the previous question.

I did not have the pleasure of hearing the discussion upon this Report, which, I understand took place in Committee of the Whole yesterday. When I came into the Convention this morning, the subject was under discussion in Committee. I obtained the floor and asked leave to speak some five or ten minutes, not knowing then that the time for closing the discussion had been fixed by the Convention. I had spoken but three or four minutes before the hammer fell. I tried then to get the floor in Convention, but could not. Yet it was obtained by others who had spoken their full half hour in Committee of the Whole.

For this reason, under these circumstances, I feel that I have the right to be heard upon this subject, and to obtain that right, I have made the motion to reconsider. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention, and I promise not to take more than ten minutes, but I felt that I was rather crowded by the action of the Convention, and therefore I made the motion which I have.

When the hammer fell I was alluding to some remarks made by the gentleman who preceded me. He had said, that the rights of the widow who was the head of a family, and those of maiden ladies, etc., were provided for—that they were protected, although they had no voice in the administration of the government. I know they are provided for to a certain extent, and so are hundreds of persons belonging to other classes of our citizens.

It was also said that women had enough to do, without voting. Well, Sir, clergymen have enough to do without engaging in politics, yet I should be the last man to deprive them of the privilege of taking part in the affairs of government. All I have to say is, that I have no doubt that their rights would be just as well protected, without their voting as with it; but that is no reason for depriving them of the right to vote. Yet, Mr. President, there are more widows and maiden ladies in the Commonwealth than there are clergymen; and I am not able to see why one class of persons should be deprived of the privilege of going to the ballot-box to cast their vote, and the others allowed it. Sir, I undertake to say, that no gentleman in this Convention can maintain this distinction upon principle.

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — KINGMAN — HOOPER — GRISWOLD.

[July 13th.

An illustration was brought up this morning, by a gentleman who spoke upon this subject, of a man, and a very respectable man, who said he should like to see his wife refuse to sign a deed. Why, Sir, if a man would deny to his wife the privilege of signing the deed or not, as she pleased, what stronger argument do we want of the necessity there is that women should go into the government, and protect themselves? It is their privilege to refuse to sign a deed, if they should think it for their interest to do so.

In a discussion upon another subject, the distinguished gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) in alluding to this subject, said it was an absurd doctrine. Now, Sir, to some of us there are doctrines as absurd as this. The doctrine that the Constitution of the United States tolerates slavery, directly in the face of that clause in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are created free and equal, is, to some of us, a doctrine as absurd as this, and more so.

It is a doctrine which is received by common consent, that twenty-one years of age shall be considered as the period when men arrive at maturity, or their majority. Well, Sir, I have no disposition to quarrel with that; you may fix the period at twenty-one years, or at any other time; but, have not women at that age as much intelligence? Are they not as well educated as men, take the classes together? I undertake to say, that the female portion of our population, from the age of fifteen to twenty-five, are, as a general thing, better educated than the male portion, and the reasons are obvious. They have better opportunities for school. They have more leisure for reading and obtaining general information.

Now, Sir, I do not believe a majority of our females desire the privilege of voting; but I see no reason why those who do desire it should be deprived of the privilege. But, as I remarked in the outset, I have no idea that anything that may be said upon this subject will change the purpose of the Convention; but I do believe, that the more the subject is discussed, the more it is brought before the public, the greater will be the number of those who will go for the franchise of the female portion of our population.

Having now accomplished my purpose in moving a reconsideration of this vote, I will not detain the Convention any longer.

The question was taken, and the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. Bates, of Plymouth, the Convention resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the resolves on the subject of the judiciary. The pending question being on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Fall River,

MR. HOOPER. As the attendance this afternoon is thin, and as this is a matter of considerable consequence, I now move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow at half-past nine o'clock.

MR. GRISWOLD, for Erving, opposed the postponement, and, the question being put, it was, upon a division—by ayes, 62; noes 79—decided in the negative.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Fall River.

MR. HOOPER, of Fall River. I supposed, that there might be some other members of the Convention who were prepared to speak upon this question, and if there is any one now who desires to speak, I am ready to give way in order that he may have an opportunity. I wish to look for a moment, at the argument which has been adduced here in favor of an independent judiciary. Every government is divided into three great branches—the executive, legislative, and judicial departments. We have thus far based the first two upon truly American principles. We usually call the executive the first branch, the legislative the second, and the judiciary the third. The executive the highest, the legislature lower in the scale, and the judicial the lowest, intrusted with the mere interpretation of the laws. We have had no hesitancy in committing the first branch, and the highest, to the popular voice—an election by the people. That is admitted, on all hands, to be safe, and no one questions the necessity for so doing. The selection of the second branch, that of the law-making power, is freely and unanimously submitted to an election by the people, and there is no danger apprehended upon that score. The two most important branches have been decided to be perfectly safe in the hands of the people at a popular election; but gentlemen say that the people cannot be intrusted with the election of the third branch, the least in importance of them all, because that is an independent branch. How is it independent? Let us look at it. The officers nominated by the governor, are paid by the second branch, for without the action of your legislature they could not get a dollar from the treasury, and yet it is contended that this branch must be perfectly independent of every body. Is it so, in fact? Can it be, when this is the situation of affairs? Would it not be fully as independent, if that branch, like the other, was brought at once to the sovereign power, the people, and they should appoint them directly. It strikes me, that they would be fully as independent, if not more so, under such appointment. The gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) thinks it is better to have an intermediate step, and he has likened this election of the third branch, to that of the president, through the agency of electors; but it strikes me that there is no analogy in the cases, and, therefore, that there is no force in the argument. When the president is so chosen, the people, by some mode or other, designate the candidates for electors, and then they designate the individuals for whom these electors are to vote, who have no discretionary power in practice, although the theory was different. It was supposed that the electors were to have some discretionary power, but under the practice which has grown up, they have ceased to have any, and my opinion is, that this machinery ought to be abolished altogether.

The first branch of the government is not elected with a direct view to the appointment of certain men upon the bench, though, I am free to say, it is one of the objections to the present system, that the election of governor is made to carry out certain views in relation to appointments. That is one of the strongest objections to the present system. We do not elect the governor with a view to the appointment of certain judges upon the bench. We elect him for other purposes specified in the Constitution. The appointment of judges is one of the incidental powers conferred upon him, and one which, I think, had better be taken away from him, and leave the matter entirely in the hands of the people. In this view of the matter, I do not see how you, at present, render this branch so very independent, as judges are appointed by the governor, and are paid by the second branch—the legislature. Not only so, but it has already been admitted that they must be removed by these two branches. It is an easy matter to remodel your courts of law, and so legislate your judges out of office, a thing that has been done time and time again, and, therefore, they are not independent. They depend, after all, for their continuance in office, upon the good will of the second branch of the government—the legislature. These different departments are coördinate, and there is a certain dependence between them, one upon another, and this is not at all inconsistent with the functions which they were created to carry out. It seems to me that our judiciary system is the last and almost the only remnant of the monarchical system which adheres to our Constitution. It is one of the last pieces of rust, which ought to be rubbed off, and I believe the people are ready to rub it off as soon as they get an opportunity to do so. Can it be believed that men, rendered entirely independent of public opinion, will behave any better in office, will make any more correct decisions, than men amenable to the public voice at certain times? I do not believe that there is any man who has reputation enough to elevate him to that office, who will ever be influenced by political considerations in his decisions. I do not believe that such has ever been the case in this State to any considerable extent, with, perhaps, one or two exceptions. I do not believe that we have anything to fear upon that score. I believe that men who would attain to that position, will be so elevated in character, and will have so much at stake, that they will be above all such influences. If they are above such influences, that very fact will take this question out of the category of party politics, will elevate it above all party considerations. As we have seen, in many of the States where these officers are elected by the legislature, party considerations are kept entirely out of sight. This has been the case in Vermont, where they have elected a judge twenty years in succession. This is the case in Rhode Island, where judges are elected every year, and the same judges have been elected, year after year, while the legislature often differed from them in political sentiments.

As to the question whether the people expect that we are to act upon this question here, perhaps that has been sufficiently replied to by the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes). The gentleman might have read from the same document from which the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) read, the order which was introduced into the legislature, dated the 27th of February, I think, in which the same subject was brought up, discussed, and then referred to a committee who made a report. I think we approach this subject precisely as we approach all others. It is a subject which has been left to the discretion of the Convention, and it is a subject upon which the people expect that we shall exercise our best discretion. For this reason I think we might approach it fearlessly and without apprehension, and we shall disappoint public expectation if we do not present this question for their consideration. Why should we not present it? Why should we not give them a chance to adopt it if

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HOOPER—GREENLEAF.

[July 13th.]

they see fit to make a change. If we send it out to them and they are perfectly satisfied with the existing state of things, they have only to reject it and the thing remains. If they see fit to accept it, then it becomes a part of the Constitution. Why not give them an opportunity to vote upon this matter? Are we afraid to trust them to pass upon this as well as other questions which we have already submitted to them? Who is to be harmed by it? It certainly signifies great distrust in the people to say that we shall not submit it, if, in our judgment, it is a reform which it is expedient should be made. I have heard many gentlemen say, individually, that they were not in favor of it because they thought the people were not ready for it. How are they to know? I am inclined to think that the people are ready for it. Here is a difference of opinion, upon this question, and the quickest and most correct mode of solving it is to submit this question to the people and allow them to decide it for themselves; and when they shall have so decided it we shall all be satisfied. The gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) is very much afraid of this question being drawn into questions of party politics, but, unfortunately, I think, he cited the cases of New York and Maryland, where he admitted that the people had suffered, beyond all endurance, the viciousness of their previous system, and it so happens that that system was one of appointment, precisely the system which the gentleman is contending for here. But it seems that his greatest fear is that it will be acted upon by parties who will be governed by conscience and principle. It is the first time I ever heard that men were to be distrusted because they possessed conscience and principle. I had supposed that these qualities, when we found that men possessed them, formed a ground-work for the reliance and confidence which we could place in them. I knew that Cromwell's soldiers were very much feared by their enemies, because they were praying soldiers, and they had good reason to fear them, but I never knew before that civilians feared citizens because they possessed conscience and principle. These qualities are the very fundamental principles of all right action, and they are the very substratum upon which everything rests, and without which how can the majority be expected to reflect truth and justice. If they do reflect justice and truth; if they are more liable to be right than individuals, then the people are to be trusted rather than individuals. I hope that we shall not be frightened out of our propriety by the idea that we are touching something too sacred to be dealt with as we deal with other provisions in the Constitution. I cannot see that there is anything more sacred in this than in other provisions of the Constitution, and I do not see why we cannot approach it in the same way. It strikes me that there is no part of the Constitution which retains so much of the old monarchical principle as this system, and for that very reason it is time for us to make a change in this respect.

Mr. GREENLEAF, of Cambridge. As I had the honor of serving on the Committee upon the Judiciary, whose Report it is proposed to amend and essentially change, perhaps I should hardly be thought to have done my duty, if I did not suggest to the Convention some of the reasons which induced me to concur in that Report. I am very unwilling to take up the time of the Committee, with any remarks of my own, but I deem the question one of very great importance, and one upon which, above all others, we should not act hastily and unadvisedly. Upon this subject, I wish only to suggest, in a very brief and plain manner, a few things that occur to me, addressing myself to the calm good sense of the Committee. I am extremely unwilling to believe, that in respect to the judiciary, there is any foregone conclusion. I prefer to believe, as I think I may, that the minds of the majority are not yet settled upon any course which is finally to be pursued; but that all are still open to conviction. It is a very grave question which is now pending. It is not a question, as the gentleman who has just taken his seat intimated, if I rightly understood him, concerning the least important branch of the government. I do not understand that there is any first, second or third department, except merely numerically, or in the order in which they stand upon the page of the Constitution. If there were any one department of government more important than an other—an idea which is inadmissible—I should think it vitally essential that the judiciary should be cherished with the most careful regard. I need not give reasons for that opinion, as they are no doubt already apparent to the mind of every gentleman present. The question is not what scheme of government, theoretically speaking, would be the best for the people. The business of this Committee is not to theorize upon forms of government; not to review the plan of John Locke, or any Utopian statesman, but simply to revise an existing system, and by revising, I mean merely to pass in review. The Convention is called upon to overhaul the machinery under which this Commonwealth has been administered for a period longer than the years of the oldest member present—a system under which this Commonwealth has attained its present height of prosperity, happiness and renown. Each integral part of this system is to be brought in review, and as each is examined the inquiry is to be made—how has it worked, well or ill. Is there any defect in this particular part of the machinery. Is there any part in which it is productive of mischief to the community. Has it done its office? If it has, we are to let it remain. Such I conceive to be our duty. We ought to let it pass, go on to the next, and so on through the Constitution. This important function of the judiciary is now before the Committee for that sort of review, and the question is, whether there is any need of a change? Has the judiciary system, which has stood so long, worked for good to this people? If it has, I hold it to be a duty of the Convention to abstain from touching it. We are bound to let well enough alone. We are bound, as intelligent statesmen, to apply to practice the maxim which was said to have been a favorite one with the elder Adams, "when we stand well, to stand still." Do we stand well under the judiciary system? If we do, let us continue to stand well. If not, let the gentleman who is able to point out the place in which it is defective, or the instance in which it has not operated well, rise in his place and declare it. I take that to be the actual posture of the question. The burden of proof rests with those who object to the present system, not theoretically, but upon the ground of some actual mischief that it has done. The burden of proof is not with those who would let it remain—those who prefer to go by the light of experience rather than by the jack-o'-lantern of theoretical speculation. In truth, the question is, whether we shall be guided by that light at all. If we take that as our guide, it teaches us that we have the most perfect system which we can have, and which, if we were to start anew, it would be possible to invent. If we take the light of experience, we shall continue to enjoy the blessings we have enjoyed so long, and the security under which we have so long reposed. If we utterly quench that light, if we turn our backs upon history, slighting the wisdom of our fathers and all those who have gone before us, and choosing to rush forward with the recklessness of children, dazzled by the vision of untried futurity, we shall enter upon a work for which the Convention was not called together, and which the people of this Commonwealth will not thank us for entering upon, and which, I honestly think, will be visited upon the heads of members with the full measure of public rebuke. If we can find no error in the system, let it stand; and the question is, is there any? Judges are appointed by the executive, and it is idle to say, that all appointments and all power, do not emanate from the people. It is idle to pretend that there is any antagonism between the government and the people. Where is the foundation of sovereignty? Who are our sovereigns but ourselves? All power emanates from the people, and is exercised in such a manner as the people themselves designate. Some of their work they do with their own hands, some they do by the hands of one agent, some by the hands of multiplied agencies, the authority and power still emanating from the people themselves. In this view, it is a matter of indifference, whether the people exercise the power of appointing the judges, or rather of electing them by a direct popular ballot, or whether they are appointed by the governor. They are as much elected by the people in the one instance as in the other; it is merely a question of expediency, whether the people will choose to exercise this power, by their own immediate action, or whether they will appoint agents to do it, under the peril of their own responsibility to the people.

More than seventy years ago the fathers of this State declared—after expressing their deliberate and solemn conviction of the importance of a judiciary as independent as was possible, consistent with human infirmity, of all external influences, and all temptations to swerve from the duty of acting imperatively between man and man—that in their opinion there was no manner in which this could be achieved so successfully as by placing this appointment in the hands of the executive with a tenure of office during good behavior. That was a system already tested, both in the mother country and this. From generation to generation, the benefits of it have been enjoyed by fathers and children through a long period of years. It was a system with which our fathers were perfectly satisfied, and which they declared to be the best which they could devise. Are we wiser than they? Were they men who had no character for statesmanship? were they unpractised jurists? were they unread in history? had they no memory? had they no skill to select those parts of the Constitution under which they had lived, which were beneficial, and to reject those which were not? None of us will say that. No man here will so villify his father and the fathers of his country as to charge them with

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—GREENLEAF.

[July 13th.

fatuity and ignorance. Are we better read in history, are we more experienced, are we wiser men, are we any better versed in the theory of republican government? Where have we acquired our wisdom except under the very institutions which they, in their wisdom, formed? Why, then, should we undertake—I call gentlemen distinctly to tell me—why should we depart from that which has done well, as well as we could possibly imagine any human system to work, and venture upon something we have never tried? I make this call, Sir, not for mere rhetorical purposes; this is far from me; but I make it sincerely and seriously. I put the question to any gentleman present; will he tell me of any evil which has been experienced under the present system?

We ought not to be content with answers in general, answers upon mere speculation, fancy, or imagination, or to say that another system would be more in harmony with other parts of the Constitution, which is only saying that it would look a great deal better on paper. What if it would? We do not want a paper system, or a mere model machine; but we want the machine itself which has stood the test. We want the old Ironside Constitution whose ribs are yet unbroken, which has stood the batteries of seventy years and is still entire and in all its vigor.

Will any gentleman say that a mistake has been made in the executive appointment of any judge of the supreme court of this State since the Constitution was adopted? I know of none; I never have heard of one. Has the executive failed to do his duty? Has he been unenlightened? Has he preferred a man of his own political complexion to the exclusion of a man better fitted, who was of the opposite party? Has he not in every instance taken the fittest man that any person would be likely to select? I ask these questions directly and fearlessly. All sorts of appointments have been brought to the fiery ordeal of the public press, but I have never yet heard any complaint of the appointment of a judge of the supreme court.

What is the character which that branch has acquired under this system? It is a character which was beautifully and correctly delineated by my friend, the member for Manchester, this morning. The bench of Massachusetts has been constituted of men who have raised its character to a pitch of eminence and consideration, of which any State in the Union or in the world might be proud. Repeatedly, in the course of my professional life, of now more than half a century, it has been my pleasure as well as good fortune to hear the bench of Massachusetts, spoken of as one that would have adorned Westminster Hall in the proudest days of its judicial history; and the judges of Massachusetts, individually, I have occasionally heard spoken of as gentlemen who would have held a high position in England, along with the Mansfields, the Kenyons, and the Ellenboroughs of the King's Bench. The decisions of the court of Massachusetts have been regarded as highly as those of any State in the Union; it does not become me to say more so, but I fear not to say that they have been regarded as highly as those of any other. They have been mentioned in foreign tribunals, in terms that might well make a Massachusetts man proud of the bench of his State. How has this reputation been gained? It has grown up with the system under which we have lived so long. Has any one complained that the judges of Massachusetts have been swerved by party considerations? They have passed through seasons of fiery trial and great political excitement, but to their honor be it spoken, amid all the abuse which has been heaped upon public men of both the great parties into which the country is divided, no charge has been made against them. The press has been free, even to licentiousness, but I know of no instance in which the judges of Massachusetts have been charged with acting from political affinities or influences. This is a good deal to say in regard to any judge. Would it have been so if Massachusetts had been visited with the scourge of anti-rentism, and her judges had been dependent upon popular voices for a reelection? I need not wait for a response.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the Convention by the statement of other facts of this kind, which will readily occur to the mind of every gentleman present. But I repeat the question, what evil has been done? Not what evil have the judges done, for they have worn the ermine without a stain; but what inconvenience has resulted from the system? This is a matter in which we all have a personal interest, and especially the younger portion of the community. I speak for the survivors rather than for myself; and I call upon gentlemen to pause before they lay their hands upon so essential a department of the government, one so vital to the well being of every family; a department whose influence is felt at the fireside more directly, more immediately, and more painfully, if painfully at all, than the action of any other department or function in the State.

I am aware that the example of other States has been urged upon us. But to that argument I reply, that we ought, in this matter, to be governed by our own experience, and not by the experience of other States; for unless we can place ourselves precisely in their situation, their example may greatly mislead us. I know that in many States their judges are elected by the people. Some of them have so constructed their Constitutions originally; which is the case with several of the new States. Others, in a few instances, have changed the old tenure for a new one, as in the cases of New York, Maine, Ohio, and one or two others. A very few of the old States have made the change; but there are still seven States whose judges are appointed by the executive. In eleven States, they are elected by the legislature. In some, they are elected by the people in districts, and in others, by the people at large. But a majority of the States in which the judicial tenure is limited by years, are new States; not only so, compared with the old thirteen, but new in the constitutional history of the country. The argument, therefore, from the example of the new States, has no application here. Their population consists of all sorts of men,—samples of all nations on the face of the earth,—Jews and Greeks, Parthians and Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia; many of them on the wing, making up the great tide of emigration which is following the star of empire, from the East to the West, to be brought up among the feculence upon the shores of the Pacific Ocean. There is, then, a good reason why those States should elect their judges by a popular vote, and elect them frequently; for while all these races are mingling at the polls, and no one knows which race is to predominate there, whether German, Norwegian, or other Slavonian; or whether the Anglo-Saxon will prevail, it is well, so long as all their institutions are passing through a stage of experiment, and every breath is, as it were, a breath of experiment—it is well that they should fix a short term for the judicial tenure. They distrust the material out of which they have to make the selection, and I readily grant that they act wisely. But what may be wise in them may be folly in us.

We have one speech. We are not men, one-half of whom have the speech of the Jews, and the other half, the speech of Ashdod. We understand one another. We are men of the soil of Massachusetts, men of New England, men acquainted with each other's habits. We were raised on this soil; we know every plant which the soil has produced; and no prominent man can be named whose fitness for the bench cannot readily be ascertained. The executive occupies a position where he can always draw on the sources of public information! I do not say that the people at the polls would be able to judge in such cases, for our farmers have their own interests to attend to, and no cause to inquire who is the best lawyer, for it is not often that they have occasion to be reminded that there is such a profession in existence. And it is well for them that it is so. But the executive is, from the nature of his position, made acquainted with the public men in the community, and, being surrounded by a council to aid and advise him, can obtain all the information that he needs to enable him to make a suitable appointment.

Before I leave this topic of the example of other States, let me say, that, although there is one State where the selection of judges is made annually, which is Vermont, and that also a New England State, it is no example for us, and for this very good reason: the practice was commenced in that State before the great division of the people into political parties. The people were then of one mind; and the habit of calmly and dispassionately selecting their judges, which then commenced, has acquired the power of organic law. The people of Vermont may safely continue the practice of annually electing their judges, while it would be dangerous for us now to depart from our present tenure; what is safe for them might be death to us. Only one State has a judicial tenure of five years; but several have extended the limitation to six years; and among these is California. There is not one of us who would not have gone for six years, or less than that, had we been citizens of that State. For one, Sir, I should have been unwilling to have given the judges so long a term as that. I think I should have been in favor of one year; for if they were chosen by universal suffrage, perhaps the first one who came forward to take the oath of office would have signed his name in characters cabalistic to Americans, and would have appeared in a short silk jacket, with a queue as long as the tail of an alligator. In such a state of society as that I should prefer to elect them for one year, at first, although perhaps afterwards the term might safely be lengthened to five, six, or seven years. I would prolong it as rapidly as possible, and put it during good behavior, whenever suitable men could be found, with anything like New England or other Anglo-Saxon blood flowing in their veins. Besides California, Wisconsin, Iowa, Indiana, Georgia and Texas, have also the six years' tenure. Ohio has five; but the two Carolinas have adhered to the old and sound tenure of good behavior; so has Delaware; and so has Connecticut, but with a limitation to seventy years of age. Massachusetts still ranks in this class of wise States; so does New Hampshire; and so did Maine, but she has changed.

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — GREENLEAF.

[July 13th.

I have taken pains to inquire of men whose opinions were worth asking for, how this system worked in those States which have abandoned the tenure of good behavior and adopted the limitation of a term of years. Sir, they have answered me with one voice, that they repelled it. The project seems generally to have originated with political partizans, who talked much of the people, and of giving the election to the people, beguiling them with the idea that they had not the power of election because they did not see its exercise in their own hands, but made it through the agency of their servant, the governor. It was in some cases proposed evidently for the purpose of raising political capital. In others, perhaps by some aspirant who could not wait for the demise of a judge, still sound in every department of his own organism, or perhaps by some one who sought a seat on the bench merely to aid him to some higher position. Having once put the question to the people, few would venture to vote against it, certain, in that case, to be marked and ostracized as enemies of the people; and therefore it passed, as it were, by default. The bench, in those States, has generally deteriorated, as was naturally to be expected, from such a change, where men, following this ignis fatuus, have destroyed the independence of their judges.

Mr. Chairman, change is not progress. I go as strongly for progress as any gentleman in this Convention. I would favor nothing merely because it is new; and I would respect nothing merely because it is covered with the moss of ages. I would adhere to that which is found by experience to be good, and would abandon and cut off, as a diseased limb, whatever is a source of evil, pain or mischief, to the community. But let us wait and know whether it is so, before we proceed to make so momentous an experiment. It has been said here, Sir, that the people do not demand this change; and the reason why they do not demand it, is, because they have nothing to say against the present system. No complaint was made previous to the calling of this Convention, that I know of; and none is now pretended. If we ask the people, they have nothing to say; but they did say, at least so it was reported by the committee of one branch of the legislature, that it was not worth while, at present, to disturb the judiciary, and that this subject should be left to the wisdom of the Convention. Are we to understand by that, that the duty is imposed upon the Convention, to make the change at all events? By no means; it is left to the Convention, in their wisdom, to pass upon the subject when it shall come before them. If they are able to find any fault with it, they may suggest such a change in the system as may seem expedient; but that is all that I understand the people to have said by calling the Convention.

Sir, I would ask, what we are to expect, if the proposed change should be made? I have nothing to say with regard to elections by the people; I leave that matter for others to discuss; but I address myself mainly to the question of tenure. I do not believe that the people of Massachusetts will ever take the election of judges into their own hands. I think they are too wise to assume the labor and hazard of electing them. But it appears to me, that the change of tenure which is now proposed to be made, is a change fraught with great probable evil; and, although I might content myself with asking gentlemen to give a reason why a change of any kind should be made, I am willing to go further than that, and say, that the advocates of this system propose a change which is mischievous in the essential elements of its character. The proposition is in substance, a tenure of ten years. I believe an amendment has either been proposed or suggested, as intended to be offered, which would reduce that tenure; but I will assume it at ten years. Under the present system, which places the judge as much out of the reach of the undue influences of polarization, as it does of the grosser temptations to depart from his duty—under this system, which is as perfect as the wit of our fathers has been able to devise, and which has stood the test of experience for so many generations, still, under this system, it is not always in the power of the State to command the first talent. We do know, Sir, that sometimes the governor has been obliged to approach one individual after another, either directly or through the medium of friends, before a competent person could be found, who was willing to be a judge of the supreme court, with a salary of three thousand or three thousand five hundred dollars. We know that instances have not been wanting, it is not for me to say how frequently, in which such invitations have been declined. Now why has the office been rejected? The reasons may have been various. But at all events, it has not always been in the power of the executive to command, in the first instance, the highest class of talent, and to procure the services of the gifted men. I do not mean to say, and I hope I shall not be understood as implying, that the incumbents of the bench do not, every individual of them, belong to that class; but I say that the governor has sometimes asked some of that class, and asked in vain, and, therefore, he has been obliged to ask others. Now, the argument which I draw from this fact, is, that if, under the present system, when the tenure of office is permanent, depending only on good behavior and the capacity to discharge the duties of the office, there is not such an inducement to accept it as enables the governor always to command the best of talent, what will be the case when you remove from the office the most powerful inducement which can be presented to the mind of any gentleman—I mean the permanent tenure? No individual will be found, who, after having served for ten years on the bench, can go back and recover his professional standing. He will not be able to find his old clients, nor to compete with his rivals, who are fresh in the practice of the bar. Sir, you might as well attempt to raise from the depths of the sea, a corpse over which the blue wave has rolled, and infuse life into its limbs, as to reinstate such a judge at the bar. It is ordinarily impossible. He is no longer an advocate. Some few individuals, who are attached to him from personal considerations, may return, but he cannot regain his former position. This is the experience of every lawyer who leaves the bar, even for another department of his profession.

Is it, then, to be supposed that you can induce one to accept a seat upon the bench, when that office is to continue but for ten years? Sir, it is hardly possible; while he sees, at the end of ten years, he must seek, perhaps in vain, the treasuryship of some cotton factory, or the presidency of a railroad. And how can you remedy this evil, unless by appointing for judges none but men of the age of sixty years? But our selections for office are made from a much younger class of men. The early age at which we, in this country, assume the responsibilities of manhood, has already attracted the attention of the old world. Our young men have hardly gone over a brief course in our colleges and institutions of learning before they are called, of necessity, to enter upon the business of men; and we are obliged to restrain them by statute, from practising at the bar until they are twenty-one years of age; lest, during minority, they should assume the responsibility of conducting cases involving thousands of dollars. It is not their fault; it is the misfortune of the country.

From all quarters there is a wailing cry for men. The West is vociferously demanding men—men immediately; the demand is pressing, and necessity compels us to hurry our young men into manhood. Now, Sir, it is manifest—I speak of facts, and would commend the subject to the serious consideration of gentlemen present—it is manifest that it is from the class of young or middle aged men that we must select our judges. And can you induce men of competent learning, and high professional aspirations, to take a judicial office for only ten years, when they must know and feel that the termination of that period will be the termination of their professional life? No lawyer is willing to limit his professional career to ten years; and yet every lawyer knows that it would be so; and that when the ten years are expired he must lay some other foundation for the means of living. Fortunes are seldom made in this profession. It is a proverbial saying, that lawyers work hard, live well, and die poor. Such seems to be their "manifest destiny." There is, therefore, but one mode in which you may obtain a choice of the best talent for the bench, and that is by paying for it. It has sometimes been said, in other States, that judges in Massachusetts have large salaries; but it is not thought so in our own. No, Sir; the salaries of the judges of the State of Massachusetts are not equal to the demands which custom and the present state of society make upon them. I venture to say, that no judge on the bench of the supreme court of this Commonwealth, who has lived as the community expected him to live, has been able to lay up a single dollar.

I put it to the gentlemen who advocate the ten years' tenure, whether, in order to procure the services of men of the first rank in the profession on the bench of the supreme court, they are willing to raise the salaries of the judges? Will you vote for increasing their salaries, so that, with the strictest economy, they may have an opportunity of retiring with enough to sustain them for perhaps a year or so, until they can do something else for their growing families, and the education of their sons? Unless gentlemen are willing to do this, I hold it to be utterly impossible to secure the services of men of the character I speak of.

Wednesday.]

THE JUDICIARY.—GREENLEAF—FRENCH.

[July 13th.]

Enough, Sir, has been said of the danger of a judge, whose period of official life is about to expire, being influenced by political considerations, of which, perhaps, he himself is not fully aware. Enough has been said to show that he may still cherish the hope of reappointment, and of the danger that, when a question highly exciting to the popular mind is brought before him, he may not be able to preserve his impartiality and independence. The presence within his court of a large portion of the body politic, in cases of popular excitement, will be apt to produce a degree of perturbation in his orbit and drive him from his equanimity. It cannot otherwise be, because we know that it has so happened. If I am well informed in regard to what has taken place in other States, where the judicial tenure was, at first, during good behavior, but was subsequently altered to a short term of years with reeligibility, I can state upon such information that this evil has already been experienced. Judges, previously distinguished for impartiality, seeing, when their term was near expiration, and by the foreshadowing of coming events, which party would soon be predominant, have been evidently too complacent to those members of the bar, and those suitors who were known to belong to that political party. Few men are conscious of the existence of such motives; but diplomatists and politicians well know, that if an individual is placed in any given position, they can calculate with tolerable certainty how he will act. No man, it is true, will undertake to offer a bribe to a judge. No man will say to him, if you will do this or that you can receive so much money; but it is easy, through other influences, of which he himself is unconscious, to draw him aside from his duty.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I originally intended, and perhaps ought to ask pardon for trespassing thus long upon the time of the Committee. But, in conclusion, let me again seriously ask—has the system under which we now live worked well? If anything is to be done now, it seems to me that your duty is to review the system, and not absolutely to change it. If it has worked well, your duty is to let it alone. The people expect that of you. If it has not worked well, let it be changed, judiciously, and carefully, and wisely, by the light of experience; but unless it can be shown that it has been productive of some disadvantage to the community, it would be the height of folly to lay aside experience and the lessons of history and enter upon an untried experiment, which, however well it may have operated in other States, where the population and circumstances of the case are widely different from ours, would be dangerous to the good old State of Massachusetts.

Mr. FRENCH, of Bew Bedford. After the eloquent speeches we have just listened to, I will only detain the Convention a few moments, for appearances indicate that the Convention is already wearied with this discussion. I simply desire to say that I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) providing for an elective judiciary. I think it is right; I think it is proper; I think it is safe, and that no harm can possibly arise from it. As has been said already, it is not denied that the people are perfectly well qualified to elect their governor and other officers of State; and if that be so, I am unable to see why they are not equally as well qualified to elect their judges as they are to elect a man who is to select and appoint them. It has been said here that there has been no demand on the part of the people for this change. I differ entirely with the gentlemen who put forth this sentiment. In that portion of the Commonwealth which I in part represent, I know that there has been such a demand—that the subject was discussed, to some extent, before the people, while the question of calling a Convention was under consideration; and I believe also that a large portion of the citizens of the Commonwealth desire that change. They have not come with petitions to the legislature or the Convention asking for such a change; but, Sir, we all know that other subjects have been discussed and acted upon here in regard to which the people have not petitioned.

Again, Sir, it is said that the judiciary should be independent. I like to have independent and upright men in all public stations, but I do not like the idea of having any public officers entirely independent of the people. I think they should be so dependent at least, as to have an eye to the power they serve. It is true that so much has not been said among the people in regard to this change as has been said in regard to some other changes which have been proposed and acted upon; nor do I know that there has been any serious complaints among the people in regard to our judiciary; at least, I know of none. But, Sir, what is the reason why men having claims upon each other, are so slow to put them in process of law? I knew a man who had a claim against another upon a note of hand for about $100, and one of the best lawyers in the neighborhood told him his claim was perfectly good and recoverable, and that the party was good for it and advised him to prosecute. But he refused to do so, alleging that the party owing it could make it cost him a hundred and fifty dollars before he could get judgment for the one hundred.

There is then, evidently, a lack of justice somewhere—a screw loose in the machinery; I do not know that there is any shorter way of getting justice in the Commonwealth; but if there is not, it is a matter of very little moment to me whether our judges are elected by the people or appointed by the governor. I believe that if a man has a claim of a hundred dollars against another, there should be an easier way of recovering it than by having to pay a hundred and fifty; and without casting any blame on the judiciary,—for I believe it is composed of honorable men,—I am inclined to think that if we elected our judges, we would, with that and a few other alterations in our judiciary system, obtain a shorter way to justice.

Sir, I quite agree with those gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, that this is an important question. It is said that every citizen should be protected in his rights; and we have been told that every citizen, however humble, may come before our courts, and spread out his case, and demand his rights. All that may be very well, Mr. President, but the most important question then comes up, can our citizens obtain their rights when they ask for them. Sir, we ought to be able, by our executive and judiciary, to protect every citizen breathing the air or treading the soil of Massachusetts. We have been asked whether the present system has not worked well, and whether there has been any complaint about it? In answer to that, I have to say, that I stand here and tell you, that a free citizen of Massachusetts—as free, Mr. President, as either you or I—has failed to be protected by the judiciary. A free citizen has been taken from the soil of Massachusetts, and carried down south into slavery, and if not now dead, is probably writhing under the lash. I will not say that the judiciary failed to do its duty intentionally, but I do stand here to say that I heard the claim for a writ of habeas corpus, in the case of Thomas Sims, argued before the supreme judges of the Commonwealth,—I heard that unanswerable argument of the lamented Rantoul, that has never been, and never can be excelled, showing that the general government was stretching its long arm into the State of Massachusetts, and was pouncing upon its free citizens, in violation of the Constitution of the United States,—I say that I heard that argument, and that it failed to induce the supreme judges to issue the writ, and thus secure to that citizen his inalienable rights.

The writ of habeas corpus has not been available to save a citizen from the grasp of the strong arm of the slave power, which came here without constitutional authority. The fugitive slave law, has been alluded to—the law under which a slaveholder and the officers of the general government undertook to take this citizen, Thomas Sims; but they did not take him by the authority of that law. No, Sir, they could not come to Boston and pick up a Massachusetts citizen under the fugitive slave law. How did they take Sims? They got the police of the city of Boston to take him and bind him for them, and then they carried him off into slavery.

Now, Sir, the officers of that government, who aimed to take away a free citizen of Massachusetts, had not the power to do it. We had proof of it, before a committee of the legislature of the Commonwealth, at that time. One man, Marshal Tukey, testified, that the officers of the United States government could not catch him, in the first place, and then if they could catch him, they could not keep him. Shadrach, you know, slipped through their fingers, and is now in Canada. I hope the general government may never have the power of stretching out that long arm, and taking away from Massachusetts, any of her free citizens. That so-called fugitive slave law, as it has been characterized here and elsewhere, is no law. The Constitution of the United States, nowhere gives congress the least authority, to enact any such law, and the members of congress when they passed it, knew, or ought to have known, that fact full well. No man, in my judgment, has undertaken to execute that law who does not know enough to know that it is unconstitutional—no law, and ought not to be enforced.

Now, Sir, I would like to have judges elected by the people that they may not be so independent of them, so that if another case upon the writ of habeas corpus similar to the one to which I have referred should come up before them, they will be dependent enough to listen favorably to argument, and be able to give equal protection to all, or better reasons for refusing it than were rendered in the case of Sims.

Sir, it has been said that the fugitive slave law applies to all of us. It does. The gentleman from Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) to-day is liable to be taken and carried south under that law, if they (his friends,) have the power to execute it at all. Some of my constituents feel a deep interest in this matter. I should like to read to the Convention a short letter, received by one of them some time since. It is dated Norfolk, Va., 18th December, 1851, and is as follows:—

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — FRENCH — BUTLER.

[July 13th.

"To my slave Joe Benton:—

"You wrote me some months ago from Halifax, Nova Scotia, but I knew that you were not there, and only did this to lead me off your track,—but from sickness and a pressing engagement which prevented me, I would have pursued you last fall to New Bedford and by this time you would have been in Virginia. In your letter you asked me how much I would ask to send you free papers. I wrote you then but have not heard from you since on this subject. I write now by Captain Kelly who promised me to deliver this letter to yourself. I will send you free papers if you will forward to me, through any channel, that I can get it, six hundred dollars. You can then live where you please. I will wait a short time for your answer and if you do not make this arrangement to pay for yourself, I WILL FORTHWITH TAKE STEPS TO HAVE YOU ARRESTED AND BROUGHT BACK TO VIRGINIA IF YOU CAN BE FOUND WITHIN THE UNITED STATES. YOU WILL BE IN THE MARSHAL'S HANDS BEFORE YOU ARE AWARE OF IT. You can write to me by mail on the subject. You are not now safe five minutes.

Your Master,

JAMES H. BEHAN."

Well, they have probably been to New Bedford to look after Joe and others, but they could not find them.

As I said before, I have not a word to say against the present judges, but I feel that if they should be directly elected by the people they would be nearer the people. It was said, Sir, by the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) that this system of an elective judiciary does not work well in the State of New York. I have some little acquaintance with gentlemen in that State and I must say, notwithstanding the gentleman has read a couple of letters from a couple of lawyers in that State to the contrary, that those persons with whom I have conversed in that State, tell me an entirely different story, and I believe that were you to consult the mass of the people upon that subject they would tell you that the system works well, and that they like it. I am well aware of the fears expressed in Massachusetts about the time the people of New York were contemplating changing their form of government and were talking about electing their judges by the people, and I am aware that those fears were rife in the State of New York; but since the change has been made, and the judges have been elected, the people are satisfied with the arrangement. The people there are well satisfied with the workings of the system. I will not detain the Convention longer for I am satisfied that all are weary of this discussion. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) will prevail, and that we shall elect our judges by the people.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. If I agreed, Sir, with the gentleman from New Bedford who has just taken his seat, in the belief that the Convention is tired of this discussion, I should not trouble them. I had supposed that this question would have been debated more at length—not that I am anxious that time should be taken up at all, but because this is a question which needs full discussion here, in order that the people on the one side and the other, may be satisfied with our action. And, Sir, I have waited for some member of the Committee to speak upon this question, and I am not prepared to speak with that accuracy which, perhaps, any gentleman should use who attempts to speak to the Convention upon this subject. But, Sir, I have a few words, in which, in the short time that I shall trouble the Convention, I think I can express my ideas upon the question of an elective judiciary. And for one, as one who for the last fifteen years has watched, and not as an idle spectator, the workings of the judicial system of Massachusetts, and at the risk, too, of some sickly conservative calling me a "hyena" for attacking it, I propose to give what I believe to be the call of the people upon this question, to some considerable degree. Whether or not the people are ready for the question, whether it has been sufficiently discussed, whether it was not an oversight in our friends, who have laid out the subjects for our attention, in leaving this matter of an elective judiciary out, I am not now ready to canvass. But I do believe, that within the last year a great change has been going on in the public mind, the reasons of which are, many of them, obvious. I say I am not quite certain in my own mind, whether the people are ready to act in this matter, and whether it has been sufficiently discussed I am led to doubt, and therefore I wish to say a word or two upon the vote I shall give upon this subject. While I am not quite certain that I should be willing to peril that which I look upon as the great reform movement of the age, the amendment of our Constitution, which we propose, upon the question of an elective judiciary, and stake the whole of our action as a Convention upon it—as may be done—I can say for one, that were I to vote for such a plan as best accords with my judgment, without any fear of any other reform suffering from my action, and without any other belief than that I was doing that which is best for myself, for my children, and the State, I would vote for an elective judiciary.

The whole argument which was put by my friend for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) appeared to me to proceed upon an entirely wrong basis—upon a distrust of the people. And that was the case with the ingenious argument of the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Greenleaf,) who, with the tact of an old lawyer, and the artistic finish of the profession, says: "Why, why, do you wish to make the judges elective. The people elect them now. They elect the governor and the governor elects the judges, and what more would you do."

I say I think both the gentlemen have proceeded upon a wrong assumption. One fairly puts the argument that he distrusts the people, that he distrusts popular influence, an argument which seems to proceed upon the ground that every bad influence comes from the people, and every good influence from conservatism; it seems to put the argument upon the ground that the judges are only to be influenced by corporate wealth and power. If they can be rendered independent of the people, they say, it is well enough; but if you bring them within the influence of the people, they will be wrong. Put them where the people cannot get at them, surround them with the $400,000,000 of incorporated wealth of the State, put around them a set of partizans, much greater, much more numerous, much more hungry, much more greedy and voracious than are even the partizans of the general government in this State—and that is saying quite enough—and then say to them, behave well upon the bench and your political reticacy shall be the presidency of a railroad, or a manufacturing corporation, or some other salaried office! and it is all well enough. Such influences do not touch them, is the argument on the other side. But if you say to them, you have nothing to do but to be an upright judge, to deal out justice fairly, to sell it to none, to deny it to none, and the people will stand by you, as has been found to be the case by the experience of other States of the Union, and at once my friend for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) distrusts the independence of the judiciary.

But the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Greenleaf,) says that the judges are virtually elected by the people. Sir, are we blind? If the gentleman had not disarmed me by saying that he never read the newspapers, and therefore did not know what was going on in this world around him, I would like to ask him if he has never heard of a judge who held on to his office after he wished to resign to wait for a change of political parties, or of a governor who disappointed his friends in his appointment of a judge of the supreme court for fear of the action of a convention of the people upon the subject of a judiciary.

I do not think that we should shut our eyes and then say all goes well. I ask gentlemen who come here and say that all wisdom was centered in our ancestors seventy-five years ago, and that all wisdom is derived from that period,—and I admit that they saw much, though they saw not all things,—whether the world has made no progress in the last seventy-five years? I do not profess to be wiser than our generation, by no manner of means, but I am of opinion that the science of government has progressed, as well as other sciences, during that time. Seventy-five years ago, it took almost three weeks to go from Boston to Washington, and it required the same time to transmit intelligence between the two places. Now we can go in twenty-four hours.

Mr. DANA, (interrupting). And come back again.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, as my friend for Manchester says, go and come back again, and we can learn something too, while we are gone, [laughter.] We can now send intelligence in three minutes. You might as well tell me that because my grandfather did not know of any better means of conveyance than the old fashioned stage coach, at three miles the hour, and the postboy with the mail on his back, pacing along to convey news at the rate of twenty miles a day, that I should not use the rail car, or the telegraph, at this day, because as in their wisdom they saw them not. Have we progressed in nothing but mechanics? Why tell me that the science of government has not progressed? Why, Sir, the science of government is progressive, like every other science.

But, Sir, we are told that there has been no complaint of the judiciary in this Commonwealth. It is not for me to make an attack, if there has been. It is not for the bar to do that. The judges sit there beyond our reach, and woe to the individual upon whom their hands shall fall. The lawyer may not do that. I will say one or two things, however, which I think I have the right to say, because I am not especially afraid. I do not now speak of the men. I pray to be understood, and not misunderstood. I do not now speak of the men, but I speak of the system. Now what has happened?

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — BUTLER.

[July 13th.

Well, Sir, in 1838, for instance, the legislature of this Commonwealth passed a law, which stands unrepealed upon the statute book, saying that every case which was decided by our supreme court each year, should be reported and published each year before the first day of September. That stands as the law of the land, binding upon the supreme court, and upon every-body else. Now, Sir, what is the fact to-day? The fact is, and I challenge any lawyer in this Convention, from A to Izzard, from beginning to end, to contradict it, the fact is, that we do not judicially know of any decision in this Commonwealth since the year 1850. And yet that law stands upon your statute book, and we have an independent judiciary! Perfectly independent of that law. Every year we have had murmurs, not loud but deep, from the profession, and every year we have had murmurs deep and loud in the legislature; but yet there is no redress. Now, Sir, I speak not of men, I might not dare to speak of men, but I speak of this fact, and I ask any gentleman in this Convention to tell me if it is not so? And I ask them, further, to tell me what redress we have? Who are to indict them? Will my friend the attorney-general, (Mr. Choate,) thunder against them the indictment he threatened against Berlin? If he does, where will he find a court to try it? He may tell me there is a remedy in impeachment. Sir, not meaning to carry the comparison too far, I may at least say that this impeachment is a very cumbersome kind of machinery. I can only say, as I said to a client of mine who was a justice of the peace, and who came to me, and said they wanted to impeach him. "Impeach you for what?" said I. "Why, for something connected with my office." "Poh!" said I, "the idea of using a sledge hammer to kill a mosquito." [Laughter.] Sir, whenever you undertake to impeach a judge, you have got to set going a machinery so complicated, so vast and so unsatisfactory in its results, that nothing but the most pressing necessity will ever put it in motion. If I remember correctly, it is a species of machinery which has never been successfully put in motion but once in the history of this Commonwealth, as against a high judicial officer. So you have no practical remedy there.

Now, Sir, is this delay of the reports which are required by law, a matter of necessity? Why, lying upon my table in my office, I have the reports of the Queen's Bench up to when? I have those reports up to the last day of May. We can get the law of England up to last May, but we cannot get the law of Massachusetts only up to the year 1850—three years this coming fall. And what is the trouble? Is it for want of the laws upon your statute books? In order that there may be no mistake in this matter, I will read the law upon this subject, and let gentlemen see if there is any judicial exposition that can alter it.

In the 100th chapter—acts of 1838, you will find the following:—

"The reports of the decisions of the supreme judicial court on all questions of law argued and determined before the first day of September, in each year, shall be published on or before that day.

"April 12, 1838."

Now, there is not a lawyer in this assembly who does not know that there are a hundred cases which have been argued and determined before that supreme judicial court, which have not been reported; and what is the reason? What is the trouble? Not in the men, for the judges of our courts are good men and true, but in the system. They know that they are independent in this respect. They are responsible to nobody. They are like a rich man who will not work, because he has no necessity for working. Gentlemen cannot tell me that it is the fault of the law reporter, because every-body knows that the custom has grown up, and been continued until it has become law, that each judge shall write out his own decisions, and the reporter cannot get them until they are written out for him. Well, Sir, I have only to say that there is a grievous fault which lies somewhere. It lies in the system, and I think the system should be reformed.

Now, Sir, another reason. The member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) challenged me boldly. He challenged every man in the Convention, if he knew of any dissatisfaction to exist with the courts, as they are now organized, to tell him of it. Now, Sir, I could have wished that other voices than mine, had responded to that call. But I speak in the presence of those who know if I speak unadvisedly.

For one, I can say, that while in the legislature last year, I was more than once importuned, to use what little power I might have in bringing the matter before the legislature, to procure the abolition of one of the courts of this Commonwealth, and for what purpose? To get rid of the judges upon that bench who were appointed for life, and could not be removed in any other way. Sir, how many men in this hall, know like facts? How many have at least heard of it? Yet this fact is to be hoodwinked out of sight, and we, like young partridges, are to put our heads under a leaf and suppose that we are out of sight.

And there is another trouble in this system of judiciary. Because while these facts are well known, yet we must not say a word about them—I beg your pardon, Sir, I am very apt to speak out in meeting. [Laughter.] I propose to tell the truth and will not hold my peace. Now I put it to the lawyers of the Convention and I ask them to answer me, not by whitewashing process, but upon your honors, gentlemen; do you not know that the fact I have named is true? If you do, then why seek to conceal it?

Now, Sir, these are the reasons why I ask that the term of office of your judges may be limited, or rather a part of the reasons. If you have a good man for a judge, you will reelect him, but if we get a bad man, I want some means provided by which he can be put out of office. A good man will be independent, but if your judge is a bad man, he ought not to be independent and irremovable.

Now, let us see how this system of making the judges elective for limited terms, works in other States? In the State of Vermont they have elected, year by year, the same men for thirty years in succession. It was said that in Vermont this system began very early, when there was very little political excitement in Vermont. Well, Sir, that may be true but it has passed through times of as high political excitement as we have had anywhere. It has been in the hands of as hot headed partisans as can be found in any other State. During the anti-masonic excitement, which raged more terribly there than perhaps in any other State, although it changed the whole political aspect of the legislature, it produced no change in the judiciary. The same men were elected judges year by year.

How is it in Rhode Island, where the judges continue in office as long as the legislature choose to allow them? There has been no difficulty in Rhode Island in making the judges independent.

How is it anywhere else in relation to this matter? The gentleman from Cambridge told us of a judge who was turned out of office by his own party. Well, Sir, what that gentleman told us in relation to that judge, simply showed what was in here, [pointing to his breast,] and it is the best argument that could have been adduced for our side of the question. He showed that this judge was a man who ought not to be upon the bench, and the people did right in turning him out. But, Sir, if we had got him there in Massachusetts, we should have been obliged to have kept him there as long as he lived, and he would have lived longer than anybody else. [Laughter.] That is the distinction precisely which I wish to draw; that is exactly the reason why I want to change our system.

'Sir, I believe in the capacity of the people to elect their own judges, and to elect those who are proper men for the office. I stand impregnable upon that ground. And I ask gentlemen to point me to one State which has changed from an elective judiciary to an appointive one. I can refer them to twenty States out of the thirty-one States which now elect their judges, or some portion of them. I can point to thirteen States which have gone from appointing during good behavior, to an elective judiciary for a term of years. I can point to thirteen States that have made that change, and now will some gentleman have the kindness to point out one to me that has gone from an elective system back to an appointive one? because, if he can, that will be an argument in favor of retaining the present system in Massachusetts.

Sir, I was amazed and amused, both at once, at the ingenuity with which the keen lawyer from Cambridge (Mr. Greenleaf) dwelt, in his artistic manner, upon the fact of so many States having adopted an elective judiciary. He said that in those new States, where the people did not know one another, it was well enough for them to elect their judiciary. "But," said he, "here in old Massachusetts, where every man knows every other man who is fit to be a judge, and where, of course, the people know exactly who have the proper qualifications to be a judge, they ought not to be elected." Why, Sir, that seemed to me a very strange idea. If it had come from some other source I should have thought my ears deceived me; but they could not deceive me. In a State where the people do not know each other, and do not know who they are selecting, it is very proper to elect their judges; but in a State where they do know each other, and where they do know the men they select, they are not fit to select their judges! Oh, no; it would be disastrous and ruinous to their interests. Will that do? Can it be possible that the gentleman from Cambridge will say that men whom the people do not know at all are fit to be elected, while if the people do know them, they are not fit to elect them? That was the effect of his argument. Sir, it will not do. I cannot

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—BUTLER—PARKER.

[July 13th.]

hold to any such argument. It may be a good one, but it does not strike me favorably.

Then there was another argument. The gentleman from Cambridge put the question, triumphantly, as I thought, if you appoint your judges for a term of ten years—and I shall go for a term of at least three years less than that—will you vote to increase their salaries? If they are inadequate, certainly I will. Show me that the present salaries are inadequate to obtain the very best legal talent in the Commonwealth, and I am content. I shall think it good economy to vote for an amount that will obtain that talent. I hold that the office of judge should not be sent begging. And I hold, also, that it should not be kept in the hands of a governor for the purpose of trying the temper of a Convention. I hold that an important office in the Commonwealth should not be kept unfilled, when the reason is not because there is nothing for the officer to do, but when your courts are overburdened with cases undisposed of, but because it may be thought best to keep a vacancy until the Convention get through. Sir, I repeat, if the salary is not large enough, I am ready at any time to vote to increase it.

But the fallacy of the gentleman's argument, it seemed to me, was that, per force, a good judge would have to go out at the end of ten years. Now, I cannot agree with the gentleman there, by any manner of means. I insist—and I will point the gentlemen to examples in other States—that he will be reelected or reappointed. But the gentleman from Cambridge says he will not be reelected, that he will go out at the end of ten years, and that he will not be able again to recover his clients. Can that be true? I ask gentlemen to try it in their own minds. Here is a man who has been on the bench for ten years; he has proved himself to be an honest man and a good lawyer; he has proved himself to be conversant with the law; and I ask gentlemen whether they would not employ such a man a good deal quicker than they would one of the young birds, which the gentleman was afraid would pick out his eyes. You take a man away from the bench, and the people will go to him at once for advice, and pass by the younger men of the profession. We shall be allowed to do all the work in preparing cases and bringing them before them, while they will give the advice and take the fees.

But the gentleman from Cambridge brought another argument, which I was surprised to see him bring, under any circumstances, and especially in the presence of the persons before whom he brought it. He said that when a man went to congress, he lost not only all his clients, but all his tact. Sir, I could have pointed to at least one example that would have given a negative of a most extensive character to that. I could have told him of at least one gentleman who went to congress, and who, when he returned, seemed not only not to have lost his tact, but seemed to have acquired new and additional tact in his absence; and instead of lessening the number of his clients, increased them to such an extent as to excite the envy of the rest of us—if such a feeling as envy could ever be supposed to get into a lawyer's breast. [Great laughter.]

Sir, I cannot agree with the argument of the gentleman from Cambridge. In the first place, he betrayed a want of confidence in the people.

Now, Sir, I believe the people know what they are about. I believe they know what they want, and that they will have it, too. You are to make a Constitution that is fitted to their wants. Our people are educated in a knowledge of their rights, and they will have good judges upon the bench if they get the power of that selection into their own hands. But suppose they are appointed for a term of years, and are not elected by the people. It is said that a governor would not reappoint a good judge. Try it; try it and see. What governor is there—I speak to those who have had experience upon this point, I put it to the learned chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Morton,)—what governor is there, who, seeing a good judge upon the bench, whose term of office had expired, would not reappoint him? Tell me the man? I know of no man who would not do it.

And if the people elect the judges, will gentlemen tell me that the South Shore would not reelect a man because he was from Franklin, and Franklin would not reelect a man from South Shore. Sir, do you believe that? I ask any gentleman in the Convention if he believes his political friends would refuse to keep a good judge upon the bench because of his politics?

One word in relation to another view of this matter and I have done. I think we are laboring under a great mistake, if we have yielded quietly to what has been said upon this question, and acknowledge it to be true. We have been told that the judiciary is not in any degree a political power, and that it has nothing to do with politics. In my judgment the great central political power of this Commonwealth for the last twenty years, has been the supreme judicial court. I do not mean that the judges upon the bench have given decisions upon political questions either the right or wrong way. I do not mean that they have been corrupt men; but every lawyer of a given party who desires a seat upon the bench which is the ultima thule and the very acme of the hopes of the bar, has a prospect before him, where, by well doing and a little boring, he may be able to get a seat upon the bench sooner or later. All over the Commonwealth, in every county, we have been pointed to the character and standing of the men who fill seats upon the bench. I grant the ability which they possess, and I am not here to quarrel with their integrity; but from the partisans of a single party in every county of the Commonwealth, we have heard the declaration, "see what men we possess upon the bench; you cannot point to any such, and, until lately, we have had no such political aspirations." I am sorry that the learned chairman of this Committee has gone out, because I presume he would subscribe to what I say. I grant that we have had a Democrat upon the bench, but if you will look through the reports you will find all the use made of him was, whenever there was a knotty question which had to be decided, giving the opinion was usually put upon him. [Laughter.] I mean a knotty point which was not exactly popular. I am afraid that I may here interfere with somebody's good nature; but I will try and not do so. Look at the decisions upon the militia question, upon the parish questions, and you will find, that by a great misfortune, or good fortune, they were always given, when of an unpopular character, by a particular judge of judges. It has been said, that the main portion of the judges were all one way in political questions. This may have been mere accident. I am bound to suppose it was, if I was one of those who shut my eyes and think that by so doing nobody can see me. I will tell you what we cannot do, if we elect them by the people. We cannot more than elect them all one way. We cannot do worse than that in any event. It is for these reasons, and in the belief that in the progress of reform the time has come, when the people, governing themselves, have a right to hold their agents directly accountable to them, and believing in the truth as a living and actual truth, that it is a necessity in a republican government, that the people should hold all their agents accountable to them by a frequent recurrence of the appointing power, I am decidedly in favor of changing the tenure of office of judges and making them elective. One word more and then I will take my seat. I shall have at least defined my position, if I may have made myself misunderstood in the reasons given for assuming it. I will not speak of the necessities which seem to have given to our courts a facility of decision in one direction, and upon a given class of cases. I leave this matter for those who I know are more able than myself to discuss that subject; but I say in closing, as I commenced, that were it left to me to-day to settle this question, and to say what sort of a judiciary I would have, I would vote for an elective judiciary; but living in a Commonwealth that has been accustomed to a different system, and when men have been educated under a different system, I must yield in that respect to the judgment of those who know better than myself, whether the people are ready for a popular election of these officers, and whether, in the language of the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Greenleaf,) which came out inadvertently, whether the people are ready to take "the reins into their own hands." That expression seemed to slip out of the gentleman's lips quite inadvertently, but that is exactly the question. Are the people ready to take the reins into their own hands, or are they to submit to a driver as at present, a few years longer? Are we still to place these judges above us and exalt them as angels and worship them as the Egyptian worshipped his idol, not for any beauty or comeliness of figure or form, but for some supposed hidden intelligence contained within it? Are we to do that, or are we to make this class of rulers precisely like every other class, amenable to the people at short periods, and selected from among themselves? For one, as I said, I should vote for selecting them by the people. I am not yet prepared to say, that the people are ready for that change, or I should strenuously insist upon an elective judiciary at the present moment.

Mr. PARKER, of Cambridge. I have listened to this debate with considerable interest, for the purpose of learning what objections there are at present, in connection with the tenure of office as it now exists, and what the evils are which are to be remedied by the proposed change. It was only, until the two last speakers placed their sentiments before the Convention, that I was able to find anything alleged, by reason of what had already occurred, why a change should be made. There have been some suggestions made by the gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) and the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) to which I should like to reply; but as the hour is so late, I hardly feel inclined to trespass upon the patience of the Convention at this time. I move,

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c.—BRIGGS—BOUTWELL—THOMPSON—GRISWOLD—PARKER.

[July 14th.

therefore, that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Parker's motion, and it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GREENE, of Brookfield, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, July 14, 1853.

The Convention assembled, pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President at nine o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Vacancy in the Representation of Concord.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, it was Ordered, That the selectmen of Concord be notified that a vacancy exists in the representation of that town, occasioned by the death of the Hon. F. R. Gougas.

Assignment of time for taking a Vote.

Mr. BOUTWELL, of Berlin, moved that the question on the resolves concerning the judiciary be taken this afternoon at four o'clock.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I hope, Sir, that the question will not be taken upon this motion until we have a fuller house. The subject of the judiciary is a very important one, and I understand that several gentlemen desire to address the Convention upon it. If the question upon this motion be taken when we have a full house, and the proposition to close debate be agreed to, nobody will have a right to complain, and I certainly hope the gentleman will consent that it be postponed for the present.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The difficulty about postponing the question upon my proposition is, that if we wait for a full house, we cannot ascertain what time the Convention will fix for taking the question upon the subject of the judiciary until the afternoon, and thus either due notice will not be had of the time for taking the vote, or another day must be consumed, as it seems to me unnecessarily. It appears to me, that the proper time, and indeed the only time for taking such a question as this, is when the Orders of the Day are not under consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. I wish my friend for Berlin would consent to modify his motion so as to make the time for taking the vote some hour to-morrow morning. I am desirous of recording my "No" against the amendment that has been reported from the Committee of the Whole, but if the question be taken this afternoon I shall not be able to do so, and I am very reluctant to appear to dodge any question. At ten o'clock to-morrow we shall probably have a fuller House than we shall have this afternoon; and it is highly desirable, that when a question of this magnitude is to be taken, the House should be full. The vote upon this question relating to the judiciary should be taken only when the House is full, and it occurs to me, that if it be deferred, there will be no loss of time, for other subjects may be taken up and discussed in the interim.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. No one who knows

my honorable friend from Charlestown, would ever accuse him of dodging any question. But I hope the motion may prevail, and that the question will be taken at four o'clock this afternoon. That will give the better part of three days, which I think is quite sufficient. If it goes over until to-morrow, it will doubtless occupy the greater part of the day, and, Sir, for one, I feel the necessity for expediting our business, and finishing up our work.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. If the taking of the question should be postponed until to-morrow to accommodate the gentleman from Charlestown, there are other gentlemen, no doubt, who would be incommoded by the arrangement. There are several gentlemen, I know, who must necessarily be absent to-morrow. It will be found difficult, I apprehend, to suit every-body.

Mr. GRISWOLD, of Erving. I hope, Sir, that this motion will prevail. I am in favor of giving a reasonable range to debate upon important questions like this, but we have been here so long that I think it is about time for us to begin to think of bringing our labors to a close, and if we intend to do that it will not do to let our discussions run on indefinitely. If the question should be taken at four o'clock this afternoon it will give time for quite a number of speeches, so that the subject will have been pretty well discussed, if not exhausted. Besides, Sir, the Report has been before the Convention for some time, and I will venture to say that the minds of the members of the Convention are made up even now. We must place a limit upon this discussion; it must terminate somewhere; and I hope the motion of the gentleman for Berlin will prevail. I think it allows as much time as we can reasonably allow under the circumstances of the case.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I am sorry, Sir, that I cannot say the opposite of what my friend for Erving says, that I hope this motion will not prevail; for I suppose, from the indications that I see, it is a settled matter that it shall prevail; but I certainly wish it may not prevail. This is a question of the greatest possible interest that can come before the Convention; and gentlemen talk about bringing the debate to a close. Sir, I believe this question has had about the same chance for debate that the question of woman's rights had in this Convention. I certainly could wish, that upon a subject of this magnitude there would be an opportunity for more than three speeches in addition to the few that have been made; but if this motion prevail the discussion is ended at the expiration of three or four hours from the time of resuming the discussion. I really feel as though I ought to say, that it seems to me it is unreasonable,—that a question which goes to the foundation of one of the great branches of this government should not be disposed of in this summary manner.

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman for Berlin, and—by ayes, 102; nays, 43—it was decided in the affirmative.

Limitation of Speeches.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from Bernardston, submitted the following order:—

Ordered, That on and after to-morrow, no member of the Convention shall speak, either in Convention or in Committee of the Whole, more than half an hour on any one subject.

The order lies over for consideration to-morrow.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, of Rehoboth, the Convention proceeded to consider the Orders of the Day, being the resolves on the subject of the judiciary, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Fall River to the amendment reported from Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PARKER, of Cambridge. Before proceeding to discuss the questions directly involved in the amendment proposed to the resolution of the Committee, I desire to make a remark or two, in reference to some portion of the reply of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) to the speech of my learned colleague, (Mr. Greenleaf,) yesterday afternoon. So far as that gentleman met the positions taken by my colleague, I am perfectly content to let the matter rest as it is, but if I did not mistake the course of the argument, the gentleman from Lowell did not meet and fairly represent some of the arguments, to which he proposed to reply. In two particulars, he attempted to involve them in contradiction, and I must presume that he misunderstood them, for his position as a member of this Convention, forbids the supposition, that he intended any misrepresentation. Two subjects were under consideration; the election of judges, and the limitation of the term of service.

My colleague said in relation to the last, that in the new States, there was a reason why the people should be in favor of limited terms, because, coming from different portions of the world, and being strangers to each other, they could not so well know the fitness of any particular candidate, but that this reason did not apply to the people of Massachusetts, who knew each other much better.

The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) in replying to this argument, spoke of it as if it had reference to an election by the people, and by this misapplication, endeavored to involve it in absurdity and contradiction. Again, my colleague spoke of the difficulty which a member of the bar, who has left his profession and gone into the halls of congress or elsewhere, encounters, in returning again and regaining his standing as a professional man. The gentleman from Lowell undertook to controvert this, by referring to a particular exception, a well known case, not within the position taken by my colleague, if I understood him rightly, to refer to those cases, where gentlemen advanced in life, leave their profession, and when they come back again, can not find the places they left because they are filled by younger men.

Sir, I will not detain the Convention by following this course of argument farther. I wish to say, in relation to the question more immediately before the Convention, that I have had occasion to know somewhat of the reputation of the judiciary of Massachusetts, judging of it, not as an inhabitant of the State, with the partialities of an inhabitant, not from State pride, not from any considerations, I think, calculated to influence my mind to an undue admiration of it; but from a position without, where there was no reason, whatever, why I should have given to it more credit than it was fairly entitled to from its labors and from its decisions. Sir, I think that there is but one voice, and can be but one opinion, on this subject. The judiciary of Massachusetts, for a long series of years, has stood, I venture to say, second to that of no other State in the Union. Without going back to the time of Parsons,—for a quarter of a century, more or less, and I may say more and not less, it has stood, not only second to no other in the United States, but for a long period of years, second not to that of the Union itself. The Reports of Massachusetts have been cited all over the country as some of the very best authorities upon the questions which have been discussed, and come under revision. This may have been partly, perhaps, because Massachusetts is a great State; because she is a commercial State, because, of course, there are cases and opinions upon commercial subjects, involving principles of general use throughout the country. But, Sir, this is not all. This would not give to the Reports of Massachusetts the credit which they have attained throughout the country, if there was not something more; and that something more has been, that she has had a learned, able, and independent Bench, the incumbents of which could commend their labors to the consideration of those in other States capable of appreciating them, and who have appreciated them.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—PARKER—KEYES.

[July 14th.]

Sir, this speaks something, I think, for the system under which this judiciary has been appointed, and has acted. I admit, Sir, that the reputation of the judiciary abroad, will not determine the question whether there have not been evils endured at home, which may be corrected by legislation or constitutional enactment. But it does serve somewhat to settle any question of competency, for an incompetent court could not have obtained such a reputation. If there have been objections to the court, which do not appear in the Reports,—objections which are not heard out of the limits of the State, what are they? As I said last evening, I have listened with a good deal of attention for the purpose of ascertaining what they were, and without any success, until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) and of the gentleman from Lowell. They made some specifications. Are the evils which they specified those which are likely to be removed by a change of the tenure of the judicial office? The gentleman from New Bedford particularizes, as his first specification against the administration of the judges here, that somebody had a note of $100, and he was advised not to sue it, because of the cost if it should be contested. I take that as the substance of the allegation.

Suppose you make the judiciary elective, will that cure that evil? Suppose you have judges appointed for a term of years; would it be any better in that particular? If it be true that it would not be profitable to pursue such a claim if contested, I suppose it may be for the reason that the judicial force of the State is not great enough to keep its dockets clear; because you have not judges enough to try all the causes which the people bring before them, and clear the dockets term after term and year after year, and thus there is an accumulation of business causing delay. It is a very common fact, not only in Massachusetts but throughout the country, that at times, the press of business before the courts is so great that they cannot accomplish all that is desirable. Sir, you will not remove that evil by altering the tenure; every change will rather increase it by putting in men who are not accustomed to the business, and thus it will rather aggravate than remedy the evil. And it will tend greatly to increase the uncertainty of the law by the introduction of new notions and opinions, and the overruling of decisions. If, as suggested by a friend, the attorney's fees are the principal item of expense in ordinary cases, you will not remedy that evil by a change of the judicial tenure. The members of the profession charge according to their notions of the value of their services, as they have a right to do. And if the judicial force is not sufficient, and if cases are continued from term to term, expense must be expected.

Another objection which the gentleman from New Bedford made, was founded upon a decision of the supreme court in regard to a fugitive slave. I suppose there are different opinions on that subject. The gentleman from New Bedford entertains the opinion that the party was entitled to his freedom, while others are as conscientious in the opinion that he did not possess the character of a freeman, and that, under the Constitution and laws of the United States it was the duty of the constituted authorities of Massachusetts not to interfere for his liberation.

Will the proposed change remedy that matter? In what way will an elective judiciary be more effectual in guarding the rights and interests of the persons who stand in that position, than one appointed under the present constitutional provision. Is there any complaint that the judiciary of Massachusetts on that occasion gave any other or different construction to the Constitution and laws of the United States than that given by the judiciary of the United States? I do not understand the gentleman from New Bedford to make any such suggestion. He well knows that for the purpose of construing the Constitution and the laws of the United States, the judiciary of the United States are supreme, that their authority is paramount. What relief do we get, then, by elections, or by short terms of years? Nothing, unless we expect to place incumbents on the bench who will put themselves in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, by giving a different construction to them from that which is given by the tribunals authorized to pronounce authoritatively and decide upon that subject. Is it the desire of the gentleman from New Bedford to bring the judiciary of Massachusetts and that of the Union—the State of Massachusetts and the United States into conflict upon that subject? Is that the thing to be accomplished? If it be so, I put it to gentlemen of this Convention whether they are prepared to follow that lead, and make the change for that purpose. I put it to the people of the Commonwealth whether they are ready to place themselves by this or any other mode in such an antagonistical position to the government of the United States?

Sir, I have no particular affection for the fugitive slave law. I wish some other law were on the statute book instead of it. But so long as it stands there as a constitutional law, so declared by authorities competent and authorized to pronounce the final decision upon that subject,—an authoritative decision, of course,—so long, I trust, the people of Massachusetts will not place themselves in conflict with the authorities of the Union upon that question.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry? I infer from the last remark of the gentleman that that law has been pronounced constitutional by the supreme court of the United States. I wish to inquire if that is the fact.

Mr. PARKER. I think I did not so state; I did not say that it had been pronounced so by the supreme court, but by authorities competent to pronounce a decision, and that I hoped Massachusetts would not come in conflict with the authorities of the Union.

Mr. KEYES. But I inferred from what he said, that the opinion of the court had been given, and I thought that others might have that impression.

Mr. PARKER. I did not say so, nor mean to convey that impression; but I do mean to say that the decisions of the judiciary of the United States, and the opinions which have been expressed by judges of the supreme court of the United States, in relation to that law, lead to the conclusion that whenever the question is put before the highest tribunal of the Union, it will be declared constitutional.

Mr. KEYES. Will the gentleman allow me to make one other inquiry? I wish to know whether the people and the judges have not a right to entertain their own opinions until the decision has been made by the supreme court, which we have a right to expect, I suppose, will be in accordance with the view expressed by the gentleman, inasmuch as we know that the court is constituted for such a purpose.

Mr. PARKER. I do not know what the gentleman refers to when he speaks of the court's being constituted for that purpose.

Mr. KEYES. I referred to the manner in which that court is constituted, the other day, that a majority of the judges were from the slave States. And I take it, according to my reading of the case of Prigg, as it is called, pronounced by Judge Story, that they left the law, and that they did not pretend to decide that case according to law, but according to history; they took the history and the opinions of the South rather than the law. I understood the gentleman from Boston to confess that.

Mr. PARKER. It does not follow, from all that, if admitted, that the judiciary of the United States has been constituted for any such purpose as that of which the gentleman speaks. But I have not time, under the rule which limits the debate, to discuss the merits of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States. The question for us to consider, is not whether there is an erroneous opinion entertained respecting the fugitive slave law; but if there is, whether it is probable that we can remedy that error by an elective judiciary, and whether you will put upon the bench men who will hold this law unconstitutional, and thus place themselves in conflict with the opinions of judges of that court which has the paramount authority to decide upon the subject. I trust I do not fail in sympathy for those who are affected by that law. But I shall not attempt to show my sympathy by a disregard of my constitutional obligations. In any way that is according to law, I am ready to exhibit it. Are the people of Massachusetts to place themselves in an antagonistical position to the supreme court of the United States, by electing or appointing judges who entertain opinions upon this subject hostile to the decisions of that court? That is the question. As has been stated

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — PARKER.

[July 14th.

by the gentleman for Abington, the opinion in Prigg's case was promulgated by a most distinguished son of Massachusetts, who certainly was not put on the bench by the slave power; he was not trained in any school of that character, and if he came to the conclusion which was confidently expressed in that case, it was not because of any sympathy which he had for the institution of slavery, but because his legal convictions carried him to the result which he thus announced.

These, I think, were all the specifications of the gentleman from New Bedford against the judiciary of Massachusetts, as at present constituted. The gentleman from Lowell adds another: that there has been a delay in publishing the Reports of the decisions of the courts. He refers to the law of 1838, which provides that the court shall cause all the decisions of the court made prior to the 1st of September, in each year, to be published on or before that day. I put it to the gentleman from Lowell to say whether he believes that this is a practicable thing. Does he believe that there is any power in the Court, constituted as it is at present, or constituted as it will be by any change in the tenure, to comply with that law? In the view which I take of it, it would be entirely impossible, otherwise the law would not have remained from 1838 to the present time without compliance. Why has it not been made the ground of an address for the removal of the judges, that they have not complied with that law? Why, Sir, it is palpable that it is an impracticable thing, and, therefore, nothing has been done about it. Whether there has not been more delay than was necessary—whether something more might not have been accomplished, I cannot say. Sir, it is altogether impossible that the decisions of the court of Massachusetts, constituted as that court is, with the provision for reporting which is made here in Massachusetts, should be published with the same rapidity and promptness that Reports are published in England. Let the reporting be on private account, so that the judges will not have the labor of drawing up their opinions and fashioning and shaping them into the best form for use by the profession and the public at large—let the Reports be made by rival reporters and private competition, and you will have the decisions of your court as early as you get those of the English courts, and even more so. But this cannot be done, because here there is no demand for the Reports which will justify an expenditure of that kind; and if it might be I am not sure that it would be very desirable. The people of this country want something more than a mere statement that the case is decided so and so; they want something of the reasoning on which that decision is founded. There is something of this in the Reports of the English courts; but it is not carried out to the same extent that is to be found here. There is not the same labor expended in making the Reports. The practice is quite different there.

Let it be understood that these are all the objections that are urged against the administration of justice in this State.

The only other objection which I have heard against the court as constituted at present is, that the judges live too long. It seems, from the remarks of the gentleman from Lowell, that they live longer than other people.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman must have misunderstood me. I said that a bad judge, if appointed for life, would live too long. I said nothing about our courts at all.

Mr. PARKER. I supposed from the tenor of the gentleman's argument, that he alluded to the judges of Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no! Ours are all good.

Mr. PARKER. The idea suggested was, that judges lived longer than other people, and I supposed the gentleman meant to have us understand that they lived too long. They do not make way for other aspirants—they are not quietly inurned at Mount Auburn in proper season, so that others may take their places. Upon this objection, the proposition now before the Convention will accomplish something; for if you do not terminate their natural lives in season, you may their official existence, so that vacancies will be created. It will give a better chance for the aspirants for office; and, I have no doubt, but that it will operate a little better than it would seem, perhaps, at first blush, from the statement which has been made here. It is said that the average term, at present, is about thirteen years, and the proposition before the Convention is to limit it to ten years. This would not seem of a very great improvement of itself, if the judges were to hold the full term, but this would make an average quite too large. The gentleman from Natick, in making the comparison, did not make the allowance for deaths and resignations, under the new system. It is probable that there will be about as many deaths, in proportion, under the new tenure as there have been under the old, so that this comparison between ten and thirteen, ought to be a comparison between the term of ten years, reduced, as that will be, by the deaths and resignations which may occur in it, and a term of thirteen years. When that is made, it will probably verify the calculations of my friend for Manchester. There will be about one vacancy a year. Will this give you better judges, or a better administration of the law?

Sir, the question whether men who are best qualified can probably be induced to accept the office, for a term, has been already discussed. There is a difference, which is to be noted here, between the judicial office, and political offices; and that is this. In order to secure a proper administration of the judicial office, there must be a previous training. No man can go upon the bench, prepared to administer justice according to the rules of law, who has not had a previous training for that purpose. When he goes there, he must leave behind him the profession in which that training has been had, and through which he has been fitted for the office. It is not so in relation to political offices. A man who is elected governor, senator, or even member of congress, is able to devote some time to the pursuit of the avocations in which he was engaged before his election, whether it be merchandise, farming, or anything else; because he can leave these affairs in the hands of people who are well qualified to superintend them, guided by his own direction and supervision. But it does not follow that you can find persons qualified to administer justice according to the rules of the law, who are ready to abandon their profession for a short time. They are not able to put a superintendent over their business, and continue it, and return to their profession again, in full practice, when their term of office shall have expired.

I was about to turn to the Bill of Rights, to show what is expected of the incumbents of the bench; but I will not take up the time for that reference—every gentleman can make it for himself. Will the requirements therein specified be better secured by the new tenure than the old? No change can make a perfect system; that is out of the question. The men who will administer it must have a share of human frailty; and you cannot make a perfect system by any legislation which can be adopted. Then comes the question, which system will be the most likely to accomplish the great ends for which the judiciary is instituted? Which will be the most likely to secure a learned, able, and impartial bench? Something, of course, depends on the views of the party who accepts the office. If he takes it as a stepping stone to the halls of congress, or to some other political preferment, there is no tenure, so long as he keeps that object in view, which will make him a good judge. I speak of the general rule; I do not say that there may not be exceptions, but if there are any, they are rare. What is desired in order to secure the administration of justice with the greatest impartiality, is that the incumbent on the bench shall devote himself to the duty of administering justice for the rest of his laborious life. Where that is the case, I care very little what his antecedents may have been, provided he has the requisite qualifications. He may have been of one or of another political party; but when he goes upon the bench, the legal influences by which he is surrounded, if he be a competent man, will make him what he ought to be, without regard to political parties or opinions. He will not be there for the purpose of making his political opinions available for some other end, and they cannot be made available for the accomplishment of the ends for which he was placed there. Under which system will the incumbent be most likely to make the duty of administering justice the end and aim for which he goes upon the bench—the one which secures him some permanency there, or the one which will place him, at the end of a short term, at the mercy of whoever may be at that time in political power? Under which system will the bench be most in danger of becoming a political horse-block?

Sir, there may be two kinds of influences operating on the mind of a judge; one is the influence of duty, the other is that of personal considerations. Now which system would be most likely to surround the incumbent on the bench with the best influences, and those which should operate upon and actuate him? The very purpose of this change is to bring a new influence to operate upon him. If that is not its purpose its advocates have mistaken it. The judge is to be made "responsible to the people," or to the appointing power. I admit the propriety of responsibility; but the question is, what responsibility? You have responsibility already—responsibility through impeachment, if the judge does not behave well. It is said that this will not be resorted to. I ask, why not? If it will not be resorted to, for the purpose of extinguishing the judicial life of the "mosquito" client of the gentleman from Lowell, it may be when you have somebody of more consequence to bring to judgment. There is also responsibility through removal, upon address of both Houses of the legislature. Will not this secure the due administration of justice

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—PARKER—CHOATE.

[July 14th.]

by the incumbent? It is said not, and there is another responsibility proposed, and that is through a limitation of the term and a loss of office, if he do not satisfy the appointing power.

What is this responsibility? To whom is it, and what is it to effect? Why, Sir, upon a man who does not desire a reelection or reappointment its effect is nothing at all. How can you impose upon him an additional inducement to the performance of his duties by shortening the tenure of his office when he has no desire to hold that office for a longer period than the term prescribed. And how is it with a perfectly independent man? Will you make him do his duty better by holding over him the rod of a term, beyond which he cannot remain except by reappointment or reelection? Sir, he will spurn and despise, and trample upon any such responsibility. If he is a man of high and independent character, such as should sit there, you gain nothing whatever on the score of responsibility by that. If it operates at all, therefore, it must be upon him who desires to be in office a little longer. I admit, Sir, that there may be honest and upright men upon whom it is possible it may thus operate—men of limited means, with families dependent upon their exertions, and whose age forbids them again to mingle in the contests of the forum. Such men may feel, that without a reappointment, they must be under the necessity of seeking other means of subsistence under unfavorable circumstances. But, Sir, how is this to operate upon such a man, and still more upon the man of a different character from any of these—who comes upon the bench unqualified for the duty, and desires to retain the office because it is the best place he can get? Why, Sir, it will make him careful so to trim his sails, so to shape his demeanor and decisions that he may not offend the creator of official existence—of judicial power. It is only to make him subservient and careful how he incurs the displeasure of that power. Sir, that is a similar responsibility to that which produced Scroggs and Jeffreys, and others less infamous in England. It was responsibility to the crown, to the appointing power—danger of the loss of office, if the appointing power was not satisfied. And what is the result now the system has been changed there, and the judges made independent? Why, Sir, the bench of England is the admiration of the world. Sir, if you have a good judge upon your bench, the tenure which you propose is too short; if you have a bad one it is too long.

But let me ask again to whom is the responsibility? It is said that it is to the people. Sir, this is an "unreal mockery." I pray God that it may not prove to be a "horrible shadow" hereafter, if this system should be adopted. Responsibility to the people! Sir, the responsibility will be to the party—it will be to the individual who has most influence with the party, and who can do most to procure a reelection or a reappointment. He is the person who is to hold the judge accountable to act as he pleases. It is to the man who holds the leading wires of the caucus. Let me turn the attention of the Convention to the description given by the modus operandi for Manchester, the other day, of the modus operandi of these caucuses. It must be fresh in the recollection of every gentleman who heard it. Somebody comes there with everything "cut and dried" in his pocket, and among the rest of the nominations he has the nomination of a judge, and this will be well understood. The responsibility will be to the managers of the caucus; or the managers about the council-chamber. It will be to the powerful against the weak; to the political friend against the political opponent; or if it should come to the case of two litigants of the same party, then it will be to the political leader against his weaker brother. That is the responsibility through which your judges are to be amenable. Had I time, I would give some illustrations of its operation. That is the power which is to regulate their course upon the bench.

Sir, if, so far as the judiciary is concerned, it was your desire to inflict upon the people the greatest possible curse, I do not know that you could devise a better or more effectual method than this same kind of responsibility of which I have been speaking. I submit to the Convention if that is not the responsibility to which this term of years tends; and if it should not be effectual to produce the results I have stated, the only reason will be, that your men are better than your system; that they are too high minded to regard such responsibility.

Mr. CHOATE, of Boston. It is not my purpose to enter at large, on the discussion of this important subject. That discussion is exhausted; and, if it is not, your patience is; and if not quite so, you have arrived, I apprehend, each to his own conclusion. But, as I had the honor to serve on the Committee to whom the department of the judiciary was referred, I desire to be indulged in the statement of my opinions, abstaining from any attempt elaborately to enforce them.

I feel no apprehension that this body is about to recommend an election of judges by the people. All appearances; the votes taken; the views disclosed in debate; the demonstrations of important men here, indicate the contrary. I do not mean to say that such a proposition has not been strenuously pressed, and in good faith; yet, for reasons which I will not consume my prescribed hour in detailing, there is no danger of it. Whether members are ready for such a thing or not, they avow, themselves, that they do not think the people are ready.

What I most fear is, that the deliberation may end in limiting the tenure of judicial office to a term of years, seven or ten; that in the result we shall hear it urged, "as we are good enough not to stand out for an election by the people, you ought to be capable of an equal magnanimity, and not stand out for the present term of good behavior"—and thus we shall be forced into a compromise in favor of periodical and frequent appointment—which shall please every-body a little.

I have the honor to submit to the Convention that neither change is needed. Both of them, if experience may in the least degree be relied on, are fraught with evils unnumbered. To hazard either, would be, not to realize the boast that we found the capitol, in this behalf, brick, and left it marble; but contrarywise, to change its marble to brick.

Sir, in this inquiry—what mode of judicial appointment, and what tenure of judicial office, you will recommend to the people, I think that there is but one safe or sensible mode of proceeding, and that is to ascertain what mode of appointment, and what length and condition of tenure, will be most certain, in the long run, guiding ourselves by the lights of all the experience and all the observation to which we can resort, to bring and keep the best judge upon the bench—the best judge for the ends of his great office? There is no other test. That an election by the people, once a year, or an appointment by the governor, once a year, or once in five, or seven, or ten years, will operate to give to an ambitious young lawyer (I refer to no one in this body) a better chance to be made a judge—as the wheel turns round—is no recommendation, and is nothing to the purpose. That this consideration has changed, or framed the Constitutions of some of the States whose example has been pressed on us, I have no doubt. Let it have no weight here. We, at least, hold that offices, and most of all the judicial office, are not made for incumbents or candidates, but for the people; to establish justice; to guarantee security among them. Let us constitute the office in reference to its ends.

I go for that system, if I can find it or help find it, which gives me the highest degree of assurance, taking man as he is, at his strongest and at his weakest, and in the average of the lot of humanity, that there shall be the best judge on every bench of justice in the Commonwealth, through its successive generations. That we may safely adopt such a system; that is to say that we may do so, and yet not abridge or impair, or endanger our popular polity in the least particular; that we may secure the best possible judge, and yet retain—aye, help to perpetuate and keep in health, the utmost affluence of liberty with which civil life can be maintained, I will attempt to show hereafter. For the present, I ask, how shall we get and keep the best judge for the work of the judge?

Well, Sir, before I can go to that inquiry, I must pause at the outset, and, inverting a little what has been the order of investigation here, ask first, who and what is such a judge; who is that best judge? what is he? how shall we know him? And on this point it is impossible that there should be the slightest difference of opinion among us. On some things we differ. Some of you are dissatisfied with this decision or with that. Some of you take exception to this judge or to that. Some of you, more loftily, hold that one way of appointing to the office, or one way of limiting the tenure, is a little more or less monarchical, or a little more or less democratic than another—and so we differ; but I do not believe there is a single member of the Convention who will not agree with me in the description I am about to give of the good judge; who will not agree with me that the system which is surest to put and to keep him on the bench, is the true system for Massachusetts.

In the first place, he should be profoundly learned in all the learning of the law, and he must know how to use that learning. Will any one stand up here to deny this? In this day, boastful, glorious for its advancing popular, professional, scientific, and all education, will any one disgrace himself by doubting the necessity of deep and continued studies, and various and thorough attainments, to the bench? He is to know, not merely the law which you make, and the legislature makes, not constitutional and statute law alone, but that other, ampler, that boundless jurisprudence, the common law, which the successive generations of the State have

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — CHOATE.

[July 14th.

silently built up; that old code of freedom which we brought with us in the Mayflower and Arabella, but which in the progress of centuries we have ameliorated and enriched, and adapted wisely to the necessities of a busy, prosperous and wealthy community,—that he must know. And where to find it? In volumes which you must count by hundreds, by thousands; filling libraries; exacting long labors; the labors of a lifetime, abstracted from business, from politics; but assisted by taking part in an active judicial administration; such labors as produced the wisdom and won the fame of Parsons, and Marshall, and Kent, and Story, and Holt, and Mansfield. If your system of appointment and tenure does not present a motive, a help for such labors and such learning; if it discourages, if it disparages them, in so far it is a failure.

In the next place, he must be a man, not merely upright; not merely honest and well-intentioned—this of course—but a man who will not respect persons in judgment. And does not every one here agree to this also? Dismissing, for a moment, all theories about the mode of appointing him, or the time for which he shall hold office, sure I am, we all demand, that as far as human virtue, assisted by the best contrivances of human wisdom, can attain to it, he shall not respect persons in judgment. He shall know nothing about the parties; everything about the case. He shall do everything for justice; nothing for himself; nothing for his friend; nothing for his patron; nothing for his sovereign. If, on one side, is the executive power, and the legislature, and the people—the sources of his honors, the givers of his daily bread—and on the other an individual nameless and odious, his eye is to see neither, great nor small; attending only to the “trepidations of the balance.” If a law is passed by a unanimous legislature, clamored for by the general voice of the public, and a cause is before him on it, in which the whole community is on one side and an individual nameless or odious on the other, and he believes it to be against the Constitution, he must so declare it—or there is no judge. If Athens comes there to demand that the cup of hemlock be put to the lips of the wisest of men; and he believes that he has not corrupted the youth, nor omitted to worship the gods of the city, nor introduced new divinities of his own, he must deliver him, although the thunder light on the unterrified brow.

This, Sir, expresses, by very general illustration, what I mean when I say I would have him no respecter of persons in judgment. How we are to find, and to keep, such an one; by what motives; by what helps; whether by popular and frequent election, or by executive designation, and permanence dependent on good conduct in office alone—we are hereafter to inquire; but that we must have him—that his price is above rubies—that he is necessary, if justice, if security, if right are necessary for man—all of you, from the east or west, are, I am sure, unanimous.

And finally, he must possess the perfect confidence of the community, that he bear not the sword in vain. To be honest, to be no respecter of persons, is not yet enough. He must be believed such. I should be glad so far to indulge an old fashioned and cherished professional sentiment as to say, that I would have something of venerable and illustrious attach to his character and function, in the judgment and feelings of the Commonwealth. But if this should be thought a little above or behind the time, I do not fear that I subject myself to the ridicule of any one, when I claim that he be a man towards whom the love and trust and affectionate admiration of the people should flow; not a man perching for a winter and summer in our court-houses, and then gone forever; but one to whose benevolent face, and bland and dignified manners, and firm administration of the whole learning of the law, we become accustomed; whom our eyes anxiously, not in vain, explore when we enter the temple of justice; towards whom our attachment and trust grow even with the growth of his own eminent reputation. I would have him one who might look back from the venerable last years of Mansfield, or Marshall, and recall such testimonies as these to the great and good judge:—

“The young men saw me, and hid themselves; and the aged arose and stood up.

“The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand upon their mouth.

“When the ear heard me, then it blessed me, and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me.

“Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.

“The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow’s heart to sing for joy.

“I put on righteousness, and it clothed me. My judgment was as a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.

“I was a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not, I searched out.

“And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.”

Give to the community such a judge, and I care little who makes the rest of the Constitution, or what party administers it. It will be a free government, I know. Let us repose, secure, under the shade of a learned, impartial and trusted magistracy, and we need no more.

And now what system of promotion to office, and what tenure of office, is surest to produce such a judge? Is it executive appointment during good behavior; with liability, however, to be impeached for good cause, and to be removed by address of the legislature—or is it election by the people, or appointment by the executive for a limited term of years?

To every system there are objections. To every system there are sound, or there are specious objections; objections of theory; objections of fact. Any man’s ability is equal to finding and exaggerating them. What is demanded of us is to compare the good and evil of the different systems, and select the best. Compare them by the test which I have proposed. See which will most certainly give you the judge you need, and adopt that. It may be cavilled at; even as freedom, as religion, as wholesome restraint; as liberty of speech, as the institution and the rights of property may be cavilled at; but in its fruits, in its product, judged by a long succession of seasons, is its justification and its glory.

Applying then, Sir, this test, I think the existing system is, out of all comparison, the best one. At the hazard of repeating and weakening the views presented yesterday in the impressive and admirable address of my friend for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) and in the instructive and able arguments of the two gentlemen (Mr. Greenleaf and Mr. Parker) whose established professional reputations give to them such just weight with you, I beg to submit, briefly, why I think so.

In the first place, then, it seems to me most clear that the weight of sound general opinion and of the evidence of a trustworthy experience vastly preponderates in favor of it. How the system of popular elections, or of short terms is actually working now in any one of the States which have recently introduced it; how, still more, it is likely to work there after the influences of the earlier system, the judges which it bred, the habits which it formed, the bars which it trained, have passed away, there is no proof before this Convention deserving one moment’s notice. We do not know what is the predominant conviction on this subject, to-day, of those fittest to judge in any one State. We do know that they cannot yet possibly pronounce on the matter, however close or sagacious their observation. What they have not yet seen, they cannot yet tell. Certainly the result of all that I have been able to gather, is a general and strong opinion against the new system, and in favor of a return, if to return were possible, to that which we are yet proud and privileged to call our own. But the evidence is too loose for the slightest consideration. My friend for Manchester read letters yesterday, from persons of high character, as he assured us, in New York, deploring the working of her new system; and I have no doubt that the witnesses are respectable, and the opinions perfectly sound. But other gentlemen guess that very different letters might be obtained, by applying to the right quarters; and the gentleman from New Bedford (Mr. French) is quite confident that the people of that great State—the two or three millions—are in favor of the change, because one, if not two, or even three individuals, have personally told him so. And, therefore, I say, we have not here now so much evidence of the practical working of their recent systems anywhere, even as far as it has gone, that any honest lawyer would advise his client to risk a hundred dollars on it. But, on the other hand, are there not most weighty opinions; is there not the testimony of the widest, and longest, and most satisfactory experience, that executive appointment for good behavior yields the best judge?

What is British opinion and British experience to the point? On the question what tenure of office promises the best judge, that opinion and that experience may well be adverted to. Whether a particular mode, or a particular tenure, is consonant to the republican polity of government, we must settle for ourselves. That is another question. Monarchical and aristocratical principles we will not go for to England, or elsewhere, nor buy even learning, impartiality, and titles to trust, at the cost of an anti-republican system. But to know how it practically operates to have the judge dependent on the power that appoints him; dependent for his continuance in office; dependent for his restoration to it; dependent on anything, or on anybody but his own official good behavior, and that general responsibility to the legislature and public opinion, “that spirit of observation and censure which modifies and controls the whole government,” we may very well consult British or any other experience. The establishment of the tenure of good behavior was a triumph of liberty. It was a triumph of popular liberty against the crown. Before the Revolution of 1688, or certainly during the worst years of the Stuart dynasty, the judge held office at the pleasure of the king who appointed him. What was the consequence? He was the tool of the hand that made and unmade him. Scroggs and Jeffreys were but representatives and exemplifications of a system. A whole bench sometimes was packed for the enforcement of some new and more flagrant royal usurpation. Outraged, and in mourning, by judicial subservency and judicial murder, England discerned, at the Revolution, that her liberty was incompletely recovered and imperfectly guarded, unless she had judges by whom the boast that an Englishman's house is his castle, should be elevated from a phrase to a fact; from an abstract right to a secure enjoyment; so that although that house were "a cottage with a thatched roof which all the winds might enter, the king could not." To that end the Act of Settlement made the tenure of good behavior a part of the British Constitution; and a later amendment kept the judicial commission alive, as my friend for Manchester yesterday reminded us, notwithstanding the demise of the sovereign, and perfected the system. Sir, the origin of the tenure of good behavior,—marking thus an epoch in the progress of liberty; a victory, so to say, of individuality, of private right, of the household hearth of the cottager, of the "swink'd hedger," over the crown,—and still more, its practical workings in the judicial character and function, may well entitle it to thoughtful treatment. Compare the series of British judges since 1688, with that before, and draw your own conclusions. Not that all this improvement, in impartiality, in character, in titles to confidence and affection, is due to the change of tenure; but the soundest historians of that Constitution recognize that that is one element of transcendent importance. With its introduction she began to have a government of laws, and not of men.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — CHOATE.

[July 14th.]

I come to other testimony, other opinions—the lights of a different experience. There is a certain transaction and document, called the Federal Constitution. Consult that. In 1787, that Convention,—assisted by the thoughts and discussions of the five years of peace preceding it, upon the subject of national government, to be constructed on the republican form of polity,—into which were gathered all, or almost all, of our great men, in our age of greatness; men of deep studies, ripe wisdom, illustrious reputation, a high spirit of liberty; that Convention—upon a careful survey of the institutions of the States of America, and of those of other countries, and times past and present; upon, I think we cannot doubt, a profound appreciation of the true functions of a judicial department; of the qualities of a good judge; of the best system of appointment and tenure to obtain them; of the true nature of republican government, and how far, consistently with all its characteristic principles and aims, the people may well determine to appoint to office indirectly, rather than directly, and for good behavior, rather than for a limited term, when the great ends of the stability of justice, and the security of private right prescribe it—incorporated into the great organic law of the Union, the principle that judges shall be appointed by the executive power, to hold their office during good behavior.

The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) last evening observed, referring, I believe, to the time when our Constitution was adopted, that it was long before the age of the steamboat and railroad, and magnetic telegraph. It is true; but do we know better than they knew, the nature of man; the nature of the judicial man; what he ought to be to discharge his specific functions aright; how motives, motives of ambition, of fear, of true fame, of high principle, affect him; whether dependence on another power is favorable to independence of the wishes and the will of that other power? Do we know more of republican government and true liberty, and the reconciliations of personal security under due course of law with the loftiest spirit of freedom, than they? Has the advancement of this kind of knowledge quite kept pace with that of the science of the material world?

I wish, Sir, the time of the Convention would allow me to read entire that paper of the Federalist, the seventy-eighth, I believe, in which the principle of the independence of the judiciary is vindicated, and executive appointment, during good behavior, as the means of attaining such independence, is vindicated also. But read it for yourselves. Hear Hamilton, and Madison, and Jay; for we know from all sources that on this subject that paper expressed the opinions of all—on the independence of the judiciary, and the means of securing it—a vast subject adequately illustrated by the highest human intelligence, and learning, and purity of principle, and of public life.

Sir, it is quite a striking reminiscence, that this very paper of the Federalist, which thus maintains the independence of the judiciary, is among the earliest, perhaps the earliest, enunciation and vindication, in this country, of that great truth, that in the American politics, the written Constitution—which is the record of the popular will—is above the law, which is the will of the legislature, merely; that if the two are in conflict the law must yield, and the Constitution must rule; and that to determine whether such a conflict exists, and if so, to pronounce the law invalid, is, from the nature of the judicial office, the plain duty of the judge. In that paper this fundamental proposition of our system was first presented, or first elaborately presented to the American mind; its solidity, and its value were established by unanswerable reasoning; and the conclusion, that a bench, which was charged with a trust so vast, and so delicate, should be as independent as the lot of humanity would admit,—of the legislature, of the executive, of the temporary popular majority, whose will it might be required thus to subject to the higher will of the Constitution,—was deduced by a moral demonstration. Beware, Sir, lest truths so indissolubly connected—presented together, at first; adopted together—should die together. Consider whether, when the judge ceases to be independent, the Constitution will not cease to be supreme. If the Constitution does not maintain the judge against the legislature and the executive, will the judge maintain the Constitution against the legislature and the executive?

What the working of this principle in the national government has been, practically, there is no need to remind you. Recall the series of names, the dead and living, who have illustrated that bench; advert to the prolonged terms of service of which the country has had the enjoyment; trace the growth of the national jurisprudence; compare it with any other production of American mind or liberty; then trace the progress and tendencies of political opinions, and say if it has not given us stability and security, and yet left our liberties unabridged.

I find a third argument for the principle of executive appointment during good behavior, in this: that it is the existing system of Massachusetts, and it has operated with admirable success. It is not that it exists; it is that it works well. Does it not? Sir, is it for me, or any man, any member of the profession of the law, most of all, to rise here, and now, and because our feelings may have sometimes been ruffled or wounded by a passage with the bench; because we have been dissatisfied by a ruling or a verdict; because our own over-wrought brain may have caused us, in some moment, to become forgetful of ourselves; or because a judge may have misunderstood us, and done us an unintentional injury; is it for us to disclaim the praise, so grateful, so just, which the two eminent gentlemen, one of them formerly of New Hampshire, (Mr. Parker,) one of them formerly of Maine, (Mr. Greenleaf,) speaking without the partiality of native sons, and from observations made by them from a point of view outside of us, and distant from us, have bestowed on our bench and our law? Theirs are lips from which even flattery were sweet; but when they concur in reminding you with what respect the decisions of this court are consulted by other courts of learning and character; how far their reputation has extended; how familiar is the profession of law with the great names of our judicial history; how important a contribution to American jurisprudence, and even to the general products of American thought, our local code composes—do we not believe that they utter their personal convictions, and that the high compliment is as deserved as it is pleasing?

If it has worked well, it is good. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? If it has continued to us a long succession of men, deeply learned, wholly impartial, deserving, and clothed with the trust, love and affectionate admiration of all parties of the community, does it not afford a reasonable ground of inference that there is something in such a mode of appointment, and in such a tenure, intrinsically, philosophically adapted to insure such a result?

Some criticism has been made on the practical administration of our law, which deserves a passing notice. It requires the less because it has already been replied to.

The gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) told a story of some one, as I understood him, who was about to lose, or had lost, or dared not sue a note of a hundred dollars, because it would cost him one hundred and fifty dollars to collect it. A very sensible explanation was suggested by the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker,) just now; and I will venture to advise the gentleman from New Bedford, in addition, the very first time he sees his friend, to recommend to him to change his lawyer as quick as he possibly can. As a reason for a change of the Constitution and the tenure of the judicial office, it seems to me not particularly cogent.

The same gentleman remembers that your supreme court decided that the fugitive slave law is constitutional; and what makes it the more provoking is, he knows the decision was wrong. Well, Sir, so said the gentleman for Manchester,

Thursday.]

THE JUDICIARY.—CHOATE.

[July 14th.

(Mr. Dana). His sentiments concerning that law and its kindred topics do not differ, I suppose, greatly from those of the member from New Bedford; but what did he add? "I thank God," he said, "that I have the consolation of knowing the decision was made by men as impartial as the lot of humanity would admit; and that if judges were elected by the people of Massachusetts it would hold out no hope of a different decision." He sees in this, therefore, no cause for altering our judicial system on any view of the decision; and I believe—though I have never heard him say or suggest such a thing—that my friend's learning and self-distrust; that "that learned and modest ignorance" which Gibbon recognizes as the last and ripest result of the profound knowledge of a large mind, will lead him to agree with me, that it is barely possible, considering how strongly that law excites the feelings, and thus tends to disturb the judgment; considering the vast weight of judicial opinion, and of the opinions of public persons in its favor; recalling the first law on that subject, and the decision in Prigg and Pennsylvania—and who gave the opinion of that court in that case—that it is just barely possible that the gentleman from New Bedford does not certainly know that the decision was wrong. That he thinks it so, and would lay his life down upon it, the energy and the sentiments of his speech sufficiently indicate. My difficulty, like my friend's for Manchester, is to gather out of all this indignation the least particle of cause for a change of the judicial tenure.

The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) animadverted somewhat, last evening, on the delays attending the publication of the reports of decisions. I had made some inquiry concerning the facts; but have been completely anticipated in all I would have said by the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker). To me his explanation seems perfectly satisfactory; and in no view of such a question would the good sense of the gentleman from Lowell, I think, deem it a reason for so vast an innovation as this on the existing and ancient system.

To another portion of that learned gentleman's speech, I have a word to say, in all frankness and all candor. Placing his hand on his heart, he appealed, with great emphasis of manner, to the honor of the bar, as represented in this Convention, whether we had not heard complaints of particular acts of some of our judges? Sir, that appeal is entitled to a frank and honorable response. I have known and loved many; many men; many women—of the living and the dead—of the purest and noblest of earth or skies, but I never knew one—I never heard of one—if conspicuous enough to attract a considerable observation, whom the breath of calumny, or of sarcasm, always wholly spared. Did the learned gentleman ever know one? "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny."

And does he expect that, in a profession like ours; overtasked; disappointed in the results of causes; eager for victory; mortified by unexpected defeat; misunderstanding or failing to appreciate the evidence; the court sometimes itself jaded and mistaken—that we shall not often hear, and often say, hasty and harsh things of a judge? I have heard such of every judge I ever saw—however revered in his general character. Did Mansfield escape? Did Marshall? Did Parsons?

Did Story? What does it come to as an argument against the particular judge; still more as an argument against a judicial system? Are we to go on altering the mode of appointment, and the tenure, till you get a corps of judges, against no one of which, no one ever hears anybody say anything?

But, Sir, I am to answer the learned gentleman's appeal a little farther, and I say upon my honor, that I believe it the general opinion of the bar to-day; its general opinion ever since I entered the profession, that our system of appointment and tenure, has operated perfectly well; that the benches and courts have been, and are, learned; impartial; entitled to trust; and that there is not one member of either—who, taking his judicial character and life as a whole—is not eminently, or adequately, qualified for his place.

Turn, now, from the existing system to the substitute which is offered; and see, if you can, how that will work.

It is not enough to take little objections to that system—in its general working, so satisfactory. He who would change it is bound to show that what he proposes in place of it will do better. To this, I say, it is all a sheer conjectural speculation, yet we see and know enough to warrant the most gloomy apprehensions.

Consider first, for a moment, the motion immediately pending; which proposes the election of judges by the people. I said in the outset, I have no fear of your sustaining it; but for the development of a full view of the general subject, it will justify some attention.

Gentlemen begin by asking if we are afraid to trust the people. Well, Sir, that is a very cunning question; very cunning indeed. Answer it as you will, they think they have you. If you answer yes—that you are afraid to trust the people—then they cry out he blasphemeth. If you answer no—that you are not afraid to trust them—then they reply, why not permit them to choose their judges?

Sir, this dilemma creates no difficulty. I might evade it by saying, that however ready and however habituated to trust the people, it does not follow that we should desert a system which has succeeded eminently, to see if another will not succeed as well. If the indirect appointment by the people, appointment through the governor whom they chose, has supplied a succession of excellent judges, why should I trouble them with the direct appointment—however well they might conduct it—which they have not solicited; which they have not expected; about which you dared not open your mouths during the discussion concerning the call of a Convention; in regard to which you gave them—it is more correct to say—every reason to believe you should make no change whatever? Get a Convention by a pledge to the people not to make judges elective—and then tell us we shall make them elective, on pain of being denounced afraid to trust the people! Will such flattery be accepted in atonement for such deception?

But I prefer meeting this dilemma in another way. It is a question certainly of some nicety to determine what offices the public good prescribe should be filled by a direct election of the people; and what should be filled by the appointment of others, as the governor and council, chosen by the people. On the best reflection I have been able to give it, this seems to me a safe general proposition. If the nature of the office be such, the qualifications which it demands, and the stage on which they are to be displayed be such, that the people can judge of those qualifications as well as their agents; and if, still farther, the nature of the office be such that the tremendous ordeal of a severely contested popular election will not in any degree do it injury; will not deter learned men, if the office needs learning, from aspiring to it; will not tend to make the successful candidate a respecter of persons, if the office requires that he should not be; will not tend to weaken the confidence and trust, and affectionate admiration of the community towards him, if the office requires that such be the sentiments with which he should be regarded—then the people should choose by direct election. If, on the other hand, from the kind of qualifications demanded, and the place where their display is to be made, an agent of the people, chosen by them for that purpose, can judge of the qualifications better than they can; or if from its nature it demands learning, and the terrors of a party canvass drive learning from the field; or if it demands impartiality and general confidence, and the successful candidate of a party is less likely to possess either—then the indirect appointment by the people, that is, appointment by their agent, is wisest.

Let me illustrate this test by reference to some proceedings of the Convention. You have already made certain officers elective, which heretofore were filled by executive appointment—such as those of sheriffs, the attorney-general, district-attorneys, and others.

Now, within the test just indicated, I do not know why these offices may not be filled by election, if anybody has a fancy for it. Take the case of the sheriff, for instance. He requires energy, courtesy, promptness,—qualities pertaining to character, rather, and manner—displayed, so to speak, in the open air; palpable, capable of easy and public appreciation. Besides, his is an office which the freedom and violence of popular elections do not greatly harm. There are certain specific duties to do for a compensation, and if these are well done, it does not much signify what a minority or what anybody thinks of him.

Totally unlike this in all things is the case of the judge. In the first place, the qualities which fit him for the office are quite peculiar; less palpable, less salient, so to speak, less easily and accurately appreciated by cursory and general notice. They are an uncommon, recondite, and difficult learning, and they are a certain power and turn of mind and cast of character, which, until they come actually, and for a considerable length of time, and in many varieties of circumstances, to be displayed upon the bench itself, may be almost unremarked but by near and professional observers. What the public chiefly see is the effective advocate; him their first thought would be perhaps to make their candidate for judge; yet experience has proved that the best advocate is not necessarily the best judge,—that the two functions exact diverse qualifications, and that brilliant success in one holds out no certain promise of success in the other. A popular election would have been very likely to raise Erskine or Curran to the bench, if they had selected the situation; but it seems quite certain that one failed as Lord Chancellor, and the other as Master of the Rolls, and pretty remarkably, too, considering their extraordinary abilities in the conduct

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY. — CHOATE.

[July 14th.]

of causes of fact at the bar. I have supposed that Lord Abinger, who, as Mr. Scarlett, won more verdicts than any man in England, did not conspicuously succeed in the Exchequer; and that, on the other hand, Lord Tenterden, to name no more, raised to the bench from no practice at all, or none of which the public had seen anything, became, by the fortunate possession of the specific judicial nature, among the most eminent who have presided on it. The truth is, the selection of a judge is a little like that of a professor of the higher mathematics or of intellectual philosophy. Intimate knowledge of the candidate will detect the presence or the absence of the speciality demanded; the kind of knowledge of him which the community may be expected to gain will not. On this point I submit to the honor and candor of the bar in this body an illustration which is worth considering. It often happens that our clients propose, or that we propose, to associate other counsel with us to aid in presenting the cause to the jury. In such cases we expect and desire them to select their man, and almost always we think the selection a good one. But it sometimes happens, too, that it is decided to submit the cause to a lawyer as a referee. And then do we expect or wish our client to select the referee? Certainly never. That we know we can do better than he, because better than he we appreciate the legal aspects of the case, and the kind of mind which is required to meet them; and we should betray the client, sacrifice the cause, and shamefully neglect a clear duty, if we did not insist on his permitting us, for the protection of his interests intrusted to our care, to appoint his judge. Always he also desires us for his sake to do it. And now, that which we would not advise the single client to do for himself, shall we advise the whole body of our clients to do for themselves?

But this is, by no means, the principal objection to making this kind of office elective. Consider, beyond all this, how the office itself is to be affected; its dignity; its just weight; the kind of men who will fill it; their learning; their firmness; their hold on the general confidence—how will these be affected? Who will make the judge? At present he is appointed by a governor, his council concurring, in whom a majority of the whole people have expressed their trust by electing him, and to whom the minority have no objection but his politics; acting under a direct personal responsibility to public opinion; possessing the best conceivable means to ascertain, if he does not know, by inquiry at the right sources, who does, and who does not possess the character of mind, and qualities demanded. By such a governor he is appointed; and then afterward he is perfectly independent of him. And how well the appointing power, in all hands, has done its work, let our judicial annals tell. But, under an elective system, who will make the judge? The young lawyer leaders in the caucus of the prevailing party, will make him. Will they not? Each party is to nominate for the office, if the people are to vote for it, is it not? You know it must be so. How will they nominate? In the great State caucus of course, as they nominate for governor. On whom will the judicial nominations be devolved? On the professional members of the caucus of course. Who will they be? Young, ambitious lawyers, very able, possibly, and very deserving; but not selected by a majority of the whole people, nor by a majority, perhaps, of their own towns, to do anything so important and responsible as to make a judge—these will nominate him. The party, unless the case is very scandalous indeed, will sustain its regular nominations, and thus practically a handful of caucus leaders, under this system, will appoint the judges of Massachusetts. This is bad enough, because we ought to know who it is that elevates men to an office so important; we ought to have some control over the nominating power—and of these caucus leaders we know nothing—and because, also, they will have motives to nominate altogether irrespective of the fitness of the nominee for the place, on which no governor of this Commonwealth, of any party, has ever acted. This is bad enough. But it is not all, nor the worst. Trace it onwards. So nominated, the candidate is put through a violent election; abused by the press; abused on the stump; charged ten thousand times over with being very little of a lawyer, and a good deal of a knave or boor; and after being tossed on this kind of blanket for some uneasy months, is chosen by a majority of ten votes out of a hundred thousand, and comes into court, breathless, terrified, with perspiration in drops on his brow, wondering how he ever got there, to take his seat on the bench. And in the very first cause he tries, he sets on one side the counsel who procured his nomination in caucus and has defended him by pen and tongue before the people; and on the other, the most prominent of his assailants; one who has been denying his talents; denying his learning; denying his integrity; denying him every judicial quality, and every quality that may define a good man, before half the counties in the State. Is not this about as infallible a recipe as you could wish to make a judge a respecter of persons? Will it not inevitably load him with the suspicion of partiality, whether he deserves it or not? Is it happily calculated altogether to fix on him the love, trust, and affectionate admiration of the general community with which you agree he ought to be clothed as with a robe, or he fills his great office in vain? Who does not shrink from such temptation to be partial? Who does not shrink from the suspicion of being thought so? What studious, and learned man, of a true self-respect, fitted the most preëminently for the magistracy by these very qualities and tastes, would subject himself to an ordeal so coarse, and so inappropriate, for the chance of getting to a position where no human purity, or ability, could assure him a trial by his merits?

But you will not make judges elective. What is to be feared is, that instead of attempting a larger mischief, in which you must fail, you will attempt a smaller, in which you may succeed. You will not change the system which has worked so well very much, you say; but you will change it some; and, therefore, you will continue to appoint by the governor; but, instead, of appointing during good behavior, subject to impeachment, and subject to removal by the legislature, you will appoint him for a term of years—five years, seven years, ten years.

Well, Sir, without repeating that no reason for any change is shown, and that no manner of evidence has been produced to prove that this project of executive appointment, for limited terms, has ever succeeded anywhere—pretty important considerations for thoughtful persons—likely to weigh much with the people—there are two objections to this system, which ought, in my judgment, to put it out of every head. And in the first place, it will assuredly operate to keep the ablest men from the bench. You all agree that you would have there the ablest man whom three thousand dollars, or twenty-one hundred dollars per annum will command. The problem is—one part of the problem is, how shall we get the best judge for that money?

And now, if my opinion is worth anything, I desire to express it with all possible confidence, that this change of tenure will infallibly reduce the rate of men whom you will have on the bench. Not every one, in all respects equal to it, can afford it now. It has been said, and is notorious, that it is offered and rejected. The consideration of its permanence is the decisive one in its favor, whoever accepts it. The salary is inadequate, but if it is certain, certain as good judicial behavior—it ought not to be more so—it may be thought enough. Deprive it of that moral make-weight, and it is nothing. Why should a lawyer, accumulating, or living, by his practice, look at a judgeship of ten years? What does he see and fear? At the end of that time he is to descend from the bench—a man forty-five or fifty, or sixty years of age—without a dollar, or certainly requiring some means of increasing his income. Every old client is lost by this time, and he is to begin life as he began it twenty or thirty years before. Not quite so even. Then he was young, energetic and sanguine. He is older now, and is less disposed to the contentious efforts of the law. More than that, he is less equal to them for another reason than the want of youth. If he has, during the full term of ten years, been good for anything; if he has been “a judge, altogether a judge, and nothing but a judge,” then his whole intellectual character and habits will have undergone a change, itself incapable of change. He will have grown out of the lawyer into the magistrate. He will have put off the gown of the bar, and have assumed the more graceful and reverend ermine of the bench. The mental habits, the mental faults of the advocate, the faults ascribed by satire to the advocate, the faults or habits of his character, the zeal, the constant energy bestowed on all causes alike; the tendencies, and the power to aggravate and intensify one side of a thesis, and forget, or allow inadequate importance to the other—these, if he has been a good judge, or tried his best to be a good judge, for ten years—he has lost, he has conquered—and has acquired in their place that calmer, and that fairer capacity to see the thing, fact, or law, just as it is. Thus changed, it will be painful to attempt to recover the advocate again; it will be impracticable, if it is attempted. To regain business, he must find new clients; to find or keep them, he must make himself over again. Accordingly, how rare are the cases where any man, above the age of forty, after having served ten years on the bench, seeking to cultivate judicial habits, and win a true judicial fame, has returned to a full business at the bar. I never heard of one. Such a retired judge may act as a referee. He may engage somewhat in chamber practice, as it is called, though the result of all my observation has been, that unless he can attend his opinions through court; can there explain and defend them; unless he can keep his hand so much in that he feels and knows at all times which way the judicial mind is tending on the open questions of the law—his chamber practice holds out a pretty slender promise for the decline of a life unprovided for. He who would be a lawyer, must unite the study of the books and the daily practice of the courts, or his very learning will lead him astray.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—CHOATE.

[July 14th.

I have been amused at the excellent reasons given to show why an able man, at the head of the bar, in full practice, forty years of age, a growing family and no property, should just as soon accept a judgeship for ten years, as during good behavior. Some say a judge never lives but ten years on the bench—or thirteen, at the outside—any how. They show statistics for it. They propose, therefore, to go to such a man and tender him the situation. He will inconsiderately answer that he should like the bench; thinks he could do something for the law; should rejoice to give his life to it; but that the prospect of coming off at fifty, and going back to begin battling it again with “these younger strengths,” is too dreary, and he must decline. “Bless you,” say the gentlemen, “don’t trouble yourself about that, if that is all. You can’t live but thirteen years, the best way you can fix it! Here is the secretary’s report—with a printed list as long as a Harvard College Catalogue—putting that out of all question!” Do you think this will persuade him? Does he expect to die in ten years? Who does so? Did the names on these statistics?

Others guess that the ten years’ judge will be reappointed, if he behaves well. But unless he is a very weak man indeed, will he rely on that? Who will assure it to him? Does he not know enough of life to know how easy it will be, after he has served the State, the law, his conscience, and his God, for the stipulated term; after the performance of his duty has made this ambitious young lawyer or that powerful client his enemy for life; after having thus stood in the way of a greedy competitor too long—how easy it will be to bring influences to bear on a new governor, just come in at the head of a flushed and eager party, to allow the old judge’s commission to expire, and appoint the right sort of a man in his place? Does he not know how easy it will be to say: “Yes, he is a good judge enough, but no better than a dozen others who have just put you in power; there are advantages in seating a man on the bench who is fresh from the bar; there is no injustice to the incumbent—didn’t he know that he ran this risk?” Too well he knows it, Sir, to be tickled by the chance of “finding the doom of man reversed for him,” and he will reject the offer.

Herein is a great and certain evil. How you can disregard it; how you can fail to appreciate what an obvious piece of good economy it is—economy worthy of statesmen, binding on your conscience—to so construct your system as to gain for the bench the best man whom three thousand dollars per annum can be made to command, passes all comprehension. Surely you will not reply that there “will be enough others to take it.” If the tendency of what you propose is appreciably to lessen the chances of obtaining the best, is it any excuse to say that fools will rush in where others will not tread?

But there is still another difficulty. He who does accept it, and performs as an hireling his day, will not only be an ordinary man comparatively, at the start, but he holds a place, and is subjected to influences, under which it will be impossible to maintain impartiality, and the reputation of impartiality; impossible to earn and keep that trust, and confidence, and affectionate and respectful regard, which the judge must have, or he is but half a judge.

I have sometimes thought that the tenure of good behavior has one effect a little like that which is produced by making the marriage tie indissoluble. If the “contract which renovates the world” were at the pleasure of both parties, they would sometimes, often, quarrel and bring about a dissolution in a month. But they know they have embarked for life—for good and ill—for better and worse; and they bear with one another—they excuse one another—they help one another—they make each other to be that which their eyes and their hearts desire. A little so in the relation of the judge to the bar, and the community. You want to invest him with honor, love and confidence. If every time when he rules on a piece of evidence, or charges the jury, a young lawyer can say, half aloud in the bar, or his disappointed client can go to the next tavern to say: “my good fellow, we will have you down here in a year or two—you shall answer for this—make the most of your time”—and so forth; is it favorable to the culture of such sentiments? Does it tend to beget that state of mind towards him in the community which prompts “the ear to bless him, and the eye to give witness to him?” Does it tend in him to “ripen that dignity of disposition which grows with the growth of an illustrious reputation, and becomes a sort of pledge to the public for security?” Show to the bar, and to the people, a judge by whom justice is to be dispensed for a lifetime, and all become mutually coöperative, respectful, and attached.

And still farther. This ten years’ judge of yours is placed in a situation, where he is in extreme danger of feeling, and of being suspected of feeling, so anxious a desire to secure his reappointment, as to detract, justly or unjustly, somewhat from that confidence in him without which there is no judge. It is easy for the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) to feel and express, with his habitual energy, indignation at the craven spirit which could stoop to do anything to prolong his term of office. It is easy, but is it to the purpose? All systems of judicial appointment and tenure suppose the judge to be a mortal man, after all; and all of them that are wise, and well tried, aim to fortify, guard, and help that which his Maker has left fallible and infirm. To inveigh against the lot of humanity is idle. Our business is to make the best of it; to assist its weakness; make the most of its virtue; by no means, by no means to lead it into any manner of temptation. He censures God, I have heard, who quarrels with the imperfections of man. Do you not, however, tempt the judge, as his last years are coming, to cast about for reappointment; to favor a little more this important party, or this important counsel, by whom the patronage of the future is to be dispensed? He will desire to keep his place, will he not? You have disqualified him for the more active practice of his profession. He needs its remuneration. Those whom he loves depend on it. The man who can give it, or withhold it, is before him for what he calls justice; on the other side is a stranger without a name. Have you placed him in no peril? Have you so framed your system as to do all that human wisdom can do to “secure a trial as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit?” If not, are we quite equal to the great work we have taken in hand?

There are two or three more general observations with which I leave the subject, which the pressure on your time, and my own state of health, unfit me for thoroughly discussing.

In constructing our judicial system, it seems to me not unwise so to do it, that it shall rather operate, if possible, to induce young lawyers to aspire to the honors of the bench, not by means of party politics, but by devoting themselves to the still and deep studies of this glorious science of the law. A republic, it is said, is one great scramble for office, from the highest to the lowest in the State. The tendencies certainly are to make every place a spoil for the victor, and to present to abilities and ambition active service in the ranks of party, victory under the banner, and by the warfare of party, as the quickest and easiest means of winning every one. How full of danger to justice and to security, and to liberty, are such tendencies, I cannot here and now pause to consider. These very changes of the judicial system, facilitating the chances of getting on the bench by party merits and party titles, will give strength incalculable to such tendencies. How much wiser to leave it as now, were it only to present motives to the better youth of the profession to withdraw from a too active and vehement political life; to conceive, in the solitude of their libraries, the idea of a great judicial fame and usefulness; and by profound study and the manly practice of the profession alone seek to realize it; to so prepare themselves, in mind, attainments, character, to become judges, by being lawyers only; that when the ermine should rest on them, it should find, as was said of Jay,—as might be said of more than one on the bench of both our courts, of one trained by our system for the bench of the supreme national court,—it should find “nothing that was not whiter than itself.”

I do not know how far it is needful to take notice of an objection by the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) and less or more by others, to the existing system, on the ground that it is monarchical, or anti-republican, or somehow inconsistent with our general theories of liberty. He has dwelt a good deal on it; he says we might just as well appoint a governor or a representative for life, or good behavior, as a judge; that it is fatally incompatible with our frame of government, and the great principles on which it reposes. One word to this.

It seems to me, that such an argument forgets that our political system, while it is purely and intensely republican, within all theories, aims to accomplish a two-fold object, to wit: liberty and security. To accomplish this two-fold object, we have established a two-fold set of institutions and instrumentalities; some of them designed to develop and give utterance to one; some of them designed to provide permanently and constantly for the other; some of them designed to bring out the popular will in its utmost intensity of utterance; some of them designed to secure life, and liberty, and character, and happiness, and property, and equal and exact justice, against all will, and against all power. These institutions and instrumentalities, in their immediate mechanism and workings, are as distinct and diverse, one from the other, as they are in their offices, and in their ends. But each one is the more perfect for

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—CHOATE—WALKER—HOOD.

[July 14th.]

the separation; and the aggregate result is our own Massachusetts.

Thus, in the law-making department, and in the whole department of elections to office, of those who make and those who execute the law, you give the utmost assistance to the expression of liberty. You give the choice to the people. You make it an annual choice; you give it to the majority; you make, moreover, a free press; you privilege debate; you give freedom to worship God according only to the dictates of the individual conscience. These are the mansions of liberty; here are her arms and here her chariot. In these institutions we provide for her; we testify our devotion to her; we show forth how good, and how gracious she is—what energies she kindles; what happiness she scatters; what virtues, what talents wait on her—vivifying every atom, living in every nerve, beating in every pulsation.

But to the end that one man, that the majority may not deprive any of life, liberty, property, the opportunity of seeking happiness, there are institutions of security. There is a Constitution to control the government. There is a separation of departments of government. There is a judiciary to interpret and administer the laws, "that every man may find his security therein." And in constituting these provisions for security, you may have regard mainly to the specific and separate objects which they have in view. You may very fitly appoint few judges only. You may very fitly so appoint them as to secure learning, impartiality, the love and confidence of the State; because thus best they will accomplish the sole ends for which they are created at all. If to those ends, too, it has been found, in the long run, as human nature is, that it is better to give them a tenure of good behavior, you may do so without departing in the least degree from either of the two great objects of our political system. You promote one of them directly by doing so. You do it without outrage on the other. Your security is greater; your liberty is not less. You assign to liberty her place, her stage, her emotions, her ceremonies; you assign to law and justice theirs. The stage, the emotions, the visible presence of liberty—are in the mass meeting; the procession by torchlight; at the polls; in the halls of legislation; in the voices of the press; in the freedom of political speech; in the energy, intelligence, and hope which pervade the mass; in the silent, unreturning tide of progression. But there is another apartment, smaller, humbler, more quiet, down in the basement story of our capitol—appropriated to justice, to security, to reason, to restraint; where there is no respect of persons; where there is no high nor low, no strong nor weak; where will is nothing, and power is nothing, and numbers are nothing—and all are equal, and all secure, before the law. Is it a sound objection to your system, that in that apartment you do not find the symbols, the cap, the flag of freedom? Is it any objection to a court room that you cannot hold a mass meeting in it, while a trial is proceeding? Is liberty abridged, because the procession returning by torchlight, from celebrating anticipated or actual party victory, cannot pull down a half dozen houses of the opposition with impunity; and because its leaders awake from the intoxications of her saturnalia to find themselves in jail for a riot? Is it any objection that every object of the political system is not equally provided for in every part of it? No, Sir. "Everything in its place, and a place for everything!" If the result is an aggregate of social and political perfection; absolute security, combined with as much liberty as you can live in—that is the State for you! Thank God for that; let the flag wave over it; die for it.

One word only, farther, and I leave this subject. It has been maintained, with great force of argument, by my friend for Manchester, that there is no call by the people for any change of the judicial system. Certainly there is no proof of such a call. The documentary history of the Convention utterly disproves it. But that topic is exhausted. I wished to add only, that my own observation, as far as it has gone, disproves it too. I have lost a good many causes, first and last; and I hope to try, and expect to lose, a good many more; but I never heard a client in my life, however dissatisfied with the verdict, or the charge, say a word about changing the tenure of the judicial office. I greatly doubt, if I have heard as many as three express themselves dissatisfied with the judge; though times without number, they have regretted that he found himself compelled to go against them. My own tenure I have often thought in danger; but I am yet to see the first client who expressed a thought of meddling with that of the court. What is true of those clients, is true of the whole people of Massachusetts. Sir, that people have two traits of character—just as our political system in which that character is shown forth, has two great ends. They love liberty; that is one trait. They love it, and they possess it to their heart's content. Free as storms to-day, do they not know it, and feel it, every one of them, from the sea to the Green Mountains? But there is another side to their character; and that is the old Anglo-Saxon instinct of property; the rational, and the creditable desire to be secure in life; in reputation; in the earnings of daily labor; in the little all which makes up the treasures, and the dear charities of the humblest home; the desire to feel certain when they come to die that the last will shall be kept; the smallest legacy of affection shall reach its object, although the giver is in his grave; this desire, and the sound sense to know that a learned, impartial, and honored judiciary is the only means of having it indulged. They have nothing timorous in them, as touching the largest liberty. They rather like the exhilaration of crowding sail on the noble old ship, and giving her to scud away before a fourteen knot breeze; but they know, too, that if the storm comes on to blow; and the masts go overboard; and the gun-deck is rolled under water; and the lee shore, edged with foam, thunders under her stern, that the sheet anchor, and best bower, then are everything! Give them good ground tackle, and they will carry her round the world, and back again, till there shall be no more sea.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. I cannot give the vote which I intend to give upon this subject, while seeming to vote in opposition to what are my feelings in relation to this question, without some explanation. I feel that I must vote against the amendment which is proposed, namely: to make the judiciary elective, and in favor of the amendment which proposes to limit the term of the office of the judges. And therefore, I wish to give the reasons why I do so. I discard entirely the idea, that the people are not competent to elect their judges. I am satisfied that is an idea which we have brought with us from abroad, that there is nothing American in it, nothing in harmony with our institutions. But I feel persuaded, from what I know, that the people are not prepared to act on that principle. I am fully persuaded, that the people still have the impression that the judges must be appointed by the executive; and therefore, as a matter of prudence, those who wish well to the success of the new Constitution should go in favor of limiting the tenure, instead of making the office elective. I repeat, Sir, that the idea of "the independence of the judiciary" is something that does not apply to this country at all. There is something inconsistent and incongruous in it. "Independent" of what! Why, the old English idea was, I suppose, that the judiciary should be made independent of the crown, in order that it might stand between the government and the people, and guard the interests of the latter against the tyranny of the former. Now how can that apply to this country? Here, the people are the sovereign, and what do we want to come between them and the government? It strikes me that this has no relevancy, no propriety, here. Why then should we make the judges independent of the people, and thus create an irresponsible tribunal above and beyond them? The thing is absurd if the people are admitted to be capable of self-government; especially so in view of the fact that all other officers, from the chief magistrate downward, are elected by the people and responsible to them.

I did not rise to make a speech at this time, but simply to remark that I entirely repudiate, and wish to bear my testimony against the idea that the people are not competent to elect their judges, and that it would not be perfectly safe for them to do so.

Mr. HOOD, of Lynn. Mr. President: I have waited with the hope that some one would rise to present this subject to the Convention in the light in which I view it. It is due to the importance of this question, that both sides of the argument should be presented in the strongest light, and I regret exceedingly that it is not in my power, at this late hour in the session, to do it justice.

Mr. President, four of the ablest members of this Convention have presented, with great power and eloquence, the argument in favor of the present system of appointment of the judges by the governor and council. The Goliath of the past has been brought up before this Convention, and arrayed here, as in former years; but I remember that there is a smooth stone with which the people will smite this Goliath, as they have done heretofore. I believe that the principle of electing the judges by the people is right, and do not agree with the eloquent and able member from Boston, (Mr. Choate), who said this morning that the judges will not be elected by the people. He said: "there is no danger that the judges will be elected by the people." Mr. President, it may seem like presumption in me, to take issue with that gentleman on this question; but I stand here to say, that, in my judgment, it is only a question of time. This Convention may not adopt this amendment, but the principle is right; the progress of reform is onward; a majority of the States have set the example, and its adoption here, I repeat, is only a question of time.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HOOD.

[July 14th.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this Convention is ready to decide this question against the great principles upon which our government was founded. I am aware that it has been assumed here, from the commencement of this discussion, that the Convention would decide against the amendment of the member from Fall River. And upon what grounds?

I ask the indulgence of the Convention while I, as briefly as possible, state my views upon this subject. I agree with gentlemen around me that it is one of the most important questions which have been submitted to our consideration; that we should approach this subject with great reverence for the Constitution under which we have lived.

But, Sir, we are here to act for ourselves. We are not to reason from the past altogether, but with reference to the future; and, above all, we should look at the mission which it is the duty of this generation to carry out. We are the men of to-day; and, although we should be guided by the lessons of wisdom coming from the past, still we should not blindly follow the old paths, but think and act for ourselves. The great American idea is, that we, the people, are sovereign, and have the right to form a system of government for ourselves. That principle was promulgated on the fourth of July, 1776, when it was set forth in the Declaration of Independence. Our forefathers adopted that principle in the Constitution of Massachusetts. As the member for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) remarked, they assembled in Convention to form a system of government "adapted to existing institutions." They found the judicial system, which they had looked upon with so much reverence, as it existed in England. That was in accordance with their previous experience, and they left it for the men who should come after them, to carry out such reforms as wisdom and experience might suggest.

I ask the Convention to allow me to refer to the experience of the past upon this subject. The member for Manchester, and the member from Boston, have referred to English history to find the origin of the doctrine of the independent judiciary. Brought to the test of principle, we find that this doctrine is inconsistent with the theory of our Constitution.

Macaulay says of the courts of England in 1638: "The tribunals afforded no protection to the subject against the civil and ecclesiastical tyranny of that period. The judges of the common law, holding their situations during the pleasure of the king, were scandalously obsequious. Foremost among these courts, in power and infamy, were the Star Chamber and the High Commission. . . . The government was able, through their instrumentality, to fine, imprison, pillory and mutilate, without restraint. . . . The whole nation was alarmed and incensed. . . . The opponents of the government began to despair of the destiny of their country, and many looked to the American wilderness as the only asylum where they could enjoy civil and spiritual freedom. There a few resolute Puritans built, amid the primeval forests, villages, which are now great and opulent cities, but which have, through every change, retained some tinge of the character derived from their founders."

Mr. President, one tinge which they retained was the doctrine of an independent judiciary. They incorporated into their fundamental law the principle that all government was of the people, and that the people had a right to elect all officers, but they did not apply the principle to judicial officers. They laid down the principle, and left it to their descendants to carry it out and apply it. Macaulay farther says, in speaking of the beneficent results of the Revolution of 1688, that one of them was "the law which secured the independence of the judges." Now, Sir, the gentleman from Boston has remarked this morning, that in 1688 a law was adopted "which secured the independence of the judges;" but, Sir, it appears that it did not secure their independence in the colonies, for we find that one of the causes set forth in the Declaration of Independence by our forefathers for making that Declaration, was that the judges were not independent of the Crown. In the Declaration of Independence, nearly a century afterwards, they used the following language: "The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations;" and farther on it says: "he has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries." Now, Mr. President, when our fathers assembled in Convention to make a Constitution, they were imbued with this English idea of the importance of an independent judiciary. The government which they established was at that time an experiment. They adopted this plan of a judiciary appointed by the executive, to hold during good behavior or for life, following the English system.

Now, Sir, what were the fundamental principles laid down at that time in the Constitution which was to be the guide of future generations? "All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them."

Now bring the doctrines which have been advanced here, to the test of this great principle. Our judges are independent of the people; our fundamental law asserts that they shall be made "at all times accountable to the people. I submit, Sir, that the time has come for us to carry out and apply this principle to our judicial system. But, there is another clause in our fundamental law to which I wish to refer. "All elections ought to be free; and all the inhabitants of this Commonwealth, having such qualifications as they shall establish by their frame of government, have an equal right to elect officers, and to be elected for public employments." There is no exception made here with regard to judicial officers. The framers of our Constitution adopted existing forms in accordance with the public opinion of the time, but they laid down correct principles in the declaration of rights and left it for their posterity to apply them.

Starting from this point, we come to the question before us: Is it expedient to incorporate this amendment into a fundamental law? It is said first that we should not do so because it was not put forth to the people as one of the reasons for calling this Convention: and they did not expect it! There was an implied, if not a direct promise, that it should not be put into the Constitution, and that this amendment should not be made. Who was authorized to make any such promise, either direct or implied? I know of no person.

I am aware that some members of this Convention have said that they took this ground on their own responsibility; but I deny that it was generally entertained by the people of the Commonwealth. On the contrary, Mr. President, I find in a public document a conclusive reason why we should consider this subject, and, if we deem it expedient, adopt this amendment. The member for Manchester read from the report made to the Senate, in favor of the Convention, in 1852, that portion referring to the election of judges, in which the committee give it, as their opinion, that it is not expedient to act upon the subject; but they close their remarks with the following sentence, which shows that the construction which has been put upon it, by some members of the Convention, is not correct. The report says: "Should a Convention be called, we doubt not it would number among its members many of the most distinguished men in the Commonwealth, men selected from the bench, the bar, as well as from the more common, but not less useful avocations of life. Men who by their age, and practical learning, experience and observation, would be much better qualified to settle this important question than we can claim to be." They have thus announced that we were to settle this important question; we were elected under the Act calling this Convention, to revise the Constitution, the whole of it, not a part of it. It was not to make a few specific amendments—it was to revise the whole Constitution, to consider and adopt such reforms as we judged to be necessary. I hold that we are to act according to the dictates of our own judgment. Although we cannot tell whether the people are prepared for any particular amendments, if we deem them important it is our duty to send them out to the people, and let them decide whether they ought to be incorporated into the fundamental law.

Now, Sir, my opinion in regard to this proposition is, that the time has come for its adoption. I believe that the people are prepared for it; that they are far in advance of the members of this Convention with regard to this reform. The remark was made yesterday, by a distinguished gentleman, that the members of this Convention were advanced in life, and that they were conservative. I have not seen much evidence as yet of the truth of that statement. There is a desire to make such a Constitution as shall be beneficial for the present and for future generations. Now, Sir, believing that a majority of the people are prepared to adopt this amendment, the question is, whether it is right—whether it will operate beneficially upon the interests of all the people of the Commonwealth.

In this connection, Mr. President, I will refer to the remark of the member from Boston, (Mr. Choate,) that we are to judge which form is best, "guided by the unerring light of the past." I ask him to look at the "unerring light of the past," with regard to the election of other officers by the people of the Commonwealth.

For seventy years we have elected other officers; and have the people been in the habit of electing incompetent men? Have the men who have been elected to the office of governor of this Commonwealth been incompetent men? Have they been men who were unfit to be intrusted with power, and have the officers in other departments of the Commonwealth, who have been elected by the people, proved unworthy? Have

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HOOD.

[July 14th.]

we had incompetent men in the legislature to make the laws which these judges are to expound? I submit, Sir, that if we are to be guided by the "unerring light of the past," we ought to take into view the elections of the past seventy years. We want no light coming across the water a century or two ago.

We are referred to the judges on the bench: and the question is asked, has there been any trouble or difficulty with regard to this matter? Is there any reason why a change should be made? We have, undoubtedly, had very good judges, as good as any Commonwealth, for the reason that our people are intelligent; for the reason that they have elected competent men for governors. If we have had good judges it has been owing to the good governor and the good councillors, who were elected by the people. Why not, therefore, be willing to trust the election of judges to the people? But, it is said, why should not the present system be continued, as it is acknowledged to work well? I answer, because reform is necessary, as I shall endeavor to show hereafter, and because it is our duty to carry out the fundamental principles of our government. The present form is an anomaly in our system, which ought to be reformed. We should set the example for the civilized nations of the earth. We should give the friends of liberty and free government everywhere, an opportunity to point to Massachusetts as an example in this respect. Whenever an individual comes here from Europe, and the subject is spoken of, this anomaly is pointed out as evidence that we are not willing to carry out this fundamental principle of our government, to elect all our officers by the people. This is pointed out as evidence that we do not believe in the doctrine which we profess. No sophistry can change it, not even the eloquence of the gentleman from Boston can wipe away that impression that we are afraid to trust the people to elect their judges; we are afraid that, in a time of popular excitement, they will be deceived, and will elect incompetent men. And it comes back directly to that point, that you are afraid to trust the people. I ask, then, if the members of this Convention are willing to place themselves upon that ground? Are they willing to place the argument in the mouths of the opponents of liberty and free governments, that a Convention has been called in one of the most enlightened States on the face of the earth, where the people are educated, and competent to judge respecting the men whom they elect to office; and that this Convention was called, fresh from the people, representing all classes of the people of the Commonwealth, and the question was brought before them, "Will you allow the people to elect their judges? Will you trust them to carry out the fundamental principles which were laid down in their Bill of Rights, that the people are the source of all power, and have the right to elect all their officers?" Will you answer "No! we will not trust the people!" Will you allow the despots of Europe to use the argument that this Convention was asked to do this, and refused, and therefore that even in America, this boasted land of liberty, the people themselves do not believe in this great principle?

Mr. President, I can come to no other conclusion than that distrust of the people is the true and only reason for opposing this reform. I know that it has been said—and the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) repeated it yesterday—that no change should be made except where abuses exist. Sir, I hold that all human institutions are imperfect, and that there is great need of reform in our judicial system. According to the Bill of Rights, "Every subject of this Commonwealth ought to find a certain remedy, by having recourse to the laws, for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property or character. He ought to obtain right and justice freely and without being obliged to purchase it; completely and without any denial; promptly and without delay, conformably to the laws."

Now, Sir, I have the testimony of one of the most able and intelligent lawyers of the county in which I reside, that the people cannot and do not obtain justice "promptly and without delay;" that there is a vast amount of what appears to be unnecessary delay in our courts. He told me that it was a universal complaint; that his clients were disposed to submit to and suffer injustice, rather than resort to our courts for redress, on account of the delay, which involved a large additional expense; and I appeal to the experience of every member of this Convention, whether this is not the case? Sir, during twenty-five years' experience in business, I have felt the inconvenience of this delay and expense, and I submit that every subject of this Commonwealth does not obtain justice "promptly and without delay," as it is declared in the Bill of Rights he should.

Sir, I contend that there is great need of reform here. I know that this is a bold position to take, but it is true, nevertheless. Sir, to talk of imperfection in regard to the administration of the law, I am well aware, is considered as heresy among the members of the bar.

While we hear so much of the excellence of the English system, would it not be well to imitate the example of another country in one respect. In the kingdom of Denmark, courts of conciliation were established some fifty years ago. The result of those courts, in securing the administration of justice "promptly and without delay," must be known to every lawyer who has read anything of their proceedings, for they reduced the number of causes commenced and determined within three years, to one-third of the number which were brought before the courts three years previous. It might, therefore, be well for us to look into that system, and see if something of the kind could not be established here. I am aware that this matter has not been brought under the consideration of the committee, and perhaps the reason was, that many gentlemen are yet too much wedded to the old system, which has descended to us through the mists of interminable precedents, to venture upon a new experiment. Thus it is, Sir, instead of founding our law and practice upon the basis of plain common sense, our lawyers have to go back for centuries to find precedents, and thus it takes nearly a lifetime to study law, and even then many of the profession seem to have but a very faint and indistinct idea of what the duties of a lawyer are, or of what the law itself consists. Sir, I submit if there is not much room for reform in this matter?

I have said that we suffer delay in the administration of justice, and have endeavored to point out some of its causes. Another cause is, that our judges are appointed for life. They are independent, and not accountable to the people. Their salaries go on all the time, whether they are doing anything or not. Cases are put off from court to court, and from term to term. The lawyers seem to care but little what becomes of their clients, so that they get their fees; and the judges as little what becomes of "justice without delay," provided they get their salaries. And thus the whole burden of this expense and delay falls upon those whose circumstances or misfortunes render it necessary for them to avail themselves of the protection of the laws.

Sir, the example of our law courts, in the delay of business, has been followed by other public bodies, to the great injury of public and private interests. Go into your legislative halls, and you will find that business is procrastinated in a similar manner. In the State and in the National legislature the length of the sessions has been doubled, and the business has been postponed from month to month, from year to year, and unreasonably neglected. If any member has the boldness to introduce a proposition with the view of facilitating business, or of saving time, he is immediately put down, or treated with neglect, and his proposition voted out. We have seen the same tendency to delay in the proceedings of this body. Early in the session I introduced an order concerning the order of business, which was not received with much favor. One of my discreet friends advised me to let the subject alone; for he said it was "not popular" to attempt to shorten sessions, or to limit debates, or to undertake to bring the business within anything like a circle of orderly arrangement. But, Sir, I am yet to be convinced that I was wrong in this respect. I believe it is just as necessary to adopt system and arrangement in the business of legislation, as it is in any of the ordinary occupations of life, and it is as much so in our courts at law, if we would facilitate business, as it is anywhere else. This dilatory mode of attending to legislative and judicial business has for years been creeping into our system, and it appears to me to be time that some strenuous and effective method should be adopted whereby a radical change may be effected.

But it may, perhaps, be asked whether the proper remedy for this evil, so far as our law courts are concerned, is in making our judges elective by the people. I hold, Sir, that it will be one very important step towards accomplishing a reform; and if we cannot do everything at once, let us make some progress in this good work; if we cannot tear the evil up by the roots, let us at least cut it down and prevent it from spreading in the community. This step, in my estimation, will have a most salutary effect. Should it be adopted, the people will elect men to fill these judicial stations who will feel that it is their duty to work, who will sympathize with the desires and requirements of those who have placed them in office, and who will remember that the people elected them, not to pay them salaries that they might live in ease and idleness, but that they might feel the responsibility of their position and act accordingly.

The member from Boston, (Mr. Choate,) has told us this morning that we want judges who shall be independent. He painted the character of what he regarded as a proper judge, with a power and eloquence which I confess I never heard surpassed. Mr. President, I submit to this Convention whether the people would not be likely to elect just such a man as that learned gentleman so eloquently and forcibly described? Does any one doubt that the people usually select a competent man for their governor? And if the people are fully qualified to elect a man possessing all the qualifications requisite for a governor, are they more likely to fail in selecting men with suitable qualifications for judges? The gentleman from Boston thinks the cases are not parallel, and argues that a judge would be nominated in a political caucus, and that political partisans, or some young lawyers, would be there endeavoring to effect the nomination of some incompetent man, unfit for the station.

Thursday.]

THE JUDICIARY.—HOOD.

[July 14th.

Why, Sir, carry out that argument to its legitimate extent and where will it lead you? Will it not apply with equal force to all elections whatever? Was not the same argument used by those who were in favor of British institutions, and opposed to all elections by the people. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Choate,) says that Alexander Hamilton was in favor of the appointment of judges for life. Sir, Alexander Hamilton declared that "the British Constitution, with all its faults, and all its corruptions, was the most admirable Constitution on the face of the globe;" and he was in favor of an executive and a Senate to be elected for life, so as to make them independent of the people; so that they should not be a reflex of the popular mind, but an entirely separate element in our political organization. And whence the origin of such a proposition? Sir, where, but in ambition on the one hand and a dread of popular accountability on the other. Sir, the man who stands upon this floor to express any distrust of the people has not a truly republican feeling in his nature. He has no sympathy with democracy. He has not the first instinctive idea of democratic principle in his soul. He knows nothing of those sublime and pure principles of democratic liberty, which are but the reflex of the great system of Christianity itself—of the great idea which was put forth nearly nineteen hundred years ago, and which has spread itself abroad, and worked its way among mankind against the corruptions of tyranny, selfishness, ambition, and lust for power, and finally embodied in the government which was established on this continent in 1776, which was based on a "higher law" than the divine right of kings—on the great heart of humanity. Sir, the safest depository of power—of all political power—is in the intelligence of the people. They are not so likely to abuse it as when it is lodged in the hands of an individual or in the grasp of a few; and however much the gentleman from Boston may talk about some man who imagines he has not enough liberty because he cannot knock down a judge who does not decide in his favor, or vilify a jury because they will not give him a verdict against evidence, it is but a poor answer to the argument to attempt to meet it with an implied sneer against the intelligence and good conduct of the body of the citizens of Massachusetts.

And, Sir, following out the argument of that gentleman in regard to caucuses and the probability of a judge being the mere nominee of some influential partisans, is not the same argument applicable to your governor? What does he do when a vacancy occurs? Does he act with a total disregard to party ties and party feelings, and influences? How many times, let me ask him, has a governor of Massachusetts been known to appoint a judge who held political sentiments adverse to his own and those of his party who elected him? Sir, the instances are so rare it would be difficult to find them. Sir, I do not know but one instance, and that a recent one; and were it courteous to seek a motive for it perhaps one could be found in the fact of the call for this Convention. Look back for the last quarter of a century, and see if you can find more than one or two similar instances? Sir, I submit that the instances are exceedingly rare in which we have ever had judges whose appointments were not made on political grounds. I claim that we are not more likely to have political judges, if they are elected by the people, than if they are appointed by the executive. In either case, I suppose we shall have judges who are made judges in part on account of their political opinions, for I do not believe in this doctrine of "no party;" nor do I believe that there is any Democrat who looks to the theory of our government, and will follow it out, but will come to the same conclusion which I have in this respect, and that is, that "party" will make the government. It is by association only that we can accomplish any reform. And what are parties for? Simply to sustain the great principles of our government, without which nothing can be accomplished. The men who talk about "no party" strike a blow at the very foundations of free government. Parties are necessary to sustain an administration, and as a check on the abuses of power and patronage. Parties exist where freedom of opinion and of discussion prevail; their tendency is to the maintenance of popular rights, to gain the support of the people, and to keep alive the spirit of liberty. They can be repressed only under a despotic form of government.

Again, Sir, I hold that the election of the judges will have a salutary influence on the character of caucuses and conventions. Parties will be compelled to nominate their ablest and best men for judges, or they will be defeated before the people. Men of influence and of character will have an additional inducement to attend caucuses, to see that suitable candidates are nominated. The interest of the people in the elections will be increased, and they will be more vigilant in the exercise of their political duties.

Mr. President, I have already said that my reliance is on the intelligence of the people. I do not expect them to be free from political bias and political feelings, nor do I expect to find a judge upon the bench without similar emotions. We want men of character, and learning, and talent; men in whom the people will have confidence; and when they find them thus, I am quite sure they will sustain them. The people love an independent man. It cannot be otherwise, so long as they love independence themselves. They love men who will stand up in defence of great principles. They loved the immortal Jackson for his independence. Give us judges of the same bearing in that respect, and there is little doubt of the people sustaining them. That is the doctrine on which I stand, and I believe it to be in accordance with the views of the people of this Commonwealth.

Sir, the election of judges by the people will add strength and security to our institutions. If the judges are responsible to the people, they will regard their just decisions as an expression of their will, and the tendency of public opinion will be to sustain and obey the laws.

It has been said that Adams, Jefferson, and other great men, were in favor of the appointment of judges for life. Sir, were they here to-day to frame a Constitution, with the "unerring light of the past" seventy years, would they be in favor of this anomaly in our system? No, Sir; they were progressive men, and they would rebuke those who are recreant to the great principles which they transmitted to their posterity. They acted up to the requirements of the age in which they lived, and we shall do well in this respect to profit by their example.

Letters have been read from some lawyers in New York, giving their opinions against the election of judges by the people. They were probably opposed to the reform, and it is difficult to convince men against their will. Stronger testimony might have been obtained in favor of the reform, if it had been deemed necessary. It would be well for those who doubt the success of the elective system in New York to look at the testimony of the press in that State. Those who belong to the same party as the New York Tribune, should examine its columns on this point. The progressive men in that State are few and far between who would propose to go back to the old system.

Mr. President, I think the time has come for the majority of this Convention to show to the people that they have confidence in them, and that they are ready to trust them upon this subject. I do not desire that the proposed amendments should be submitted to the people as a whole, and if gentlemen have doubts whether they will accept this reform, let this question go out to them separately. I have not a doubt that a large majority of the people will say that they believe it is the right system, and that they desire to elect their judges as well as their other officers.

There seems to be a fallacy existing in the minds of some individuals in regard to this matter of an independent judiciary. That has been the great point dwelt upon, in various forms, in this debate. The idea has been advanced that if you make the judiciary elective by the people, the judges will be partial; and the member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) remarked that "the judges would be elected on account of their decisions." I ask that gentleman, and others who agree with him, whether the same train of reasoning would not bring them to this result—that no officers should be elected by the people, and that it would be much safer to have all of them appointed for a long period, or for life, by some "men of eminent gravity"?

It is said that the judges must be "protected against the popular will"—that the people are liable to be led astray, which is the old doctrine of Alexander Hamilton—that "the people are turbulent, and they seldom judge or determine right;" and it will take a great while, perhaps, to get that idea out of the minds of some people.

Now, Sir, is it probable that the people will elect a judge whose decisions have been wrong? They have elected governors believed to be competent to appoint judges; and I submit whether there is not as much or more danger that the executive would be influenced by the popular will or by his party, to make wrong appointments, than that the judges would be to make wrong decisions. It is a maxim of our government that when men are placed in a position where they can exercise irresponsible power, in the hour of temptation they are liable to abuse it. That is the reason why frequent elections are necessary. We are taking power away from the executive, by abridging his appointments and providing for the election of many officers by the people. And why not carry out this reform? Why stop when you come to the judges? Will not the same reasons which have been urged with so much effect in regard to other officers apply with greater force to the judges?

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HOOD—BIRD.

[July 14th.

There are various influences which might be brought to bear upon the executive, which have not been mentioned. I ask the members of this Convention, whether they cannot conceive of a case where the executive may have the names of several candidates before him, for a judgeship, which have been sent up to him by partisan committees from various parts of the Commonwealth, and one or more of which names, may have been presented by some active partisans, who have it in their power to defeat the election of the governor the next year. Will there not be a strong temptation for him to appoint some individual who is a rival candidate, whom he may wish to get out of his way, or some friend or favorite of his own, or of some active politician of his party, who will use all his influence against him at the next election, if he does not comply with his desires? Do gentlemen say that it has not been so heretofore? There is no proof of that, but on the contrary, I submit, that if they will look closely into the reasons which have influenced the executive, they may find there have been political caucus nominations here. The executive is more likely to be influenced in this way to make injudicious appointments, than the people. In a neighboring State, (New York,) the reasons given for taking the appointing power out of the hands of the executive and giving it to the people, were, that political and partisan influences had controlled the appointments.

Our executive is just as subject to such influences as that of any other State. I hold, that there is no danger that the people would be induced by partisan influences to elect incompetent judges. They are not in the habit of jeopardizing their rights and interests.

The member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) in his remarks yesterday, supposes a case in relation to the decision of the court upon the "Maine Law" and asks, Would not the people vote for or against the judges on that ground alone? Now, Sir, I ask if judges have not been appointed in this Commonwealth on precisely similar grounds? I ask if the executive has not appointed judges, who entertain particular views upon various subjects, in order to satisfy the different sections of his party? I do not undertake to say, that there is any evidence on this point, but there is certainly, more reason for supposing that the executive would be influenced by such considerations, and that he would decide according to the views of a political faction, than that the people would be thus influenced. Suppose there is a judge to be appointed. The governor may be elected with reference to that appointment; and being elected in consequence of his views on a particular question, would he dare to appoint a judge who would decide against his political friends?

The member for Manchester farther said, in reference to this point, "Where lies an appeal against the popular majority?" Mr. President, what does our Bill of Rights say in reference to that matter? Is there any repository of power except the people? Is there any other tribunal to be set up in this country? Across the water there is an appeal from the will of the popular majority; but here the final appeal is to the people. Such is the theory on which our government is based. The point which lies upon his mind appears to be that there should be an aristocratic branch of the government, appointed for life, to operate as a check upon the popular will. Now, Sir, I do not want any such check upon this will. I want no better check to prevent mistakes, or to guard against undue excitement, than to have the judges elected for a term of years, and one of them elected every year. Then, if by accident one improper man should be elected, he would not be likely to do much harm. I think that the judges should be elected for from five to seven years, and that ten years is too long a period. If a bad judge should get into office, ten years is too long for him to remain there; and if a good judge is elected once, he would probably be re-elected.

The gentleman farther says, that in New York "the office has fallen into the political mill." It was in the political mill before, and it was so stated in the Convention which framed the present Constitution of that State. The abuse complained of was, that partisans were appointed by the executive. But is there any evidence that things are as bad now as they were before? Is there any evidence that incompetent men have been elected by the people? I have seen none.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I am aware that in the present temper of this Convention, I shall be listened to impatiently. Yet I am anxious to say a few words, not perhaps with the expectation of influencing the decision of this question, but because I feel that this is but the beginning of a discussion which must go on until the elective judiciary becomes the established policy of the State. I think it therefore important, without entering into any labored argument, that the reasons, as briefly as may be, on one side and the other, should be placed upon the records of this Convention to be used hereafter. This is but the beginning of the end. It is only a question of time. Give the subject a fair discussion, and an elective judiciary in Massachusetts is just as inevitable and just as necessary as an elective governor and legislature have been in times past.

We are told that this subject was not before the people before the Convention came together. Well, we have done a great many things which were not discussed before the people, and we did not hesitate at all, on that account, to do them. There is a divinity which has shaped our ends in this matter. We are realizing the fulfilment of the promise—I quote it reverently—"Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it," so that now I am willing to vote for a measure, which, perhaps, a year ago I might not have thought it possible that I could vote for. I believe there never was a time in the history of any State in this Union, certainly never a time in the history of Massachusetts, when democratic ideas have gained so rapidly as within the last five months. Therefore I believe the people will sustain us in doing what we did not think of doing six or eight months ago.

It seems to me that all the evils, without an exception, of an elective judiciary, have been in the future. Evil results in abundance have been predicted, none have been proved, as flowing from the elective system anywhere. Gentlemen say it has not been long enough tried. That is, we must not try the experiment until the experiment has been tried, which requires a whole generation—worse than the advice of the anxious mother to her boy, that he must not go into the water until he had learned to swim.

The gentleman for Manchester read some extracts from letters from New York and Maryland. I wanted to ask him the names signed to them, for their authority would very much depend upon whose names they were. He told us that in those States the system was not working well, and yet almost in the same breath he told us that the people tried the appointed judiciary until they became so indignant at, and discontented with it, that they charged the system to an elective judiciary, and I submit, that the system has worked better in that community, than the other system had previously. Does any one pretend that the people are ready to go back to an appointed judiciary? If the system of electing the judiciary has worked well in the communities where it has been tried, the inference is that it will work better in any community than the appointing system will work in the same community. No man here has attempted to prove that it has not worked well wherever it has been tried. Go into New York, into Maryland, or into any State in which it has been tried, and you will find that it has worked better than any system which has been previously tried. It has been said that the election of judges will be made like the election of the other public officers, a mere political matter. Why, Sir, go to Vermont. That State has been nothing but Whig ever since the judges have been elected, yet at this very time, two out of the five judges are Democrats, and the late chief justice was a Free Soiler and for many years a Liberty Party man.

Every-body knows that in New York the elections have not been so much of a political character as were the appointments under the old system.

Look at the State of Missouri. The chief justice of that State, for the last fifteen or twenty years, has been a Whig, although every-body knows that State has been Democratic, and nothing else, from the beginning.

Now, we are told that we must show where the present system works badly. I say, no, the burden of proof rests entirely upon those who come here and claim that this system should be continued, to show that it works well. It rests with them to show why we should continue a system which takes out of the hands of the people a power that belongs to them. I start here: The sovereignty is with the people. The right to elect all their officers rests with the people—that the whole people are a wiser and safer depository of power than any portion of the people. I hold that you can safely trust them to elect any of their officers more safely than you can intrust any delegates they may elect, to appoint them. I say that you can more safely trust the whole people than any portion of them, because the whole, of course, includes that portion, and you not only have the benefit of their wisdom, but the wisdom of all the rest.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—BIRD—MORTON.

[July 14th.

Starting there, I say that the burden of proof rests with those who say this system shall be continued, just as much as in the beginning it rested upon them to show why this class of officers should be excepted from all the rest which it was the right of the people to elect.

I take it that if your Constitution did not exist, and you were to start to-day to frame one, with the democratic sentiments which we now entertain, and the question should come up, shall the people elect, or shall the executive appoint our public officers, the principle we should establish would be, that the people should elect them all; and if any one should think that the people were not the proper tribunal—the proper power to elect any portion of these officers—it would devolve upon him to prove that these officers which he wishes excepted cannot safely be elected by the people, and not upon the people to show that they could be safely trusted with that power.

Gentlemen talk about this being an experiment. They might just as well talk about the problem of self-government being an experiment. It is no more an experiment to elect the judges by the people than it is to elect senators or representatives or any other officers by the people. But if it be true that this election be an experiment, here in Massachusetts is the very best community in the world to try that experiment, and give it a fair trial. Sir, to those who have been watching the solution of this problem of self-government, I say that we have never given it a fair trial. We have allowed the people to choose a part of their officers—a part of their rulers, but we have restrained them in the selection of the most important portion of those officers. And when we are taunted, as we frequently are, by monarchists of the Old World, that the experiment of self-government in this country has proved a failure, I say to them that we never have had a trial of self-government here at all, and it never can have a fair trial until the people are recognized as the sovereign source of power, judicial as well as executive and legislative. The extracts and quotations read by the gentleman for Manchester seemed to me to be rather unfortunate for his side of the argument. He read from the Bill of Rights that the different departments of the government should not encroach upon each other, to the end that we might have a government of laws and not of men. Yet he and the gentlemen with him upon this subject, advocate the doctrine of placing the control of one whole department of the government in the hands of another department. If that is not an encroachment of the one department upon another—if it is not an encroachment of the executive upon the judicial, then I do not know what encroachment is.

I am reminded here, of a remark made by the gentleman for Manchester, of the generosity of George III., in relinquishing the power of appointing the judges—by suggesting himself that they should be appointed for life, instead of their term of office expiring with the demise of the crown. Now, without meaning any disrespect to the memory of that very respectable gentleman, it seemed to me that it was not any very great sacrifice after all, when he had already appointed the judges which by the then existing law were to continue in office during his own life. I could not help thinking that, after all, the character of that hopeful son of his, heir to his crown, had some influence in inducing him to suggest the giving up of that power of removing the judges at the demise of the crown. I think it was because he did not wish to place it in the power of the Prince of Wales to appoint all the judges of the realm upon his death.

Now, Sir, I have no doubt if the question of making the judiciary elective, were to be decided upon the honest convictions of the members of this Convention, that a large majority of us, expressing our individual opinions, would go in favor of it. But I am afraid that considerations of policy will control that result. For one, I shall give my vote without hesitation, in favor of the amendment now before us, because I believe the principle is a sound one, and that the people would sustain us in making the judiciary elective. I never have yet heard of an instance, and I should like gentlemen to point me to an instance, where a Constitution has been brought before the people of any State in the Union and rejected, because it left too much power in the hands of the people. I have heard of Constitutions being rejected because they restrained the popular will. I have heard of their being rejected because they retained too much power in the hands of the executive, but I have never yet heard of any one being rejected because they gave too much power to the people.

But, Sir, I see that the hour of adjournment is near, and I will not detain the Convention longer.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, of Taunton, the Convention adjourned until three o'clock this afternoon.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at 3 o'clock.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of MORTON, of Taunton, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The PRESIDENT stated that the first subject in the Orders of the Day was the resolves upon the subject of the judiciary, reported by the Committee of the Whole, with an amendment, to which an amendment had been offered by the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper).

Mr. MORTON. I propose to ask the attention of the Convention for a short time, to the subject now under consideration. I have two reasons operating upon my mind for asking that favor. One is, that being the chairman of the Committee which reported the original resolves, it seems to be expected, that in that capacity, I should say a few words in relation to the Report which we made. Another is, that I stand in a somewhat peculiar relation to this question. I have examined it with a good deal of care, and have come to a result not very satisfactory to my own mind, and I am inclined to think in the course I am about to take, I shall produce dissatisfaction to gentlemen upon both sides of the question; for while one side may approve of the views which I present, they will not be satisfied with the vote I shall give; the other side may dislike my views, and yet they will be very likely to be satisfied with my vote. In this situation, I think it is rather desirable, as politicians say, that I should "define my position."

To do this, I shall have to recur to principles, and very likely to facts, which have been brought forward by other members of the Convention in the course of this debate.

I suppose, Mr. President, that by this time we all agree in the source of political power. We all agree that it is possessed by one body of persons, who have the whole power, the whole sovereignty. It is unlimited in their hands, they have no restraint but their own will and their own consciences, there are no checks and balances operating upon their action, there is no possibility nor need of dividing their power at different departments, and stipulating one shall not interfere with the other. The whole people, then, possess the whole power, without any limit or control, except their own will. Yet there is a most powerful restraint operating upon them, which may be relied upon to keep them within proper bounds, and always to induce them to seek and promote the welfare and happiness of the whole, and that is, their own interest. The whole people exercising the whole power, necessarily do it for their own benefit. If they make wise rules and regulations for themselves, they have the whole benefit of them. If they impose burdens, they are the persons who must bear the burdens. If they levy taxes, they must pay them. If they impose restraints and penalties, they are the individuals upon whom those restraints must operate, and upon whom those penalties must fall. They, therefore, have no inducement in the world to impose rules and regulations for their government, or restraints upon their action, which shall not operate for the benefit of the whole.

It is well known that in all modern communities, this body is so large that their power cannot be exercised by the whole body. In all modern times, we know that no community can exist so small that all the individuals composing it shall act together in a body. In ancient times, we are told, that some states or communities were so small that the whole mass of the people came together, and in that manner transacted their public business, and made, and construed, and executed, their laws. But, as I said, in modern governments such a thing is impossible, and the people must therefore act through agencies. That is the only way in which we can exercise the powers of self-government. We must act through such a medium, and the great question is, how these agencies are to be constituted, and how these agents are to be appointed.

But, when you come to the establishment of these agencies, and the appointment of these agents, there arises the expediency, the convenience, and even the necessity, of separating this power into different divisions, to prevent your agents from abusing the trust reposed in them. It is not desirable or safe that the whole authority should be delegated to one agent, or one set of agents, and hence we have that power divided, according to the functions which are to be exercised, and hence we have presented to us the different departments of government, which should forever be kept distinct and separate.

There are some principles in the constitution of these agencies, which in the outset it will be well enough to consider. In the first place, then, these agencies must be constituted, and these agents appointed, by the people, either directly by their own act, or indirectly by other agents which they shall appoint.

There are three or four classes of these agencies.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—MORTON.

[July 14th.

But I consider it proper to remark in the outset, that I consider it a fundamental principle, that in all cases where practicable, the agents of the people should be chosen directly by the people themselves, in order that they may have a more direct control over them, and know better what they do, and how they execute their will.

Under these circumstances, with these general remarks, I proceed to make some application to the subject before us. I have already said, that in the appointment of these agencies, the constituents should keep them as much as possible under their control. I have already said that when we come to parcel out the power to be intrusted to the several agencies which we constitute, we must have some general divisions. In all modern governments there are three departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial.

Almost everywhere, we find, that in appointing legislative agents, the people reserve to themselves the power to act directly. They elect the legislature. There are but very few exceptions to this rule in this country. Indeed, I recollect but one single instance, and that occurs in the government of the United States. The members of the House of Representatives are elected directly by the people, but the members of the Senate of the United States are not elected by the people. They are the agents of the people, but in this case the people do not appoint their agents. They are appointed by the legislatures of the several States. This is, I think, the only exception that exists in this country, to the rule that legislative agents are appointed directly by the people. But, Sir, I have only referred to this as an illustration of the principle which I desire to apply to the subject before us. The senators of the United States in their capacity, whether executive or legislative, are only the agents of the agents of the people. In my opinion this is a defect in the Constitution of the United States. It would be much better, certainly more democratic, were they chosen directly by the people.

But, Sir, passing on in my general view of the subject, we next come to that class of agents who are appointed to execute the laws. I have briefly referred to the agents elected by the people to make the rules and regulations, or laws by which we are to be governed, and the next class of agents are those selected by the people to administer the government, or to carry those laws into execution. These are generally confined to a very few individuals. Generally, if not universally, the executive agents are chosen by the people. Your governor, lieutenant-governor, and some other executive officers, are generally chosen by the people. There are a few exceptions. In some of the States the governor is chosen by the legislature; but I regard those exceptions as exceedingly objectionable.

But, if we refer to the government of the United States, we shall find that all the executive officers there are appointed through agencies. Not one is elected directly by the people. The president and vice-president of the United States are elected by agents of the people, chosen for that purpose, and not by the people themselves. I think it would be much better if they were elected by the direct vote of the people. I regard this as a great defect in the United States Constitution, and one from which I fear dangerous consequences.

Go on a little farther, and you find that all the subordinate officers of the government are removed even one degree farther from the people. I have said that the president is an agent of the agents of the people, and he appoints the subordinate officers, who are removed still one degree farther off from the people. I may be allowed, as I pass on, to remark, that I consider the patronage of the general government as the most dangerous feature connected with it. The distribution of the honors and the emoluments of the government tends to lessen the respect and shake the confidence which we entertain in the general government. It tends more to introduce impropriety, mismanagement, and corruption, in the administration of the government, than the exercise of all its other powers. It is for this reason that I think the officers of the general government should be made as directly responsible to the people as possible. Hence, I would have all officers elected by the people, in every case where it could possibly be done. There is much greater security in having them elected directly by the people, than in having them appointed by any officer, however wise and pure. The appointing officer must, in most cases, receive his knowledge from impure sources.

Instead of deriving information from persons who act upon responsibility, it must necessarily come from active politicians, from violent partisans, from demagogues, and from interested office-seekers—persons not reliable or worthy of confidence. Under these circumstances, it would be most extraordinary if the appointing power did not frequently, if not generally, get imposed upon in the selection of the agents whom it may appoint. I lay it down as a general principle, which I advocate here and everywhere else, that all officers in your general and state governments that can practically be elected by the people, ought to be so elected, and not left to the selection of an agent of the people, whoever he may be. So much in relation to executive officers. I would, however, make one more remark before I proceed, for I feel strongly upon this subject, in relation to the great difficulty under which the appointing power labors, and its extreme liability to imposition and deception. I wish merely to say that the usage of the country has become such, that individuals can always get testimonials or recommendations from almost any source they please. Individuals of respectability will give recommendations to applicants for appointment, for whom they would never think of voting. For these reasons, I advocate the democratic doctrine, that in all cases where it is practicable, all officers should be elected directly by the people.

Having made these general remarks, we come now to the question of the appointment of judicial officers. This is the question now under consideration, and I suppose, in the remarks which I have made thus far, I have differed pretty essentially from many with whom I shall probably vote upon the question before us. As to the selection of judicial officers, that stands somewhat upon different grounds. In the distribution of power to your agents, in fixing upon the mode in which the agents are to be created, we should always have reference to the duties which those agents are to perform. It is obvious to every one, that the duties to be performed by a judicial officer, are essentially different from the duties to be performed by legislative or executive officers, and I believe all individuals in investigating this subject, always make this distinction. If not so, I would inquire why you elect your governor for one year, and propose to elect your judges for ten years. It is because there is a difference in the duties of the different officers, which seem to require a different tenure of office. If there is a difference in their duties, requiring a difference in the tenure of office, it may be that that difference in the performance of duties, may require a difference in the mode of appointment. I propose, with as much fairness as I am capable of, briefly to look at this point. It is said that the people are competent to appoint their own officers, and that they are competent to transact all the other business which comes before them. In this I fully concur. I believe I go farther than most people, in my confidence in the capacity of the people to manage their own affairs. In a late debate, some gentlemen seemed to think that they are not competent to decide when the responsibility of the State shall be granted, when their own money and credit shall be used. In passing, I will merely say, that I think gentlemen altogether misunderstand the people upon that subject, and that it is quite as easy to know when the credit of the State shall be granted, as it is to know who is a fit person for your governor or lieutenant-governor; and they would examine this subject and bring their common sense to the investigation in such a way, as to be as sure of coming to a correct result as your legislative body.

It is no disrespect to an individual, be he who he may, to say to him if he has to get his wife's portrait painted, that he had better go to a painter and get it done, than to take the brush and try to do it himself. If an individual wants to build an edifice, it is a good deal better that he should go to an architect, than to draw the plan himself. It is no disrespect to the people at large, to suppose that there are some things which they cannot directly perform, and which can be better performed indirectly, by selecting some other individuals to do it. Even my friend before me, who appears to be paying so good attention to my remarks, if he wanted to bring a suit upon his hundred dollar note, had better go to a lawyer than undertake to make a writ and carry it through court in order to save the expense. I only make these remarks to show that there is ground for difference in reference to the selection of these officers, and because we have confidence in the people selecting other officers, it does not necessarily follow that it is wise for them to select their judges; and that there is good reason for the ground of my friends, who suppose that it will be very dangerous to the community to have the judges elected, rather than have them appointed by the executive of the Commonwealth. I leave this point without dwelling longer upon it, frankly and candidly declaring my opinion upon it. It is according to the principles and theory of our government, that all officers should be elected by the people, and I am not yet willing to acknowledge, notwithstanding the most elaborate, ingenious and eloquent arguments that we have heard, that the people are not competent to elect all their officers. If persons are not competent to judge who is the best man to carry on a lawsuit, they are pretty sure to get the information, and pretty generally go to the right source for it. I say if the people are not competent, in their various pursuits and occupations, to determine who is the very best man to be the judge of their highest court, I am not willing to admit that they could not acquire the information, and that they would not be as likely to make a judicious selection as any individual whom they might put at the head of the government. In a very large State it might, and probably would be, impossible for the executive officer personally to know the individuals best qualified to fill the judicial offices, and therefore, in such case, it would be safer for the people to select them, than leave their appointment to the executive department. But in a State constituted like this, it is very obvious that any man who is prominent enough to be placed at the head of your government, must necessarily know the personal qualifications of every other man, who was sufficiently prominent to be a judge of either of your higher courts.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—MORTON.

[July 14th.

But to start fair in this investigation. I feel bound to say, following out the theory which I have always advocated, that if we were here to commence anew, if we had no precedent, no government before us, and I was called upon to make a Constitution, I should not hesitate to give to the people the power of selecting their judicial agents for a certain number of years. I feel bound to say that individuals all about me in this building and out, in whose opinion I have the most entire confidence, have a totally different view of this subject. Having defined this doctrine, having settled these principles with perfect frankness just as they exist in my own mind, I now wish to ask your attention a very short time, while I give you the reasons why, under these circumstances, I am opposed to touching the judiciary of the Commonwealth. I must in the outset allude briefly to the ground which has been travelled over. I do not believe that the people sent us here for the purpose of making any changes in the judiciary. This matter has been amply discussed, but still I must advert to it again. As far as I know, no report, no address, no speech, within my knowledge, was ever made drawing in question a necessity for amendments in the judiciary department. It has been stated by one or two gentlemen in the Convention, that this subject was somewhere agitated in the regions where they reside, and I am not at liberty to doubt that they stated it correctly; but my experience is entirely different. I believe there are many individuals here who addressed the community in different parts of the State, who, if they would speak, would say what I know in one or two instances was true, that before they entered the hall where they were to deliver their address, they were cautioned not to touch the judiciary, and, so far as I know, that subject was studiously avoided. I have no doubt that in our general authority to revise the Constitution, is included ample power to revise and amend that part which relates to the courts of the Commonwealth. But I am equally clear that it was not the expectation or wish of the people, that we should touch the judiciary. And whatever may be our legal power, it seems to be unwise and imprudent to act upon subjects which the community never anticipated or desired that we should take up; and which they never would have authorized us to take up, had they supposed that we would have exercised the authority. It has been said by a distinguished gentleman of this Convention, and I have no doubt of the truth of the remark, that if this subject had been brought up before the people for investigation, and if it had been made one of the important points which was to be urged through the Convention, you would never have obtained a Convention at all. It has been said by another distinguished individual here, that the majority in favor of this Convention was obtained with very great labor. As it was, I believe less than one-third of the whole number of the voters of the Commonwealth, voted upon the subject, and I verily believe, that if this had been made one of the test questions, if it had been put forward prominently like the amendment in regard to the House of Representatives, or that changing the basis of the Senate, your small majority of some six thousand, would have been converted into a minority. I would therefore ask gentlemen, if this is a correct view of the subject, whatever may be their opinion as to the expediency of the measure, whether it would be wise and prudent for us to assume this power, and place before the people this most important amendment, alike uncalled for and undesired. Will not the whole tendency of it be to bring disfavor upon our proceedings, and shall we not, if we incorporate this into our amendments, incur the risk of losing all the important provisions which many of us wish to have incorporated into our Constitution? I fear so, Sir, and that in attempting to accomplish too much we shall lose the whole. I have no doubt that we shall submit the several propositions separately, that is, that all the important and distinct propositions shall go to the people, so that they may have an opportunity to vote upon each one by itself and separately from the others. I think they will claim it as due to their independence and as alike required by right and fairness. I fear if we submit the amendments together there will be so many individuals objecting to this and that measure, that when they are added to those who object to the whole, they will form a majority of the whole voters, and thus render nugatory all the labors of this Convention. Should the question of the judiciary be separated from all the other questions, it may still have an unfavorable influence upon them. For it is not to be disguised that every proposition which is received unfavorably, however separated from all the others, will have an unpropitious influence upon the opinions of individuals, in relation to the whole question which is presented to them; and I therefore respectfully urge gentlemen, who think it important to carry out the objects of this Convention and to secure the great number of improvements which they wish to make, to avoid entering upon subjects, which I trust I have satisfied you, we were not expected by the people to agitate when they elected us. This last suggestion has not, perhaps, quite so much weight with me as it seemed to have with some other individuals upon other subjects. I do not consider it decisive, and throw it out as an argumentum ad hominem, it being better adapted to the opinions of other people than our own. Those who think there is danger upon this subject, will consider and hesitate before they submit this proposition to the people, which I think will alarm the fears of many, and awaken the prejudices and preconceived opinions of the whole community.

Before proceeding farther, I beg leave to state distinctly, that there is one ground which I think of itself is fully sufficient to justify my vote against not only the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) but against any interference with the judiciary as it is now constituted. I adhere to the old democratic doctrine of instruction. I believe a representative, if he knows or has reasonable evidence of the will and wishes of his constituents, in all questions of expediency, is bound to conform to them, and fully and faithfully to carry them out. As far as I am able to judge of the opinions of the inhabitants of the town which I in part represent, a large majority of them are against any change in the judiciary. Although they would probably care very little about the limitation of the age of the judges to seventy years, yet I think they would prefer to have this department of the government wholly untouched. The people of my own neighborhood of the Commonwealth, have been brought up to reverence and respect the judiciary everywhere, and they are well satisfied with its operation, and in my opinion, would be unwilling to try any experiment upon it.

Even if the proposed alterations would be an improvement upon the system of the judiciary as it now stands, the time to make them has not yet arrived. Gentlemen should hesitate and proceed with caution. The people are not yet prepared for so important a change. If gentlemen believe it would be beneficial and wish to accomplish it—and I do not mean to say it is not desirable and practicable, but, on the contrary, am inclined to think it will come some time or other—they should prepare their constituents in the first place for the change; they should let light into their minds on the subject, and take away the prejudices and prepossessions which exist. It may be wrong, but I believe that if you make these propositions to the people at large, a great majority will say, touch not the judiciary in any point.

Mr. President, there is one other view which I feel somewhat reluctant to advert to, because it has been presented before better than I can do it: I shall, however, say a few words in regard to it. We came here to remedy defects, we came here to cure existing evils, and not to try improved theories of government, and I do not believe it was expected of us to go beyond the evils from which the people had suffered. Has any evil been experienced from this cause? There is more than one reason why it would not become me to enter into the consideration of the character of the judiciary. That has been done in a way that cannot be surpassed in this Convention or elsewhere. It is enough for me to say that the character of the judiciary stands well, that the people have confidence in it, that so far as I can learn or know, no complaint is made by the people. I do not mean to say that a disappointed suitor has not now and then been dissatisfied with the court, and his advocate, because his case was not got forward so soon, or tried so successfully, as he wished; or that an unsuccessful advocate may not have scolded against the judge or jury, because the verdict in a cause, or the final decision of the case, has gone against him; but I do mean to say that there has not been, to any considerable extent, any complaint of the judiciary of the Commonwealth. Under these circumstances, I would beg leave to inquire why we should take this step—why we should assume a power which it was not intended we should exercise—why we should hazard the other important measures which we wish to have secured?

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—MORTON.

[July 14th.

This may be important, it is important, though I believe much less so than many other subjects. But if we have experienced no evil from the judiciary as it exists, is there any danger that we shall for the few years to come; if we have suffered no evil in time past, with the same officers which we propose still to retain—for I suppose gentlemen do not intend to touch the present incumbents—is there any danger that we shall suffer any great evil in the future? Is it unreasonable or improper to delay this matter, and let these debates go out before the people, and let them mature their judgment upon the subject? We may make a false step, possibly, if we now attempt to make a change; we are safe as we are, why run the risk? Why make an experiment?

But the last word brings me to another consideration, which I wish to present. In the history of our country, and in the history of the country from which we emigrated, the judiciary has been respected for ages. The same system, substantially, has been continued. It doubtless has some imperfections, but, perhaps it approaches as near perfection as can be expected in any human tribunal or any human work. Changes have been going on recently in the appointment of officers to execute this power; important changes have taken place in the public mind, in relation to this subject. Many States, in consequence of these changes, have made important alterations in the form of their governments. And not a few States have introduced the practice of electing their judges. We have the peculiar good fortune to be so placed that we can have the full benefit of these experiments in other States testing these principles, and without running any risk. Other States are trying the experiment, and whether the change will work well or ill in all cases, is a matter of considerable doubt. I have taken a good deal of pains to get information on the subject, and I find the information, all coming from sources highly respectable, as diverse as the antipodes. On the one side, men tell us it works well, perfectly well, that it is a good deal better than the old system. This is said by men whose statements and judgments you cannot well hesitate to receive. While, on the other hand, men equally respectable, and having an equal opportunity to judge, say that it is working evil, that it produces most pernicious results. Thus we have an opportunity, if we will avail ourselves of it, of determining for ourselves, without suffering from any actual experiment, how this matter does operate. If the result prove favorable, we shall have an opportunity, before long, to adopt it ourselves; because, in this changing age, in this age of progress and improvement, there is no doubt you will have Convention after Convention, to revise the Constitution. Indeed, I believe we have already adopted a rule to have a Convention held periodically for this purpose. If that be so, we can have an opportunity at an early period, and that without risk of suffering, to see this experiment tried, and if it works well, we can adopt it, and have the full benefit of it.

In relation to most of the States, the balance of my information is, that it works pretty well. In some States its operation is said to be pernicious, while in other States I have been informed from reliable sources, that it works remarkably well. I suppose it depends very much on the notions and habits of the people where it is adopted. After all, it depends almost as much on the character and genius of the people, as upon any constitutional rule. For we have an example of the same principle applied to a good Yankee people. The State of Vermont elects its judges every year, and we all know they have a respectable court, and perhaps quite as good as that of any State of its size. But the information I have received from various sources, is entirely opposite in some cases. I confess, Sir, that although I have had information very strong of an opposite character, that what I have seen of the working of the judiciary in New York, has impressed my mind favorably. Two instances have occurred there recently, which I will mention with pride, whether it may operate in favor of my argument or against. Two instances have recently occurred, where you have seen the independence of the judiciary tested and sustained, as nobly as it ever was on the face of the earth. I have seen a court, elected by the people, set aside a deliberate act of the legislature of New York, as unconstitutional; a degree of independence which you do not often see in the judiciary anywhere. That is entitled to my highest respect, and gives me great confidence in that court. It certainly required firmness and independence to stand up against a majority in the State and a majority in the legislature, where cupidity itself was enlisted to sustain the act of the legislature, and to pronounce an act of the legislative department unconstitutional and void.

Another instance has more recently occurred, which has commanded my confidence and respect. I have seen the judges in the city of New York, just elected by the people, take a stand against the city government of the city of New York with a degree of firmness unsurpassed by any tribunal in the world. I have seen them enforce their decrees against the city government of New York, and taking some of the aldermen of that empire city, with its half million inhabitants, conduct them to jail because they had the hardihood to resist the decree of the court, and set at defiance the judicial power. Mr. President, I have one or two remarks more which I should be glad to make. We come here—I now speak of the majority—as reformers, all sincere and ardent in our desire to accomplish some good in the old Bay State, to make some improvement in our Constitution. We all desire to do that. The people have sent us here to do it. They have given us an overwhelming majority in this body. We must take care, my friends, that we do not abuse this trust which they have reposed in us. We have been some time from the people. We ourselves are a large body; we have generated to some extent a kind of public opinion, which prevails here; and I know no people more likely to be mistaken about the public opinion than a set of legislators or members of a Convention, who have been acting together for some time. We gradually grow warm; we are ardent and sincere; we want to do a great deal of good, and we can scarcely help feeling and believing, as we go along, that the whole world is going along with us. It behooves us to be cautious; it behooves all reformers to be wise and to be prudent, to take heed to their steps before it is too late. It is a great deal better to accomplish something surely and certainly, than to run a great risk to accomplish much more, and thereby endanger the whole. We now propose to try an experiment, to introduce a new mode of appointing our judges. There is some risk in it; and we ought to see to it before we take that step, so important to every individual in the community, that we can try the experiment fairly and with a reasonable prospect of success. Now, the beauty and utility of a court depends, to a considerable extent, on the kind regard, and love, and confidence of the community. It is important not only that the court should do right, not only that it should make wise and righteous decisions, but, in order to produce the best effect on the community, it is necessary that it should have the confidence of that community. And even when individuals go away scolding from the court, they should still have the feeling which my friend for Manchester (Mr. Dana) had when he lost a most darling case, but notwithstanding that, had a confidence that the judge who sat upon the bench was independent and impartial.

Now, if we adopt this amendment, and the people ratify, shall we have a chance to try the experiment fairly? Sir, you must go to the people with nearly one-half, certainly more than one-third of the people and almost all the bar opposed to you, and who will be determined to throw all the obstacles they possibly can in the way of the reform which you propose, and although a majority may desire to sustain it, yet if the bar and the community, to any considerable extent, are predetermined to create all the embarrassments in their power, will the experiment have a fair trial? will there not be danger that the system will be exhibited in an unfavorable aspect? There will be other causes of dissatisfaction, operating upon some minds, and if we add this, which certainly will be disapproved by some, to the others, may we not produce a reaction which will cause a failure of the whole of our work?

Mr. President, I have now presented, as well as I am able, the views which I desired to present for your consideration. I have done it in sincerity and fairness, and stated to you the conclusions to which I have come, and the reasons which induced me to come to them. I now leave it, of course, for the decision of the Convention. I have no doubt that every member of it has investigated the subject with the same desire to do right that I have felt, and perhaps will come to a great deal more correct conclusion. But, Sir, let us remember that this is a question of considerable importance, although I do not attach so much to it as some of my friends do. Let us recollect that we have an opportunity to try this experiment in other hands, under the most favorable circumstances. Let us recollect that we are situated in a State where our executive, who has the appointment, can look over the whole of our little territory and see every man's head in it, and must be presumed to know personally every man fit to be a judge of either of our higher courts; and let us have the confidence to suppose that any individual who will be put into that place will make a judicious selection. The selection may be no better, perhaps not so good, as the people would make, but if it is as good, or nearly as good, will it not be safer to leave it there and try it until we can see whether our new system works well elsewhere? But, I declare, that when there is no existing evil or abuse which needs a remedy, when there is no necessity to make an experiment, under existing circumstances, I choose to wait and see how the system works in other places, and rely upon the wisdom of the court, and upon that of the executive, who is in a position to gain all the information he may need to enable him to fill up such vacancies as may occur. For these reasons, I feel constrained to vote against every proposition which is about to touch the judiciary of the Commonwealth.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HALLETT—BUTLER.

[July 14th.

Mr. HALLETT. There are seven minutes left before the question must be taken, and I desire to occupy them for the simple purpose of giving my testimony, as a member of the bar, against what I regard as an anomaly in our institutions,—a life tenure of office to any subject of the Commonwealth. While, at the same time, I have expressed myself here, and continue to express myself, in favor of leaving the present mode of judicial appointments as it stands in the Constitution, because it is not now expedient to change it, and also because it being done by the annual agents of the people it is only one remove from the mode of appointment by the people themselves; yet I desire to say, as a member of the bar, and one who has had some little experience in this matter of a judiciary independent of the people, that, in my judgment, if there is any one correction important to be infused into the fundamental law of this Commonwealth, in order to make it republican, in order to make it harmonious with all other institutions and agencies where the people govern, and in order to dispense justice impartially and courteously, as well as wisely, it is that you should limit the life tenure of your judges.

Sir, the eloquent gentleman who addressed us this morning, (Mr. Choate,) and with whom I agree on the subject of the appointment, and disagree on the subject of the tenure,—referred us, as if it were an authority, to the opinions of Alexander Hamilton, which I find, on examination, are given in the Federalist, No. 78, where, in 1788, he advocated the life tenure of the judges of the United States Court. I do not accept Mr. Hamilton as an authority on republican government, and yet it may be well to recollect that afterwards, in 1804, the same Alexander Hamilton, as an advocate, defended Harry Crosswell in a prosecution of "The People vs. Crosswell," for a libel upon Thomas Jefferson, and maintained the right to give the truth in justification. And it was on that occasion that Alexander Hamilton said, very differently from what he said in the "Federalist," that it was only by the abuse of the forms of justice that this people could ever be enslaved. "An army," said he, "can never destroy our liberty. It is to be subverted only by a pretence of adhering to all the forms of law, and yet breaking down the substance of our liberties."

And no judiciary could ever usurp arbitrary power, or break down our liberties by subverting laws and Constitution, through false interpretations, except by judges holding office for life, irresponsible to the people.

That was Mr. Hamilton's sound conviction and after-thought, when he was practising at the bar; and that is the conviction very often wonderfully enforced—much oftener than openly expressed—on the minds of members of the bar when engaged in practise before our courts. That eminent counsellor may not have felt this so much as others have, and yet I think he has felt it.

On another point, the learned gentleman inquired if there was any want of integrity in the judges? Let me answer that at once. No, Sir. There is no doubt about the integrity of the present judges. But the question is not present personal character, but the principle of life tenure in a democratic government.

Again, the gentleman asks, Is there any doubt about their ability? No, there is no doubt of that, as a general proposition. But neither honesty nor ability entitle men to hold office for life.

I wanted to ask him one other thing, which he omitted; is there courtesy in the judges? and the gentleman might have answered that, from observation, at least, if not experience. Now, Sir, I say forcibly, I want to give to our judiciary the grace of courtesy; I want not only to have the fortiter in re, but I also want the suaviter in modo; and where are you to get it? Only in the creation of a future bench without a life tenure, and whose periodical reappointment shall lie in the power of the people.

Sir, when I was a student at law, I remember to have heard said what I have never forgotten, by a very eminent professor of that day, Mr. Ashmun, one of the first professors of the Law School at Cambridge, when he had been contemplating some of these evils that grow out of an irresponsible judiciary—"give me" said he, "a court for the correction of errors, if it be but a body of selectmen!" And so say I; give me accountability; give me some body behind your judges, if it be but a town council or a board of selectmen, who can somewhere at sometime or other say that the hour of accountability has come. The gentleman cited Hamilton for life tenure. I prefer the opinion of Thomas Jefferson, who, in his letter to Mr. Kircheval, July 12, 1812, upon the subject of an independent judiciary, in answer to one of these old, worn out arguments about the appointment of judges for life, in England, to make them independent of the crown, said that this was an argument that an American lawyer should never utter in an American assembly; because, the question of dependence was entirely different where the appointing and removing power was in the hands of an hereditary executive, like a king,—then it was a great point gained to have the office continue for life, "but in a government founded on the public will, this principle [of life tenure] operates in an opposite direction, against that will."

The reason changes, for, says he, while in England they make the judges independent of the king, here by appointing them during life "you make the judges dependent on none but themselves!" There is the difference, Mr. President. Our judges with life tenures are dependent upon nobody but themselves; and that enables them to be independent of what? Not only independent of the people, but independent of good manners; independent, if they choose to be, of their own consciences and convictions; independent of any errors which they may make in judgment; independent of the grossest partiality, in fact of everything but crime, while they may be dependent upon, and may, unconsciously and honestly yield to the political and social influences that surround them—these cliques, these clubs, those circles that are drawn around them as men and politicians before they are judges, and under the influence of which they go upon the bench. They may be perfectly honest, I have no doubt of that, and yet they are imbued with the atmosphere of local and social sentiment, and interest, and they find it, the best and purest of them, in giving opinions upon religious freedom and similar matters, very much as the distinguished jurist who preceded me in this argument, (Judge Morton,) found it, when he was on the bench. I refer to a grave question of religious freedom,* wherein that local and social influence was so strong upon him that he found himself constrained, although he gave his opinion right, to give his judgment wrong; and therefore, and for all that I have said, and much more I might say, give me accountability in the judges by at least periodical returns to private life.

Mr. Hallett here yielded the floor at the request of Mr. MORTON, of Taunton, who moved that the vote be reconsidered by which the hour of four o'clock was assigned for taking the question, and that it be fixed at ten o'clock to-morrow morning, remarking that, as was apt to be the case, he had consumed so much time himself, that he had deprived others who wished to be heard, of an opportunity to speak.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I would inquire if the gentleman from Taunton is one of those who voted with the majority.

The PRESIDENT. The rules of this Convention do not require that. The hour has arrived, at which the Convention has ordered the question to be taken.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that the motion to reconsider will not prevail. This matter has another stage to pass through, and while it is not so important that we should have farther discussion now, I think it is important, for various reasons that I might suggest, that we should come to a vote. At the present time I think the most important thing which this Convention can do is to vote and go home.

Mr. HALLETT. I trust that the Convention will not, from any considerations personal to myself, reconsider this motion. I should much rather prefer that they would bring this matter to a close now, than that they should, out of mere courtesy to me, extend the time beyond what is necessary in order that the vote may be taken understandingly.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the order, and it was not agreed to.

The Convention proceeded to vote upon the pending question.

The question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Fall River, to the amendment reported from the Committee, the yeas and nays were taken, with the following result—yeas, 101; nays, 226:—

YEAS.

Adams, Shubael P.	Buck, Asahel
Allen, James B.	Burlingame, Anson
Allis, Josiah	Butler, Benjamin F.
Alvord, D. W.	Case, Isaac
Baker, Hillel	Chapin, Daniel E.
Bancroft, Alpheus	Childs, Josiah
Bates, Eliakim A.	Clarke, Alpheus B.
Bates, Moses, Jr.	Clark, Henry
Bigelow, Edward B.	Cleaverly, William
Bird, Francis W.	Cole, Sumner
Bradford, William J. A.	Crane, George B.
Breed, Hiram N.	Cushman, Henry W.
Brown, Hammond	Cushman, Thomas
Brownell, Frederick	Davis, Ebenezer
Brownell, Joseph	Davis, Isaac
Bryant, Patrick	Day, Gilman

*Commonwealth vs. Kneeland, 20 Pickering, 206.

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY.—HALLETT—BUTLER—BATES—BIRD—COLE.

[July 14th.

Dean, Silas
Duncan, Samuel
Fisk, Lyman
Fitch, Ezekiel W.
Foster, Abram
French, Charles A.
French, Rodney
French, Samuel
Frothingham, R'd, Jr.
Gooding, Leonard
Griswold, Josiah W.
Griswold, Whiting
Hapgood, Lyman W.
Hawkes, Stephen E.
Holder, Nathaniel
Hood, George
Hooper, Foster
Hoyt, Henry K.
Jacobs, John
Kingman, Joseph
Knowlton, J. S. C.
Knowlton, William H.
Knox, Albert
Lawrence, Luther
Lawton, Job G., Jr.
Leland, Alden
Mason, Charles
Merritt, Simeon
Morss, Joseph B.
Morton, William S.
Nayson, Jonathan
Nichols, William
Norton, Alfred
Nute, Andrew T.
Orne, Benjamin S.

NAYS.

Abbott, Josiah G.
Adams, Benjamin P.
Aldrich, P. Emory
Allen, Joel C.
Alley, John B.
Andrews, Robert
Appleton, William
Aspinwall, William
Atwood, David C.
Austin, George
Ayres, Samuel
Ballard, Alvah
Barrows, Joseph
Beal, John
Bennett, William, Jr.
Bishop, Henry W.
Blagden, George W.
Bliss, Gad O.
Bliss, William C.
Booth, William S.
Boutwell, George S.
Boutwell, Sewell
Bradbury, Ebenezer
Braman, Milton P.
Brewster, Osmyn
Brinley, Francis
Briggs, George N.
Brown, Alpheus R.
Brown, Artemas
Bullock, Rufus
Bumpus, Cephas C.
Cady, Henry
Carter, Timothy W.
Caruthers, William
Chandler, Amariah
Chapin, Chester W.
Choate, Rufus
Churchill, J. McKean
Clark, Ransom
Coggin, Jacob
Cogswell, Nathaniel
Cole, Lansing J.
Conkey, Ichamar
Cook, Charles E.
Coolidge, Henry F.
Copeland, Benjamin F.
Crittenden, Simeon
Crockett, George W.
Cross, Joseph W.

Osgood, Charles
Parris, Jonathan
Partridge, John
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Noah C.
Phelps, Charles
Pool, James M.
Rawson, Silas
Richardson, Daniel
Rogers, John
Royce, James C.
Sanderson, Chester
Simmons, Perez
Simonds, John W.
Sprague, Melzar
Spoonier, Samuel W.
Stacy, Eben H.
Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Sumner, Charles
Taft, Arnold
Thayer, Willard, 2d
Tilton, Abraham
Upham, Charles W.
Weston, Gershom B.
White, George
Whitney, Daniel S.
Whitney, James S.
Wilbur, Joseph
Williams, J. B.
Wilson, Willard
Wood, Charles C.
Wood, Otis
Wood, William H.
Wright, Ezekiel

Hammond, A. B.
Hapgood, Seth
Harmon, Phineas
Haskins, William
Hathaway, Elanathan P.
Hayden, Isaac
Hayward, George
Heard, Charles
Heath, Ezra, 2d
Henry, Samuel
Hersey, Henry
Hewes, James
Hewes, William H.
Hillard, George S.
Hinsdale, William
Hobart, Aaron
Hobbs, Edwin
Howard, Martin
Hubbard, William J.
Hunt, William
Huntington, Asahel
Hurlbut, Samuel A.
Hurlbut, Moses C.
James, William
Jenkins, John
Johnson, John
Kellogg, Giles C.
Kendall, Isaac
Kimball, Joseph
Kinsman, Henry W.
Knight, Hiram
Knight, Jefferson
Knight, Joseph
Knowlton, Charles L.
Kuhn, George H.
Ladd, Gardner P.
Ladd, John S.
Lincoln, Abishai
Lincoln, Fred. W., Jr.
Littlefield, Tristram
Livermore, Isaac
Lothrop, Samuel K.
Loud, Samuel P.
Lowell, John A.
Marble, William P.
Marcy, Laban
Marvin, Abijah P.
Marvin, Theophilus R.
Miller, Seth, Jr.
Moore, James M.
Morey, George
Morton, Elbridge G.
Morton, Marcus
Morton, Marcus, Jr.
Newman, Charles
Noyes, Daniel
Ober, Joseph E.
Oliver, Henry K.
Orcutt, Nathan
Paige, James W.
Paine, Benjamin
Paine, Henry
Parker, Adolphus G.
Parker, Joel

ABSENT.

Abbott, Alfred A.
Allen, Charles
Allen, Parsons
Ball, George S.
Banks, Nathaniel P., Jr.
Bartlett, Russel
Bartlett, Sidney
Barrett, Marcus
Beach, Erasmus D.
Beebe, James M.
Bell, Luther V.
Bennett, Zephaniah
Bigelow, Jacob
Bronson, Asa
Brown, Adolphus F.
Brown, Hiram C.
Bullen, Amos H.
Chapin, Henry
Clark, Salah
Clarke, Stillman
Cressy, Oliver S.
Crosby, Leander
Crowell, Seth
Davis, Robert T.
Dawes, Henry L.
DeWitt, Alexander
Dorman, Moses
Durgin, John M.
Easton, James, 2d
Eaton, Calvin D.
Gardner, Henry J.
Gooch, Daniel W.
Gould, Robert
Goulding, Jason
Greene, William B.
Haskell, George
Heywood, Levi
Hobart, Henry
Hopkinson, Thomas
Houghton, Samuel

Howland, Abraham H.
Hunt, Charles E.
Huntington, Charles P.
Huntington, George H.
Hyde, Benjamin D.
Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
Jackson, Samuel
Jenks, Samuel H.
Kellogg, Martin R.
Keyes, Edward L.
Langdon, Wilber C.
Little, Otis
Loomis, E. Justin
Lord, Otis P.
Meador, Reuben
Mixer, Samuel
Monroe, James L.
Nash, Hiram
Packer, E. Wing
Park, John G.
Parker, Samuel D.
Payson, Thomas E.
Peabody, George
Perkins, Jonathan C.
Pierce, Henry
Read, James

Absent and not voting, 91.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham, moved to amend by striking out the words, "but in no case to continue in office after attaining seventy years of age."

The question was taken, and upon a division, there were ayes, 148; nays, 98.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, moved to amend by striking out "ten" and inserting "seven." The question was taken, and by ayes 88, noes 180, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth, moved to amend by striking out the following words: "Said justices to be ineligible to reappointment."

The amendment did not prevail.

The question recurred upon concurring in the amendment reported by the Committee.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, moved that when the question was taken upon the amendment, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion was agreed to, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire, moved to amend by adding, after the word "appointed," the words "by the governor of the Commonwealth by and with the concurrence of the Senate."

The amendment did not prevail.

The question being on concurring in the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas, 158; nays, 160—as follows:—

YEAS.

Abbott, Josiah G.
Adams, Benjamin P.
Adams, Shubael P.
Allen, Charles
Allen, James B.
Alley, John B.
Allis, Josiah
Austin, George
Bancroft, Alpheus
Bates, Eliakim A.
Bates, Moses, Jr.
Beal, John
Bennett, William, Jr.
Bigelow, Edward B.
Bird, Francis W.
Bishop, Henry W.
Booth, William S.
Boutwell, George S.
Boutwell, Sewell
Bradbury, Ebenezer
Bradford, William J. A.
Brown, Alpheus R.
Brown, Artemas
Brown, Hammond
Brownell, Joseph
Bryant, Patrick
Buck, Asahel
Case, Isaac

Thursday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — ALLEY.

[July 14th.

Chapin, Daniel E.
Childs, Josiah
Clark, Henry
Clark, Ransom
Clarke, Alpheus B.
Cleverly, William
Cooledge, Henry F.
Crane, George B.
Cross, Joseph W.
Cushman, Henry W.
Cushman, Thomas
Davis, Charles G.
Davis, Ebenezer
Davis, Isaac
Day, Gilman
Dean, Silas
Deming, Elijah S.
Denton, Augustus
Duncan, Samuel
Dunham, Bradish
Earle, John M.
Easland, Peter
Edwards, Elisha
Ely, Joseph M.
Fay, Sullivan
Fellows, James K.
Fisk, Lyman
Fitch, Ezekiel W.
Foster, Abram
Fowle, Samuel
Freeman, James M.
French, Rodney
French, Samuel
Frothingham, R., Jr.
Giles, Charles G.
Giles, Joel
Graves, John W.
Green, Jabez
Griswold, Josiah W.
Griswold, Whiting
Hadley, Samuel P.
Hallett, B. F.
Happgood, Lyman W.
Happgood, Seth
Haskins, William
Hathaway, Elvathan P.
Hayden, Isaac
Heath, Ezra, 2d
Hewes, William H.
Howard, Martin
Hoyt, Henry K.
Hurlbut, Moses C.
Kimball, Joseph
Kingman, Joseph
Knight, Hiram
Knight, Jefferson
Knowlton, William H.
Knox, Albert
Ladd, Gardner P.
Lawrence, Luther
Lawton, Job G., Jr.
Leland, Alden
Lincoln, Abishai
Littlefield, Tristram
Marble, William P.

NAYS.

Aldrich, P. Emory
Allen, Joel C.
Alvord, D. W.
Andrews, Robert
Appleton, William
Aspinwall, William
Ayres, Samuel
Baker, Hillel
Ballard, Alvah
Barrows, Joseph
Barrett, Marcus
Blagden, George W.
Bliss, Gad O.
Bliss, William C.
Braman, Milton P.
Breed, Hiram N.
Brewster, Osmyn
Brinley, Francis
Briggs, George N.

Marcy, Laban
Marvin, Abijah P.
Mason, Charles
Merritt, Simeon
Moore, James M.
Morton, Elbridge G.
Morton, Marcus, Jr.
Morton, William S.
Nash, Hiram
Newman, Charles
Nichols, William
Norton, Alfred
Ober, Joseph E.
Orne, Benjamin S.
Osgood, Charles
Paine, Benjamin
Paine, Henry
Parsons, Samuel C.
Partridge, John
Penniman, John
Perkins, Noah C.
Phelps, Charles
Phinney, Silvanus B.
Pool, James M.
Rawson, Silas
Rice, David
Richardson, Daniel
Richardson, Nathan
Richardson, Samuel H.
Ross, David S.
Royce, James C.
Sanderson, Amasa
Sanderson, Chester
Sherril, John
Simonds, John W.
Smith, Matthew
Stacy, Eben H.
Stevens, Granville
Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Stevens, William
Stiles, Gideon
Sumner, Charles
Taft, Arnold
Thayer, Joseph
Thayer, Willard, 2d
Tilton, Horatio W.
Turner, David P.
Viles, Joel
Vinton, George A.
Wallis, Freeland
Walker, Amasa
Ward, Andrew H.
Warner, Marshal
Warner, Samuel, Jr.
Waters, Asa H.
Weston, Gershom, B.
White, George
Wilbur, Joseph
Wilson, Henry
Wilson, Willard
Winslow, Levi M.
Wood, Charles C.
Wood, Otis
Wood, William H.

Crittenden, Simeon
Crockett, George W.
Crowninshield, F. B.
Cummings, Joseph
Curtis, Wilber
Dana, Richard H., Jr.
Davis, John
Davis, Solomon
Dehon, William
Denison, Hiram S.
Doane, James C.
Eames, Philip
Eaton, Lilley
Edwards, Samuel
Ely, Homer
Eustis, William T.
Farwell, A. G.
Fiske, Emory
Foster, Aaron
Fowler, Samuel P.
French, Charles A.
French, Charles H.
Gale, Luther
Gates, Elbridge
Gilbert, Wanton C.
Gilbert, Washington
Goulding, Dalton
Gray, John C.
Greenleaf, Simon
Hale, Artemas
Hale, Nathan
Hammond, A. B.
Harmon, Phineas
Hawkes, Stephen E.
Hayward, George
Heard, Charles
Henry, Samuel
Hersey, Henry
Hewes, James
Hillard, George S.
Hinsdale, William
Hobbs, Edwin
Holder, Nathaniel
Hood, George
Hubbard, William J.
Hunt, William
Huntington, Asahel
Hurlburt, Samuel A.
James, William
Jenkins, John
Johnson, John
Kellogg, Giles C.
Kendall, Isaac
Kinsman, Henry W.
Knight, Joseph
Knowlton, Charles L.
Knowlton, J. S. C.
Kuhn, George H.
Ladd, John S.
Lincoln, F. W., Jr.
Livermore, Isaac

ABSENT.

Abbott, Alfred A.
Allen, Parsons
Atwood, David C.
Ball, George S.
Banks, Nath'l P., Jr.
Bartlett, Russel
Bartlett, Sidney
Beach, Erasmus D.
Beebe, James M.
Bell, Luther V.
Bennett, Zephaniah
Bigelow, Jacob
Bronson, Asa
Brown, Adolphus F.
Brown, Hiram C.
Bullen, Amos H.
Chapin, Henry
Clark, Salah
Clarke, Stillman
Cressy, Oliver S.
Crosby, Leander
Crowell, Seth
Cutler, Simeon N.

Lord, Otis P.
Lothrop, Samuel K.
Loud, Samuel P.
Lowell, John A.
Marvin, Theophilus R.
Miller, Seth, Jr.
Morey, George
Morss, Joseph B.
Morton, Marcus
Nayson, Jonathan
Noyes, Daniel
Nute, Andrew T.
Oliver, Henry K.
Orcutt, Nathan
Paige, James W.
Parker, Adolphus G.
Parker, Joel
Parsons, Thomas A.
Peabody, Nathaniel
Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
Perkins, Jesse
Plunkett, William C.
Pomroy, Jeremiah
Preston, Jonathan
Prince, F. O.
Putnam, George
Putnam, John A.
Rantoul, Robert
Reed, Sampson
Rockwood, Joseph M.
Rogers, John
Sargent, John
Schouler, William
Sikes, Chester
Sleeper, John S.
Sprague, Melzar
Stevens, Charles G.
Storror, Charles S.
Taylor, Ralph
Tileston, Edmund P.
Turner, David
Tyler, William
Upham, Charles W.
Upton, George B.
Walcott, Samuel B.
Wales, Bradford L.
Walker, Samuel
Weeks, Cyrus
Wetmore, Thomas
Wheeler, William F.
White, Benjamin
Whitney, James S.
Wilder, Joel
Wilkins, John H.
Wilkinson, Ezra
Williams, J. B.
Wilson, Milo
Winn, Jonathan B.
Woods, Josiah B.
Wright, Ezekiel

Hunt, Charles E.
Huntington, Charles P.
Huntington, George H.
Hyde, Benjamin D.
Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
Jackson, Samuel
Jacobs, John
Jenks, Samuel H.
Kellogg, Martin R.
Keyes, Edward L.
Langdon, Wilber C.
Little, Otis
Loomis, E. Justin
Meador, Reuben
Mixer, Samuel
Monroe, James L.
Packer, E. Wing
Park, John G.
Parker, Samuel D.
Parris, Jonathan
Payson, Thomas E.
Peabody, George
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Jonathan C.
Pierce, Henry
Powers, Peter
Read, James
Richards, Luther

Absent and not voting, 102.

So the Report of the Committee was concurred in and the resolves were ordered to a second reading.

Personal Explanation.

Mr. ALLEY, of Lynn. I rise, Sir, for the purpose of asking the indulgence of the Convention to make a personal explanation.

The PRESIDENT. If no objection be made, the gentleman will be at liberty to proceed.

The Chair understands that no objection is made.

Mr. ALLEY, of Lynn. Mr. President, it was my purpose to have remained silent in relation to the unprovoked attack upon me, which was made the other day by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hillard). I have always recognized the wisdom of the advice of Chesterfield to his son: "That he should never notice an insult; for no gentleman will insult you, and no one else can." I have been informed that it was the purpose, or desire, of that gentleman, to have the remarks which he made the other day suppressed from the records; but I notice in one of the daily papers of this morning, a full report of that gentleman's speech, revised and corrected, I presume, by himself, in which occurs this language:—

"The gentleman from Lynn, (Mr. Alley), the other day, upon this text, discharged at me a small pellet of something that tried to be sarcasm, but could not. The report of his pop-gun was so faint that I do not think it was heard by half the Convention. Indeed, nothing but a respect for the decorum of the place, prevented me from calling out encore! I thought it selfish to be amused by an exhibition in which so few participated."

Mr. President: In view of this publication, and finding that some misapprehension exists with regard to the occasion of that attack, I feel it is due to myself to say a few words of explanation. In the first place, I would remark, that I was not present when the attack was made. In what I have to say, my purpose is not to return railing for railing, for I speak more in sorrow than in anger. Permit me to say, that I have been associated in legislative halls and deliberative as-

Thursday,]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION. — ALLEY — HILLARD.

[July 14th.]

semblies, in the counting-room and in the workshop, with men of every degree, calling, and profession, and this is the first time in my life that I have ever been so grossly assailed. It is inexplicable to me why I should be attacked by one who has occupied so high a position in social and literary life—an individual some ten years my senior—one to whom I never spoke in my life but once, and then only a few words upon matters of business. When I consider, Sir, that the attack was made upon one whom the gentleman evidently supposed had not the power of repelling it, I have no language adequate to the expression of the sentiments of my heart. I have made no extended remarks in this Convention but once, and then only in obedience to the call of duty.

In attempting to speak before this Convention under any circumstances, I feel very much, as I doubt not many others do in this body, who are, like me, men of acts rather than of words—that it is complete martyrdom. A few days after I had the honor to address the Convention, the gentleman from Cambridge, misapprehending my remarks, ascribed to me sentiments which I did not utter, and it was only for the purpose of putting myself right upon the record, that I occupied just two minutes, as appears by the record of the chairman at the time, in making an explanation of my views. Upon that occasion, I simply alluded, without a word of commentary, to the famous declaration of the gentleman from Boston, that “we should be careful how we strike the hand that feeds us.” This, Sir, was the whole length and breadth of my offending; and for this I have been assailed with a contempt of manner and appearance of malignity, almost without parallel in the history of legislative bodies.

The gentleman complains most bitterly that he was misapprehended and misrepresented; but I submit, Sir, whether the language of the gentleman is not justly susceptible of such a construction. When I heard the gentleman make the remark, I said to a friend near me, that I was sorry to hear him make it, and that I did not believe that he meant it. I also added, that he would never hear the last of it; and, Sir, I think my prediction is likely to be fulfilled. I have heard many of that gentleman’s political friends say that they so understood it; and that, furthermore, they believed that he had thus unwittingly revealed the real sentiments of his heart. Now, Sir, if members of that gentleman’s political party say that the language was clearly susceptible of such a construction, certainly he cannot expect his political opponents to be any more charitable. But permit me to say, that I am unwilling to believe that the gentleman intended to make an exhibition of such base servility as those remarks would seem to indicate. I advise him, however, for the future, instead of abusing others, for which his own imprudence is justly responsible, to try and learn wisdom from experience.

That gentleman spoke of me in terms of contemptuous disparagement. Sir, I lay no claim to the graces of oratory, but I was sent here by as good a constituency as those whom that gentleman represents. I came here for the purpose of endeavoring to discharge my duty—not as brilliantly, but as faithfully, and perhaps, as usefully as some of those who belong to the class whom that gentleman represents; and I certainly did not expect to be assailed with such severity of criticism, representing, as I do, so modest a class as the practical business men of the community. I have lived long enough to value men for their deeds, rather than for their words. I am too much occupied with the cares and perplexities of other and more congenial avocations, to spend a great deal of time in preparing speeches. That gentleman has lived long enough, and has studied history often enough, to know that great results are seldom achieved by mere rhetoricians. Edmund Burke once said that the graces of oratory and solidity of judgment are seldom combined in the same individual. Another great writer has said: “Give me, to found an empire, or raise a nation, the farmers, the sailors, and the mechanics, for when grand objects are to be attained, how real and how solid such men appear in the presence of mere scholars and talkers.”

A distinguished gentleman once said to me—an individual of great attainments, and an acquaintance of the gentleman from Boston—“How astonishing it is that some men talk so well when they have so little practical sense;” and, said he, “how much knowledge some people have, with very little wisdom!” Far be it from me to disparage literary attainments; no man values mental culture more than I do. Heaven knows how gladly I would part with pecuniary possessions for a little, even, of that culture which is the pride and boast of the gentleman from Boston. But, Sir, if I could have it all, if its possession involved the sacrifice of judgment and common sense, I should say it was not worth having. Sir, I prize but little mere talking men. As an eminent poet says—one whom the gentleman himself is so fond of quoting:—

“How fluent nonsense trickles from his tongue.”

I have said thus much, Mr. President, because I believed that the occasion demanded it; and if the gentleman from Boston is satisfied to have his unprovoked attack upon me go down to posterity without a single word of explanation or apology, upon the enduring records of this Convention, so let it be—I am content.

MR. HILLARD, of Boston. The gentleman from Lynn has come here with an elaborate speech, studiously prepared, stuffed with quotations, and committed to memory, the whole purport of which is a glorification of himself and disparagement of me,—a glorification of men of judgment, men of common sense, and men of practical skill, and a disparagement of men endowed with those scholarly qualities which he supposes I am endowed with. That part of his remarks, Mr. President, I shall not reply to. I doubt if there is any gentleman in this Convention or out of it who has a lower estimate of my powers or my attainments, than I have myself. On that side, at least, the gentleman may be assured that I am not vulnerable.

I never, to my recollection, saw the gentleman from Lynn, until I met him in this Convention, and certainly never in any way gave him any provocation. The other day, when he was addressing the Convention upon some matter connected with the question of representation, I was listening to him with attention, for his manner was becoming and gentlemanly. As he had spoken but seldom, I listened to him with a sincere wish to learn what manner of man he was. To my great surprise he wound off by saying, that after the threat or the intimation which has fallen from the gentleman from Boston, it became the Convention so to arrange the system of representation as to protect the country against the city, or words to that effect, at the same time feathering his shaft by an expressive glance at me.

Was that an attack, or was it not? Was my reply provoked, or was it not? I submit that I felt then, and I feel now, that the remark was made for the purpose of the fling at me, for no man could make so fatuous a remark upon any other explanation. The man who really thinks that the country ought to be protected against the city, has no right to be here. His place is in a certain other Convention in the town of Somerville—a Convention that never adjourns, and which is presided over by a member of this body. You, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. Wilson, of Natick,) with that courage and readiness which always characterize you, came to the aid of our friend, and you said that I had not done right to bear so hard upon so respectable and so well-informed a gentleman. Sir, I thought of that scene in the “Merry Wives of Windsor” between Dr. Caius and Mrs. Quickly, when the doctor found the young man in his closet. Mrs. Quickly was sure that he was an honest man; whereupon the doctor replied by a pertinent question, “What is the honest man doing in my closet?” Now I say, as Dr. Caius said: Why does this respectable and well-informed gentleman attack me without any provocation. So far as that attack was concerned, he was neither respectable nor well-informed. I contend that my comment was no more than the hard hitting which he had began, and of which he has no right to complain.

Mr. President, the gentleman in this personal explanation has adverted to many matters which I will not go into. A few days ago I took occasion to make a personal explanation and vindication, which sometimes took the form of attack. I hope that those who remember it against me will remember the provocation also. I am not going to repeat that performance. It is not to my taste, and I do not think that any provocation which can pass under the President’s hammer, will induce me to recall this determination.

Sir, the time of the Convention is precious. I will not occupy one moment of it in anything like personal altercation or party contest. And, Sir, still more:—the shadow of death is resting upon the assembly. The hand of God has been stretched forth, and has taken from us one whose hopes were as warm, and whose prospects were as bright, as those of any of us. Some of the clergymen in the Convention, the other day, took occasion to enforce this dispensation upon our minds, to speak to us of the vanity of human hopes and wishes, and to remind us that no one knew on whom the lot next might fall. I took their admonitions to heart, and, were there no other reason, I would not, while their teachings are so fresh, obtrude upon the notice of the Convention topics of discussion like those for which I asked their attention a few days ago.

So much for our rights and duties as members of this Convention. As between man and man, if I have done the gentleman wrong, or wounded his feelings, I regret it. And I hope he will believe me, when I say that nothing that has passed between us shall leave any permanent shadow of unkindness or ill-will to rest upon my heart; and if an opportunity should occur hereafter, in the chances and changes of life, in which I can be of service to him, then, perhaps, I may be able to convince him of my sincerity in this last remark.

Thursday.]

QUORUM OF THE HOUSE, &c. — FRENCH — BUTLER — GRISWOLD — HALLETT.

[July 14th.

Mr. OLIVER, of Lawrence. I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

(Cries of "No, no;" and "It will not save time.")

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the question recurring on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative.

Suspension of the Rules.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford. I move that the rules of the Convention be suspended, in order that the Convention may now proceed to the second reading and final passage of the resolves in relation to the judiciary. We have now as full a house as we shall perhaps ever have; the subject has been most amply discussed, and I think by taking the final question to-night, we shall save time and finally settle a question which has been much agitated. I hope the rules will be suspended.

(Loud cries of "No, no, no.")

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I desire to say that these resolves have been discussed and voted upon at a time when it would hardly be proper to take a final vote. Since the vote ordering them to a second reading was taken, a large number of members have left the hall; and I think it would be better for us to pause for a moment before we do this.

Mr. FRENCH. At the suggestion of friends, I withdraw the motion.

Quorum of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

For the purpose of taking up a resolution offered by Mr. COLE, of Cheshire, in relation to the number of members necessary to constitute a quorum of the House of Representatives, Mr. GILES, of Boston, in the chair.

The resolution was read, as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that a majority of the members of the House of Representatives shall be necessary to constitute a quorum.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I would suggest to the gentleman from Lowell, not to go into Committee on this subject at this time. The proposition before the Committee of the Whole is an order or resolve offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, for the purpose, mainly, I apprehend, of calling the attention of the Committee on the House of Representatives to the subject. The Committee on that subject have waited until this time to see what disposition the Convention would make of the representation question, in order that they might know how large a House we would be likely to have. I purpose to call the Committee together to-morrow, for the purpose of acting upon this and several other subjects which yet remain for their consideration, and I would inquire of the gentleman from Lowell, whether he does not think that we will dispose of this matter better by leaving it for that Committee to report upon, taking this order also into consideration, and then for us to act upon the Report of that Committee? I merely make this suggestion. I am willing that the question should be taken up now, but I think it would save time to wait until we have the Report of the Committee which has this matter specially under its consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. The reason why I made this motion was, just that we might get at the matter in the mode in which the chairman of that Committee has suggested. This resolve is now in Committee of the Whole, and the only way that we can get at it, is first to go into Committee of the Whole on the subject, and then report it to the Convention with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives, and then it will come back to us from that Committee. It was for the purpose of getting rid of one more subject from our calendar, that I made this motion to go into Committee of the Whole, so that this resolution might go to its proper Committee and be disposed of in the shortest possible manner. I hope that it will not generate any discussion, and that the Committee will now report it back to the Convention, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I would suggest to the gentleman from Lowell, whether we cannot get an expression of opinion upon this subject now, and thus avoid the necessity of this reference, and perhaps of considerable discussion afterwards. I am wearied with seeing these subjects referred and re-referred, and brought back again here. Here is a simple proposition in regard to a single delegate as to the number of members necessary to constitute a quorum of the House of Representatives. I do not believe that there is any material difference of opinion in regard to this subject. Nobody supposes that we shall have less than three nor more than four hundred representatives. Can there be any difficulty, then, in fixing a number—say a hundred and fifty, or two hundred? I would submit whether this resolve could not be amended so as to fix the number here, now, and then let the resolve, as amended, be reported to the Convention? Or, if it is to be referred, let it be referred with instructions, so that the Committee may report it back, and it may be passed here without discussion. Unless we adopt some such course as this, we shall lose all the time we have spent upon it. If we expect to get through with this Convention by August, we must dispose of these things as they come up. I move, therefore, to amend the motion of the gentleman from Lowell, so as to resolve that it is inexpedient to adopt this recommendation, and that we so report to the Convention. I move that the Committee report to the Convention that it is inexpedient that this resolution should pass.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I have no objection to this matter being discussed and settled here, instead of being referred back to the Committee on the House of Representatives; but there are serious differences of opinion in relation to this matter. I incline myself to the opinion, that the number necessary for the transaction of business, should be higher than the present number of sixty. I think it should be a hundred; but I shall go with the majority in regard to whatever number may be determined upon. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman for Wilbraham, will not prevail, because I suppose it precludes any action upon the subject by the other Committee. If the Committee of the Whole are disposed to act finally upon the subject now, I would move to amend the amendment by substituting the number "one hundred" for the "majority;" but I do think that it would simplify the matter at this time to adopt the motion of the gentleman from Lowell, by having this Committee rise and report a reference of this resolution to the Committee on the House of Representatives. If, however, the gentleman for Wilbraham insists upon his amendment, I have no objection, provided that the number be fixed at one hundred.

Mr. HALLETT. I have not the least objection to recommend to the Convention now, the amendment of the gentleman, to my motion, that hereafter a quorum of the House should consist of one hundred members. That, perhaps, would meet the wishes all round. It is now required, by the Constitution, to be sixty. I see no practical inconvenience in having it increased to one hundred.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I have a word to say upon this matter, which I endeavored to intend to have said when I arose before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the third amendment is not strictly in order at this time. If the gentleman for Wilbraham, will withdraw his amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) then the amendment of the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) will be in order.

Mr. HALLETT. I accept the amendment of the gentleman for Irving, as a substitute for mine.

Mr. BUTLER. I was about to say that the reason for my motion was this. This whole subject was referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives. The gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) brought in a resolution on this subject—which he had a perfect right to do—and by inadvertence that resolution was referred directly to the Committee of the Whole, instead of to the Committee having in charge matters of that nature. I knew that the Committee on the House of Representatives was to have a meeting to-morrow morning to discuss this very question, and if we should go on and discuss it here to-night, the Committee would come to their conclusion upon it, and report the same to the Convention, and then we should have the whole subject up, and it would all be gone over again. It was, therefore, in order to save time all around, that I made the motion, and if it had not been for the amendment of the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) we should have been through with it, and have proceeded to something else. What use is there in trying to settle the matter here, while the whole subject is before the Committee on the House of Representatives? The majority of that Committee are not here, and when they come together, they may come to the conclusion to report a very different resolve, and then we must review the whole matter. Why not have the whole subject before us at once?

The gentleman thinks one hundred members a good number to constitute a quorum. Well, perhaps I think one hundred and twenty-five, another thinks a hundred and fifteen; four or five think a hundred and fifty is a good number. And so we have a variety of opinions, and the whole matter must be discussed. The gentleman himself says there is a difference of opinion about it.

Thursday,]

QUORUM OF THE HOUSE.—SCHOULER—BRIGGS—HALLETT—WHITNEY—BUTLER.

[July 14th.

When we come to go into the discussion of this matter, I shall be ready to say that I do not think the Constitution should give permission to three-quarters of the House of Representatives to go home and leave the other quarter here to do business. I have seen fifty thousand dollars of the State's money voted away when there were only forty-four members voting upon one side and forty odd upon the other, and I do not think it was a good sight. However, I am not going into the general question. I think we had better let the whole matter go to the Committee on the House of Representatives, and we shall thereby save the time of the Convention.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I suppose that under the general resolution, which refers all matters having reference to the House of Representatives to the Committee upon that subject, this matter of a quorum would be naturally brought before us. As that subject is before the Committee, of which I am a member, I trust that this matter will be referred to it, so that we may act upon it and make one report upon the whole matter. I think that is the quickest way to dispose of it.

I think, upon reflection, that it will be found that sixty members is a sufficient number to form a quorum, because the only difficulty about a quorum has been when the House meets in the morning, and, for the last few years, the Speaker has not called the House to order until some minutes after the hour to which the House stood adjourned, on account of there not being a quorum of sixty persons present. But as soon as sixty persons are present, the House is called to order, the journal of the previous day read, and then the morning hour is taken up in presenting petitions and reports, and by that time the House is as full as it generally will be during the day. The only effect in my judgment—though I may alter my opinion after hearing the arguments on both sides—of increasing the number from sixty to one hundred, would be to delay the public business. However, I am not going into the discussion of that question now. I shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from Lowell, that the Committee rise and report to the Convention a recommendation that the resolve be referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRIGGS. I hope the motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham will not prevail, and that the one from the gentleman from Lowell will. It seems that this subject, which is one of importance, is in the hands of one of the standing committees of this body. My friend from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) some time ago introduced a resolution fixing the quorum at one half the members of the House, and it was referred, by mistake, to the Committee of the Whole, instead of the Committee on the House of Representatives, so that no committee has acted upon it, and I do not feel ready now to act upon a question of that kind. I think the proper mode is to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the farther consideration of it, and then refer it to the Committee on the House of Representatives, to which it should have originally been referred, and have it come up again in the usual order of business.

Mr. HALLETT. I suppose I have been meddling with a subject which did not belong to me, and I do not think I shall try it again. But if there are any practical men in this Convention, who desire to get through with it, I wish that they would sometimes listen to somebody except those who assume to direct the whole affairs of this Convention.

The proposition before us is a very simple one. A resolution has been offered and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and a gentleman deliberately rises and proposes to go into the Committee of the Whole, for what? Why to render ourselves ridiculous, if we follow out his suggestion. What does the gentleman send us into the Committee of the Whole for? Is it merely to go out of it again? Why did not he move in Convention that the subject be taken from the Committee of the Whole, and sent to the Committee on the House of Representatives, and thus save us all this trouble? Now we have got into Committee, and I want to do something. I say we can dispose of this whole subject to-night, and not be troubled with it again. If the motion prevails to send the matter to the Committee on the House of Representatives, what is to be done? You cannot get that Committee together as easily as you could fit out a clipper ship for California. It will remain with them until they are ready to report. When it comes in, it goes into the Orders of the Day, and when four or five days after you take it up, you are ready to discuss the whole subject, and consume the time of the Convention with unnecessary talk upon a matter in relation to which there has been no difficulty for seventy years or more.

I suppose that sixty members is enough to make a quorum. Gentlemen say this is a very important affair. What is its importance? It is simply whether you will have sixty, one hundred, or one hundred and twenty, or any other number of members to form a quorum. Everybody knows that it would be impracticable to have a large number. If you should require a large number, you would not be able to meet to do business one day out of six, because you would not have a quorum present. If you attempt to put the number higher than one hundred, or even over sixty, as I think, you increase the danger of the House being unable to do its business for want of a quorum, and instead of limiting the sessions of the legislature to one hundred days, you ought to increase it to two hundred. Now I ask, as this is a simple proposition, and as it is now before us, and we have the right to act upon it, why we cannot report to the Convention whether we will have sixty or one hundred for a quorum of the House? I say one hundred members, because the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) suggested it, though I prefer sixty. Yet perhaps it would be better to compromise the matter by agreeing upon that number. Now if we say to-night that we recommend to the Convention that they shall adopt the number "one hundred" for a quorum of the House of Representatives, that recommendation will go into the Convention and be put upon the Orders of the Day, and we can dispose of it there by adopting it, and passing an order to discharge the Committee on the House of Representatives, from the farther consideration of that matter. That will take but one-half an hour if you do it to-night, but if you adopt the course suggested by the gentleman from Lowell, it will consume two days.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I agree with the gentleman for Wilbraham, that we ought to dispose of this matter to-night, and I think the motion he first made would have disposed of it, to wit: to report back to the Convention that it is inexpedient to adopt this resolution. It seems that this is a subject appropriate for the consideration of the Committee on the House of Representatives. They have properly the whole matter before them, and this was referred to the Committee of the Whole, by mistake. They will consider the whole subject, and report upon it, and I therefore shall vote against the motion. The original motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham was equivalent to the motion of the gentleman from Lowell, and I think that one of those motions should prevail.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I do not know whether it belongs to me, or to the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) or to the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) to reply to the suggestion which came from the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) that somebody assumes to direct the proceedings of this Convention, and that other people could not get listened to. I can only say that if gentlemen are not listened to, they must not blame the Convention, but they must talk decent sense. [Laughter.] That is the only recipe I can give. It is the only way I can get listened to, and gentlemen are perfectly at liberty to use my recipe, as I do not claim a patent upon it, though some may find it as difficult as David did to wear Saul's armor. [Laughter.]

I do not wish it to be understood that I have assumed to take upon myself any direction of affairs. But one good result has arisen out of this discussion—the gentleman for Wilbraham (Mr. Hallett) has said he never will interfere in this way again. [Laughter.] Now if he will not we shall get on, and if I have done that good thing I certainly shall take great credit to myself, because if he had let us alone, we should have been through with this subject, and upon something else a long time since. I knew this matter would be discussed when it came up and—

Mr. HALLETT. Why not discuss it now?

Mr. BUTLER. Because we cannot finish it to-night at the usual hour of adjournment. Another thing. I knew from various sources that different gentlemen had various numbers in their minds, which they desire to present, and I think a great deal of discussion can be avoided by having the matter considered by the Committee.

The Committee on Representation are always up to their duty. If the gentleman chooses to say of the Committee on the Bill of Rights, of which he is a member, that they can never be got together, I am content; but the Committee on Representation come together whenever they are called, and he must not speak so of us, because he does not belong to us. If he chooses to enlist a crew for a California clipper, rather than undertake to get his Committee together, I am content. I only mean to say that our Committee come together and work, and present the result of their labors to the Convention.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. Having had the honor of introducing this matter to the Convention, I will simply say that I supposed, it would be referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, through mistake, and I am of opinion, for various reasons, that it should go into the hands of the Committee on the House of Representatives, and I hope it will be sent there.

Friday,]

QUORUM OF THE HOUSE, &c. — HALLETT — COLE — BRADBURY — BATES — BUTLER.

[July 15th.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Hallett, and there were, on a division, ayes, 63; noes, 55.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALLETT. I move that the Committee do now rise, and report the resolution to the Convention, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. Is it in order, pending that motion, to move that the resolve be reported to the Committee with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

The question was then put, and Mr. Hallett's motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman, (Mr. Giles, of Boston,) reported that the Committee of the Whole had, according to order, had under consideration the resolve referred to them relating to a quorum in the House of Representatives, and had instructed him to report it back to the Convention with an amendment.

Mr. ELY, of Westfield. I move that the resolve with the amendment be referred to the standing committee having in charge the subject of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALLETT. I rise to submit one or two considerations to the Convention, and particularly to my friend from Westfield, (Mr. Ely,) who has made this motion. I hope he will vary his motion and allow the Report of the Committee of the Whole to lie upon the table for the present. We can thus discharge the Committee on the House of Representatives from the farther consideration of this subject, and have it finally disposed of here in Convention. What do we want another report from that Committee for? Why not discharge them from the farther consideration of the subject? We may then have the subject before us, and can dispose of it without consuming the time, which we must inevitably do, in the consideration of another report, and have no more trouble about it. I therefore hope the motion of the gentleman from Westfield will not prevail. I move that the whole subject be laid upon the table. I believe that motion has precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Westfield, and I give notice that if my motion is carried, I will follow it with a motion to discharge the Committee having in charge the subject of the House of Representatives, from the farther consideration of this subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the whole subject laid upon the table.

Mr. HALLETT. I now move that the Committee on the House of Representatives be discharged from the farther consideration of the matter of a quorum in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. I would ask whether any Committee of the Convention has anything connected with this subject in their charge?

Mr. HALLETT. The Committee on the House of Representatives have it in their charge.

Mr. BRADBURY. As I understand it, this subject has not been referred to that Committee at all. The resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) and referred directly to the Committee of the Whole. It has been reported from the Committee of the Whole, and now lies on your table in Convention. I submit that neither that nor any other Committee have the matter in charge, and that the motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham is not, therefore, necessary.

Mr. HALLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? The Committee on the House of Representatives have undoubtedly the whole matter connected with the House of Representatives in their charge.

This resolution, introduced by the gentleman from Cheshire, was referred by mistake, as I understand, to the Committee of the Whole, and upon that we have been acting, and it is that resolution which now lies upon your table. The Committee on the House of Representatives still have the subject before them, and it is to relieve them from its farther consideration that I have made the motion. Now, is there any necessity of having a report from that Committee? We have the whole subject before us, and why should they bring it before us again by a report? Why not discharge them from its consideration, and dispose of the matter at once. I hope this motion will prevail, and then we shall not be troubled with another report of that Committee upon the subject.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I desire that the members of the Convention shall understand that my only object in introducing this resolution was, that it might be referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives. I still desire that it should take that direction. I do not understand that that Committee will have to meet again for this purpose alone. I understood, from its chairman, (Mr. Griswold,) that they would have another meeting, and I therefore introduced the resolve for the purpose of bringing the matter before them. I still desire that the resolve may be thus disposed of. It will not consume any more of the time of the Committee. They have the subject properly in their charge. They can report to the Convention, and then we shall have the subject regularly before us. I hope the motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that an order was sent to the Committee having in charge the subject of the House of Representatives. The subject is, therefore, properly before that Committee, and the question is now upon the motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham, to discharge that Committee from the farther consideration of that subject.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I desire to say, that, according to my understanding, the motion just now stated by the Chair is the precise question before the Convention. In the first place, an order was referred to the Committee on the House of Representatives, embracing the subject of a quorum, and all other matters relating to the House of Representatives. Subsequently, a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) upon this subject, and by mistake was referred to the Committee of the Whole instead of to the standing committee, where it should properly have gone. There was no necessity for the resolution, inasmuch as an order which had gone before it made it the duty of that Committee to consider the subject. Now that Committee propose to have a meeting to-morrow morning, for the purpose of considering that among other subjects. I hope, therefore, that the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole will be allowed to lie upon the table until the Committee shall report what number they think necessary to constitute a quorum, and then let the whole matter be disposed of. With a view, therefore, of giving that Committee an opportunity to report upon the subject, I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question was then taken, and the motion agreed to. So it was Ordered, that the Committee on the House of Representatives be discharged from the farther consideration of so much of the subject referred to them as relates to a quorum in the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. ELY, of Westfield, the Convention then adjourned until to-morrow, at nine o'clock, A. M.

FRIDAY, July 15th, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President at nine o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

Limitation of Speeches.

The PRESIDENT stated the first business in order to be the consideration of an order presented yesterday by the gentleman from Bernardston, (Mr. Cushman,) to limit the time allowed to each member to speak upon any question, to half an hour.

Mr. BUTLER observed, that he did not mean to oppose the adoption of the rule; but, he would remark, that we had for sometime had a rule of the Convention, limiting the speeches of members to an hour each, yet that rule had never been enforced in one single instance. Whenever a gentleman had consumed his hour without concluding his remarks, members would cry, "go on," "go on," and he would go on so long as he pleased. Under such circumstances, of course, it would be a personal matter for any gentleman to get up and object. He was in favor of limiting the debate, but he saw no benefit in adopting a rule you could not enforce, and gentlemen had better carry out their hour rule before they undertook to make any new ones upon the subject. Unless there could be an amendment to the order now before the Convention, which should limit gentlemen to half an hour, and then make general consent for them to go on, go for nothing, he thought the rule would be of little avail. He saw, very much, the need of curtailing the debate. He could say all he had to say, and more too, in the course of half an hour. And if any gentleman thought any good could be effected by the adoption of the order, it should have his vote.

Friday,]

LIMITATION OF SPEECHES, &c. — CUSHMAN — KNOWLTON — STEVENS — THOMPSON.

[July 16th.]

Mr. CUSHMAN, of Bernardston, thought there was a great necessity for something of this kind to be adopted. The Convention were now in the eleventh week of their session. They had already consumed much more time than was expected when they commenced, and some measure should be adopted to bring their labors to a close. He appealed to gentlemen to say if, at this period of the session, half an hour was not long enough for any member to speak? The Convention would not listen patiently to them for a longer time. If they desired their speeches to produce an effect upon the Convention itself, they would certainly fail to accomplish the object by continuing them beyond that limit; and if they desired that their speeches should go upon the record for the perusal of posterity, they would be much more likely to be read by making them short.

In regard to the suggestion of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) he thought it would be rather inconsistent for him to accept it as an amendment; but he would say, for himself, that if the order was adopted, and hereafter at the close of any half hour speech, there should be a cry of "go on," "go on," he would pledge himself to rise in his place, and object. If the order was adopted, he hoped it would be adhered to rigidly, and he could see no reason why it should not be.

A MEMBER suggested that all the subjects of importance had been before the Convention, and had been discussed to a considerable extent, and there was, therefore, no more need of long speeches.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, said, that so far as he was personally concerned, he did not care whether the order was adopted or not, but if it was adopted, he hoped that members would not be allowed to go on by general consent, beyond the time allotted to them under the rule. If one member was allowed, by general consent, to go on beyond his time, no gentleman would think of enforcing the rule against another member who desired also to speak more than his time. He hoped the rule would be rigidly enforced if it was adopted. And he gave notice that if, should it become one of the rules of the Convention, and any member in future was allowed to go on beyond his time, he would move to abrogate the rule itself.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester, said, he was as anxious as any member in the Convention to bring this session to a close. He had given a practical demonstration of his anxiety in that respect, by sitting quietly in his seat ever since the session first commenced. But there were important questions upon the table of the Convention, which had not been touched. There was one, especially, which he had been waiting a fortnight for an opportunity to call up, but had not yet found a chance—a subject which is regarded by a portion of the community, and an influential portion too, as one of the most important that can be brought before the Convention. While, therefore, he did not wish that any man should occupy the time of the Convention for a moment more than necessity required, he desired that the subject to which he had referred should receive more consideration than it could receive in a half hour discussion. For that reason, he hoped the order would not be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Rehoboth, remarked that he had noticed, since the hour rule was adopted, that when members had spoken to the extent of their limit, there was a general cry of "go on," and they had taken it for granted that such was the desire of the Convention, and without any formal action upon the part of the Convention granting them leave, have gone on. That was all right. He supposed that when any one came to the end of his hour, and no one cried "go on," he would take it for granted that the Convention did not want to hear him, and sit down.

Again, he had noticed that when any attempt had been made here to curtail debate in any shape whatever, for the purpose of progressing more rapidly with the business, nothing had been accomplished by it, and he believed no good would be accomplished by the adoption of this limit. There was yet important business to come before the Convention. The gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Knowlton,) had referred to an important matter which he had been for some time waiting for an opportunity to call up.

So far as the one hour system was concerned, if any gentleman could not say all he wanted to say in that time, and it should be the general wish for him to continue, he saw no objection. He should vote against the adoption of the order.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, trusted that the motion would prevail, as the Convention ought to adjourn next week, and the adoption of this rule would facilitate such a result. The hour rule had worked well, and although in a few instances speakers had been allowed to go on beyond their hour, yet we had gained a good deal of time in the long run by its adoption. He hoped, therefore, that the present proposition would be adopted.

Mr. ALLEN moved the following amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution:—"Provided the chairman of each Committee of the Convention shall be allowed one hour upon the subject of his Report."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the order as amended, and it was agreed to.

Loan of State Credit.

The PRESIDENT. The first question before the Convention is upon the motion of Mr. Thompson, of Charlestown, to reconsider the vote by which the resolve concerning the loan of the State credit, was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. I have but few words to say in reference to the motion I had the honor to submit a few days since. I deem the question to be too important, involving as it does the great interests of the Commonwealth, to be settled by so thin a House as it was the day when the amendment was offered to the original Report, and adopted by the Convention. I am opposed to that amendment, and desire to submit some reasons why I am thus opposed. Sir, I am opposed to thus restricting the legislature in their action upon a matter of so much interest to the Commonwealth. What has been the experience of the State in relation to the action heretofore taken by the legislature upon this subject of loaning the credit of the State? Has it not been promotive of her best interests? I believe no one will deny that it has, at least no member has as yet denied it. Has it not done more to develop the mineral and other resources of the Commonwealth, to build up villages and increase the taxable property of the State on the lines of the several roads to which the loans have been made, than any other cause? And I would ask, has the Commonwealth suffered any loss, or is it within the range of probability that she can suffer any loss, from the course pursued on this matter? I believe no one will for a moment pretend that she has, or that she can. Two corporations to whom smaller loans have been made by the State, have been prepared to reimburse to the State, and if I am correctly informed, have offered to redeem the whole, or a large portion of that loaned to them, but the Commonwealth declined taking it. How stands the matter with reference to the other great corporation about which so much has been said here, and to which the loan of four millions of dollars was made. The Commonwealth holds stock of that corporation to the whole amount of the loan, besides having a preference over the whole stock held by individuals in that corporation, which is now worth about par, and has been within a short time above par, and could have been sold in the market at a profit of over $50,000. It may be asked, why was not that done? I believe a good and sufficient answer to that is, it was for the interest of the Commonwealth to allow it to remain, for the reason that the State was receiving from that stock seven or eight per cent. interest, and she could not have obtained over five per cent. upon the money derived from the sale thereof; hence, as a business transaction, I say it was a wise and judicious course for the executive to refuse to sell the stock, or take any portion of the money.

We are told these loans were an experiment. Admit they were; but does the success of an experiment furnish any argument why it should not be repeated? I think not.

The amendment which was adopted, I conceive to be one that amounts to an entire prohibition of loaning the credit of the State, under all or any circumstances. What is it, and what does it require? A vote of two-thirds of both branches of the legislature—a greater vote than is required to amend the Constitution. I think, Sir, it would be more to the credit of the Convention, to come up openly and boldly, and assert, in the organic law, that the credit of the State shall never be loaned, than to attempt to prohibit it by such an indirect measure as this amendment would practically carry out. Sir, I am in favor, in all cases, of doing things openly and boldly, and not by any covert means, or the introduction of amendments which may have some plausibility in them, but which, when they come to be applied practically, amount to a prohibition, as much as if explicit words to that effect had been used in the Constitution. I wish that the legislature may stand, in reference to this matter, as they have stood heretofore; and, as I before remarked in relation to the experience of the Commonwealth, it does strike me that it is the dictate of wisdom to profit by the experience of the past. Generally, in business matters, the lessons of experience are the most advantageous and profitable; and I think we need not fear any loss by following the experience of the past in this matter, and allow every case that comes up to be judged of or acted upon in reference to its merits. There may be, and I have no doubt there will be, cases come up when the interests of the Commonwealth may be

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—THOMPSON—GRISWOLD.

[July 15th.

promoted to as great an extent as they have been in times past; but if we allow this amendment to remain as the action of this Convention, however great may be the necessity, and however much the interests of the Commonwealth might be promoted by carrying out or adopting the same policy which has been heretofore pursued, the gates are entirely closed against the adoption of any such policy. I hope, therefore, that the restrictive amendment will be rejected, upon farther consideration, and that we shall trust the servants of the people to legislate upon this subject as they have in times past, believing, as I do most fully, that the interests of the Commonwealth will be guarded and protected, and that we may expect a promotion of our true interests, instead of any loss which may accrue from such a course.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I have been desirous, at some stage of the proceedings, to make a few remarks in relation to this matter, and I will now occupy but a few minutes of the time of the Convention. It seems to me that some false issues have been raised in the course of this discussion. In the first place, the proposition which has been adopted by the Convention, and which it is now proposed to reconsider, will have the effect of putting it out of the power of the legislature hereafter to make a loan in any case; because, if you make a restriction that it shall require a vote of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature, any gentleman can see that it is equivalent to shutting down the gate altogether. I have taken the trouble to go back and examine the yeas and nays upon the loans which have been made heretofore, and I find that where they were taken in the House, in no one instance—I have only examined those in relation to the Western Railroad—did one of these loans pass by a vote of two-thirds of the members present. If you require a vote of two-thirds of all elected, it is nearly absolutely certain that no loan hereafter can be passed by the legislature, so that the question before this Convention is, whether you will do as you have done in times past, and leave it to the legislature to settle these matters upon their merits, or whether you will put an absolute prohibition into the Constitution. That is the practical effect of the proposition which we now propose to reconsider. I am not a little surprised at the course which this question has taken. Who supposed, when this Convention was called, that the proposition would be seriously entertained here of incorporating a provision in your Constitution which should forever after tie up the hands of the legislature, and put it out of their power to enter upon and maintain such a policy, however great the emergency might be for a different course of policy. This is a new proposition. It was not entertained by gentlemen who first advocated the proposition for calling this Convention. I think that our true policy requires that we should make such changes, and such only, in the Constitution as are clearly warranted and demanded by the public sentiment of the Commonwealth. I think it would be a short-sighted and dangerous policy for this Convention to enter upon experiments and incorporate into the Constitution a provision in regard to which no great feeling was entertained—a provision which, perhaps, in its results, might endanger the whole Constitution. I say then, as a matter of expediency, let us confine ourselves in our action here to those changes which the public clearly demands, and upon which there cannot be that diversity of sentiment which must exist in regard to the question now before us. In the first place, is there any necessity, any exigency for incorporating such a provision into the Constitution? I do not now raise the question as to the expediency or propriety of granting loans by the State at all; but is there anything in the past experience of Massachusetts which requires that any such provision should be incorporated into the Constitution? None whatever. Massachusetts has loaned her credit to seven different railroad corporations. Almost every portion of the Commonwealth has received the benefit of the resources of the Commonwealth in this respect, and every one of these loans has been perfectly safe to the Commonwealth. I have taken the trouble, in order to put this question at rest, to examine this matter myself, and I have a letter also before me from the auditor of the Commonwealth, who of course is perfectly familiar with this whole subject, in which he says that there is no probability that the State will ever lose the first dollar by it. Every one of these lines is perfectly secure; the interest has been promptly paid whenever it was due, and the principal itself is sufficiently secured in future, and two of the roads have paid up the loans. If this be so, what is the reason for incorporating into the Constitution a provision such as this, when the legislature has hitherto been a wise and safe depository of this power. Why, gentlemen say, because other States have run foolishly into debt. This reminds me of a person in health sending for a physician. The physician calls, and he tells his patient that he is not sick, and that he has no need of a physician; but the individual says, My neighbor is sick, and I shall certainly be sick, and I must take some medicine; and thus, against the protestations of the physician, he concludes to take medicine and thus destroys his health, when, if he had let it alone, he would have been quite well. The fact that other States, upon this subject of granting loans, have run into experiments, is no argument for Massachusetts.

Allow me to say a single word in relation to the matter of our farms being mortgaged. I do not know that I should have said anything upon this point, had it not been that an appeal was made to the Democratic portion of this Convention. I know very well that at one time there was a great cry in this Commonwealth that our farms were all mortgaged in consequence of loans to the Western Railroad. I am free to confess that I joined in that cry myself; and it was one of those things which the party with which I was associated used for political capital for several years. I was honest in the sentiments I then entertained, that our farms were mortgaged, and that these loans were not safe; but a most careful examination of the whole matter, together with the experience of eight or ten years, has convinced me—and I am equally honest in saying now what I know to be true—that there is no incumbrance whatever upon our farms in this respect, but on the other hand, there can be no doubt that the real and personal property of Massachusetts has been advanced in value by these loans, many millions.

Why, Sir, I speak from the book in relation to this matter, for I have been now nearly four years in the direction of the Western Railroad, as one of the State Directors. Will gentlemen just look for one moment at the position of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in relation to the Western Railroad. That road, in round numbers, cost $10,000,000; $5,000,000 of which is represented by capital stock, $4,000,000 of which is owned by private stockholders, and $1,000,000 by the State. The other $5,000,000 is represented by scrip; $4,000,000 of which is State scrip, or sterling bonds, and $1,000,000 of which is scrip of the city of Albany. Two sinking funds are provided, one for each amount of scrip. These funds are instituted by the premium on the sale of the scrip, one per cent. which the Western Railroad is obliged by law to pay, annually, into each fund, and the annual increase of the funds by interest.

Since the opening of the road from end to end, that is, since about 1844, the Western Railroad has paid the interest on this five millions of scrip, has paid one per cent. annually into each of the sinking funds; has built a second track from Worcester to Springfield; has greatly improved its baggage and passenger cars; has built new, large and commodious depot buildings and freight houses along its whole line; has paid an annual loss of from five to $8,000 on the guaranty on the Pittsfield and North Adams Railroad; has paid its president a salary of $5,000 annually, and other officers and agents in proportion, has suffered a defalcation which shocked the whole financial community, resulting in a loss of from $50,000 to $75,000; has a contingent fund of over $100,000, and during this period has paid upon the five millions of stock a semi-annual dividend of four per cent.

Now, what is the state of this matter? The sinking fund of the Western Railroad loan is now nearly $800,000; the sinking fund of the Albany loan is more than $350,000. The sterling bonds, the scrip issued by the State, is payable in thirty years from the time it was issued, and of course about 1870, and the Albany scrip is payable, I believe, about the same time. If you will go down to the auditor's room and see him, (he having made the calculations,) he will tell you that if the Western Railroad continues as it has for the last few years, it is absolutely certain that in 1870 it will be nearly or quite able to meet the $4,000,000 scrip, the sterling bonds, and the $1,000,000 Albany scrip. Then what have you? You will have—

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. I wish to ask the gentleman for Erving, a question. I wish to know if the Western Railroad Company has paid four per cent. annually from the time the stock was paid in.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I said from about the time the road was completed, which was in 1844 or 1845.

Mr. HOPKINSON. I think it is not more than about three and a half per cent. since the stock was paid.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I presume that may be so. Mr. HOPKINSON. Does the gentleman say that the double track was built out of the income of the road?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I suppose it was not. I am only stating general facts in relation to the road. What I say is this,—and you will not rely on my authority, if you will look through the Auditor's Reports of the last few years, you will see the same facts stated there,—that you will find that in 1870, these five millions of scrip will be nearly or quite paid off. Then how will the

Friday.]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—GRISWOLD—WILKINS.

[July 15th.]

Western Railroad stand? Why, the entire income of that road will be applied upon the five millions of stock, one million of which the State owns.

Now the interest which the Western Railroad pays annually on the $5,000,000 of scrip, and the one per cent. which it pay into the sinking funds, will then be divided upon the five millions of stock, in addition to the eight per cent. which we now divide annually, making fifteen cents on the dollar, which they will divide after about 1870, upon the five millions of stock. So that, instead of the State's ever losing a dollar from the Western Railroad, if we can believe in the future, she will double the value of her million dollars of stock which she now owns. Every dollar will be worth double its par value. The auditor has reached the same conclusions in his reports for the last few years.

Now what incumbrance is that upon the farms in Massachusetts? It is the same incumbrance which the issue of scrip in the city of Boston, for obtaining Cochituate water is, or, rather it is not half as bad, for I understand that the income from the water does not pay the interest on the scrip issued for obtaining this water. But the introduction of this water, at the expense of more than five million dollars of scrip of the city of Boston, has advanced the value of the real estate in this city, and why? Because the benefits, present and prospective, arising from the Cochituate water, are greater than the interest on the five millions or more of scrip which they have issued to bring that water into the city of Boston. It is just so in the matter of the State scrip, only it is a much better case. I am willing to stand upon the facts in the case, and I dislike to have gentlemen take us back to the old issue upon the subject of having our farms mortgaged. I know very well that the party with which I was connected, thought, at that time, the loans would be unsafe, and I dare say, if I had been a member of the legislature at that time, I should have voted against them myself. But all experience has shown us that the loans are safe, and that the State, so far from losing anything, will make a half a million or a million of dollars, if she holds her stock till 1870.

But the great point in this question, is this. Will you leave this matter to the legislature, or will you submit it to the people, or require a two-thirds vote? The question of submitting it to the people, I think, is now out of the case; that has been decided shall not be done. It seems to me that as this policy has worked well heretofore, as the State has incurred no risk, as the State is in no possible danger from any loan hitherto made, it is the part of wisdom and good policy to leave it where we find it. It will be soon enough to put in a constitutional provision upon the subject, whenever the State is in danger in this respect.

I will say that, as something has been said in relation to the Hoosac Tunnel, that is not the issue before this Convention. It is not properly raised in this connection. The question is, whether we will trust the legislature, who are the proper judges, and before whom the facts in one case and another can be presented, so that they will be able to understand them. The question is, not as to this measure or that measure; and I am not to be drawn into a controversy on such an issue, for I am unwilling to tie up my hands in that manner. Other counties, the county of Bristol, the county of Plymouth, the county of Barnstable, the county of Essex, and even the county of Suffolk, may need this aid. The time may come when it will be an object of immense importance that a loan should be made by the State, for an object in one or the other of these counties, which every-body will agree is important and safe. Now will you put a provision into this Constitution which will tie forever the hands of the legislature, when you might as well leave it as it has been left in the past, to the discretion of the legislature, which has acted wisely and safely heretofore?

I wish to say a single word farther. I dislike to allude to matters that concern party, and I rarely or never do it in debate. But an appeal has been made, evidently with a design to influence some gentlemen with whom I am politically connected, or the party with which I am associated. Now, allow me to say, it has always been a Democratic doctrine in this country, so far as I understand it, to favor internal improvements; and every Democratic president, from Jefferson down to president Pierce, has done it. Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Polk, each in turn, suggested to the people of this country, the propriety of changing their Constitution, so that a system of internal improvements could be carried on by the general government, so powerfully were these great men impressed with the necessity of internal improvements, and with the belief that the Constitution did not permit them to be made by the general government, except to a limited extent. And several of them strongly recommended that, so long as it could not be done by the general government with the United States Constitution unamended, it should be done by the States themselves, which would better understand the wants of each locality. I do not wish to advise to enter upon any rash experiments. I would not grant a loan in every case, but I would leave that power with the legislature; so that whenever there is a necessity, and wherever there is a great public exigency, and the loan can be safely made, I would make it, at least. I would leave it to the legislature, which is the proper body to settle that question. Shall we sit here to forge chains and shackles and sepulchres, I may say, for the industry of Massachusetts? For one, I will not do it.

I have not time, but I should like if I had a few moments, and if I had the ability, to set forth the advantages which have accrued to Massachusetts, to Boston, and to every part of the State, from the great railroad enterprises which were aided, to a very great extent, by the credit of the Commonwealth, many of which would, probably, not have been built without that aid. And this aid has been granted, too, without the Commonwealth being in danger of losing the first mill, and by simply endorsing this paper. I would like, if I had time, to set forth in my poor way, some advantages which have accrued to the people of this Commonwealth from these loans, or from the railroads to which they were loaned. Sir, standing here, we seem to underrate the great advantages to the farmers, the mechanics, to the manufacturers, to the mercantile interests, and to all the industrial pursuits in Massachusetts, accruing directly and immediately from the construction of these railroads. Look over the valuation of 1850; look at Pittsfield, and Springfield, and Worcester, and Boston, and Lowell, and Fitchburg, and all the main points where these great railroads pass, and look at the millions and millions of increase of property. It is a direct and immediate result, to a very great extent, of the construction of these roads. Sir, when the policy of Massachusetts has resulted in such beneficence and advantage to the State, I am surprised that there is any man of any party who will come up here and seriously propose to shut down the gate entirely, and put it out of the power of the legislature, even in the greatest exigency and the safest loan, to grant the credit of the State.

Sir, for one, I take my stand on the side of internal improvements; not that I would embark the credit of the State to an unreasonable or unsafe extent; but, for one, living in this age, I take my stand in favor of internal improvements, and I undertake to say that no man can stand up and defend himself in Massachusetts, in New England, in New York, or in this country, who is opposed to internal improvements.

I hope, Mr. President, that this matter will be left, as it has been before, with the legislature. There is no danger of any unsafe loan being made. The great corporations which are interested to defeat any loans, using their influence in connection with men who are themselves opposed to these loans, will be power enough for any company who wish for a loan, to meet; and there will be no danger whatever, that an imprudent or unsafe loan will be made hereafter.

MR. WILKINS, of Boston. MR. PRESIDENT. It has been no purpose of mine, to occupy a moment of the time of this Convention in discussing this subject. I have listened to the discussion, thus far, without wishing to be heard, because I thought I saw that the sense of this body was correct, and needed no aid from me, in coming to a correct conclusion. But the position of this matter has undergone a change—the right appears to me in jeopardy—and I must claim the indulgence of the Convention, while I briefly express my views upon it.

It is altogether too late to attempt to disguise the fact, that the topic under discussion is indissolubly connected with the Hoosac Tunnel. The first speech made on the subject, by the gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) has dovetailed them together; and nearly every subsequent speech and vote has only demonstrated the connection. Hence, it has seemed to me, that we have been engaged, while discussing this matter, in legislation, and that of the worst kind: special legislation. And, it would have been hardly an inappropriate mode of proceeding; to have issued an order of notice to the Troy and Greenfield Railroad, so that they might appear with their counsel and witnesses, and have a full hearing upon the merits of their case, before the Committee of the Whole.

It is true that some few have addressed this body, either in Convention or in Committee, upon the merits of the question, without any apparent bias. My colleague, who early addressed the Committee, (Mr. Hillard,) in favor of the Report of the Committee, and the gentleman representing Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) and my colleague, (Mr. Gray,) who immediately followed him, both in favor of the Report, seem to me to have fully and satisfactorily met every argument that has been or can be brought on the other side—and they have kept aloof from present exigencies, and from preconceived opinions.

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — WILKINS.

[July 15th.

But how is it with some others who have taken part in this debate? Are they in a position to bring to this topic unbiased opinions, and candid judgment—and are their arguments entitled to the right in this matter, which we should all deem them entitled to on indifferent subjects?

The gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) has taken a conspicuous part, and made untiring efforts to defeat the acceptance of the Report, and what is his position? Why, Sir, he has himself told us, that his views on State credit were put upon record many years ago; and some of us well remember them. He has himself alluded to the probable fact, that in consequence of these recorded opinions, he found that he was obliged to quit a temporary office, for the attainment of which he had given up a permanent one. If that gentleman has any regrets for the change he then made, I will assure him that I believe he has the hearty sympathy of his political opponents. We, then, and still think, he left an office, the duties of which he was eminently well qualified to discharge, and was discharging, with great usefulness and acceptance, and entered upon another office, about his qualifications to fill which, there were at least two opinions at the time, though there appears to have been an approximation to one sentiment on the subject before the year expired.

Now, Sir, it appears that this sentiment concerning the credit of the State, formed and enunciated in the dark prospects which then overhung the Western Railroad enterprise, is still, with him, a cherished sentiment. It has cost him too much not to be highly prized, and he now is desirous that the Convention and the people should adopt what the people then repudiated. The gentleman undoubtedly formed, and still cherishes this opinion, in all honesty and sincerity; but I submit, whether there be not with him some pride of opinion, some sticking for consistency, which may obscure his better judgment, under the particular circumstances of the present case; and whether he has not attached a value to this opinion, derived rather from what it has cost him, than what it is worth to us.

And how is it with other gentlemen, who are throwing obstacles in the way of accepting the Report? One of my colleagues, (Mr. Hopkinson,) who has twice spoken on the matter in opposition, (though I was not present to hear him,) daily eats the bread that flows from the bounty of the State. Though not connected with the Western Railroad, that I know of, yet he is most intimately connected with another corporation whose life's blood is derived from the Western, and the Norwich and Worcester Railroads—both of which owe their existence to the credit of this State. Now, Sir, situated as that gentleman is, surrounded by such accidents as he is, he must feel no surprise if much less weight be attached by others to his arguments and suggestions, than he thinks them entitled to, and which, under other circumstances, they would undoubtedly be entitled to.

But my catalogue is not yet finished. One other colleague, (Mr. Giles,) has proposed an amendment which threatens the acceptance of the Report; and still another colleague has announced his intention to offer another in opposition, if an opportunity occurs. And, what is the position of these gentlemen in relation to this matter? I find them, Sir, both to have been opponents to the Hoosac Tunnel bill, in the House of Representatives in April last. Among the nays upon the passage of that bill, I find both their names recorded, with those of seven others only of the Boston delegation. Now, Sir, these gentlemen are committed, both of them, upon this matter. They have preëxistent opinions to sustain, a consistency to maintain; and they appear to be throwing the weight of their talents into a scale here to defeat a measure which they were unable to defeat in the House of Representatives. If, Sir, these gentlemen had voted for that bill, and now should propose to take from the legislature the power to make such grant, then we should have proof that these gentlemen were actuated by principle and an unbiased judgment; and that in this course they were seeking the public good, though it would conflict with a great enterprise, to which they had showed themselves to be entirely friendly. But, we have no such exhibition before us; but on the contrary, we witness endeavors on their part to induce measures that will embarrass and defeat a great public enterprise, and this under circumstances calculated to raise a doubt of the unbiased character of their judgments and opinions upon those measures.

Here, Sir, I close what I have to say upon the debate thus far. I will now address myself to the matter in hand, and advert to some matters not yet, I believe, touched upon.

In settling the basis of representation, this Convention has departed from what it regarded right, and has bowed to the paramount force—exigency. Were we beginning the formation of a government, we should have formed one differently. We found we were too late in the day to follow out theory, but were obliged to be controlled by practice. Now, Sir, it seems to me that we are in precisely the same predicament in relation to State credit. It is too late to set up a theory, but we must be controlled by practice. The current of State bounty and of State credit is already in motion; its refreshing influence has already been felt, and its sustaining power has imparted its blessings. Credit, both public and private, is the great instrument by which the miracles of civilization are being wrought in this nineteenth century. We have all read the beautiful simile of Junius, which is no more beautiful than true. "Individual credit," says he, "is wealth; public honor, is security; the feather that adorns the royal bird, supports his flight—strip him of his plumage and you fix him to the earth."

Credit, Sir, both public and private, is the great element, the chief ingredient, of all true progress in civilization and refinement. By it, the experience of the past and the hopes of the future are made to blend and work in the present. Without it, we should retrograde, and with rapid strides should return to barbarism. It enters deeply into our social system and civil relations. It is like the air we breathe, everywhere circumambient, but ever unfelt. Deprive us of it, even in a slight degree, and we pine and die. It is a system of mutual obligation and mutual forbearance. It grows and flourishes upon mutual wants and mutual benefits; and it unites and knits together the mass of a community, so that it acts and works to one end like one man.

Now, Sir, I say it is too late to rise up and stay this current of public credit in this State. It has been beneficially exercised. Its blessing are felt every day; and these blessings are of two kinds, one public and the other private. The credit of the State has been applied to improvements in the northern, the eastern, the southern, and the western parts of the State; but not in the north-western. The ground on which this credit was loaned, was that the whole State, the public, was to be benefited thereby. This was true ground; but individual benefit and private good were also blended therein. For example, the Western Railroad was aided because it was deemed to be a benefit to the whole State. But, besides this public benefit, every farmer and mechanic on the line of the road, received a personal and private benefit which was not partaken of in any considerable degree by others of the line.

Now, to accomplish these public and private benefits, the credit of the State has been loaned, and, as the gentleman representing Wilbraham, truly remarked, every man's farm and stock has been mortgaged for its redemption. To construct the Western Railroad, the farms in Shelburne have been just as heavily mortgaged as the farms in Chester; but, besides the public benefit derived therefrom, which accrues to the inhabitants of both Shelburne and Chester equally, there has accrued to the inhabitants of Chester an enormous private benefit which is not shared at all by the inhabitants of Shelburne. This benefit lies in the increased value of land, of water power, and other articles, growing out of the increased facility of reaching a market.

Out of this very unequal private benefit growing out of the public loan, arises a demand, I will say a claim, for reciprocal accommodation; a claim resting upon justice, though of course not to be enforced by law. A claim, the justice of which every upright mind sees, and every honest heart acknowledges: Then, I repeat, that if in the four quarters of the State, great and important private advantages have been derived from the loan of the State credit over and above the advantages derived equally to all the citizens of the State; and if these private advantages have been attained by a lien upon the private property of those living out of the range of these advantages—then I say these citizens who have obtained no private advantages from such public loan or credit, have a claim, and I think a strong and irresistible one, for reciprocal accommodation and favor.

As this point has not been before alluded to, I will dwell a moment upon it.

The people of this State, dwelling along the lines of various railroads, and especially upon the line of the Western, have derived great benefit individually from the loan of the State credit, in which benefit the people living in the north-western part of the State had no interest. But the people living in the north-western part of the State, were as much bound, and their property as much pledged to pay said loan, as were those living in the benefited districts. Now, it seems to me, that out of this fact which exists, and has existed for years, the people of the north-western part of this State have a claim, a forcible and a valid claim, upon the people of the other parts of the State for reciprocal favor—a claim which will not be lost sight of, and not be the less urgent, because there is no tribunal to enforce it. And while such a claim exists, and is unrealized, it is, as it appears to me, a gross piece of injustice to increase the difficulty, and throw impediments and obstacles in the way of obtaining that reciprocal benefit to which they are entitled. I cannot reconcile it to my sense of justice and propriety, thus to shut down the gate at this time, and stop the flow, I will not say of favor, but of equity.

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—WILKINS—LADD.

[July 15th.

But, it will be said that the proposition now before us does not shut down the gate, it only increases the ordinary and common difficulty of accomplishing the object. This is true in the end, but not, I think, in fact. I think it shuts down the gate.

Sir, the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) in his forcible argument, stated that the questions which would arise in relation to the State credit, would be sectional questions. This is true, and need not be put in a prospective form. It is now, here on this floor, and has been and will be in our legislative hall, a sectional question. We hear it here in the speeches on what should be an abstract question. We see it in the votes. The interests promoted by and connected with the Western Railroad, are here, and have been elsewhere, an adverse party to this claim in equity. There is no pretence that that corporation is not deeply interested in this question, and did not influence many votes upon it. Now this is sectional. That road runs, with its adjunct having identical interests, through the whole length of the State. Its interests are identified with the interests of the people dwelling upon its line, between Boston and the New York line. There is a tremendous local and sectional interest already blossomed, and fast running to seed, standing before the public, and in divers ways operating upon public sentiment adversely to the exercise of the proposed power by the legislature.

Now, Sir, we have agreed to a basis of representation which, in future, will give a House of four hundred and seven members; a majority will be two hundred and four, and two-thirds two hundred and eighty-one. It will require, then, seventy-seven more votes in a full House to carry such a measure, if the proposition before us be carried, than it will to pass ordinary bills. Is there here a single individual who believes that a bill of the character of the Hoosac Tunnel bill could ever be carried by such a vote, in the face of such an enormous local and sectional opposition as has already manifested itself, and is lively and active at this moment? And this, too, entirely irrespective of the merits of the case. For the greater the merits of the case, the stronger and more vigorous the opposition. If the Tunnel cannot be made, then the interests on the line of the other road have no special reason for opposition; but the more feasible such an enterprise is proved to be, the more those interests are endangered, or deemed to be endangered.

I cannot, therefore, think that any person can vote for the proposal before us, who is not willing to pass judgment upon the Tunnel enterprise, and shut down the gates of right and equity upon the people of that section of the State.

Now, Sir, allow me to say a word in relation to the effect which such an article in the Constitution will probably have upon its adoption. I do not profess to know very well what the people will do and what they will not do, in given circumstances. They have done some things which I thought they could not do, and they have sometimes failed to do what I thought they could do. But, Sir, we all know that sectional feeling is not all on one side. When it is indulged in in one region, a counter feeling will certainly be engendered in the other. If the proposed provision be inserted in the Constitution, how will the northern half of this State, from Boston to the New York line, vote upon it? Sir, it seems to me that we need no prophet to tell us; it seems to me that the people in that region, must be hungering and thirsting for a new Constitution, if they are willing to adopt one containing a clause so hostile to their interest, and inserted with almost the avowed purpose of rendering the execution of a favorite enterprise forever impossible.

Mr. President, allusion has been made here to the practice of other States. It seems that a considerable number of the other States of the Union, have adopted a clause in their Constitutions, prohibiting their legislatures from granting the credit of the State to the aid of individual or corporate enterprises. Sir, I imagine that there is some misapprehension upon that subject. Most of the States which have adopted this provision—at all events very many of them—are States which have been unfortunate in their undertakings, and have suffered considerable loss in consequence, and incurring large debts. But, Sir, I apprehend that in most of the cases in which losses have been sustained, they have been those in which the State itself has undertaken to carry out the enterprise, and not in instances in which their credit has been loaned to companies for that purpose. Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, to some extent—though not to the full extent—and all the other States which have suffered, are those States which have undertaken to do their own work, and reap the profits. I do not remember—to be sure I am not very well posted up in these matters, and there may be instances which have not come to my knowledge—but I do not believe that a single instance can be found of any of those States having loaned their credit to the amount of a single pistareen to any private company; and what losses they may have incurred, have doubtless been in consequence of having undertaken these works themselves; and there can be no doubt, that they have met with great losses. The State of New York has adopted both of these modes. She has both loaned her credit, and carried on internal improvements on her own account. She has aided companies; and one which I have now particularly in my mind, is the New York and Erie Railroad. When that road was first projected, the company raised a certain sum—I do not remember how much—but having a very hard grade to overcome in passing from the Hudson River to Orange County, they spent all their money, and the State loaned them several millions. Still, not having enough to complete it, the State took the road and sold it at auction, but did not realize anything worth while, and the State itself sustained considerable loss. But now that road is completed; and when four or five millions of dollars had been expended upon it, and the principal difficulties overcome, another company came in and took up the road and completed it. Now, Sir, it is quite probable, that the whole of that region would yet have been without that railroad accommodation, had it not been for the expenditure of the State; and if you now go into that State, I doubt whether you can find five reasonably intelligent men in the whole of it, who do not rejoice at this day that the State made this advance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LADD, of Cambridge. I am glad to find at length that the policy in regard to granting the aid of the State credit in furthering and carrying on the great objects of improvement in our Commonwealth, has at last received its proper consideration; and while I concur entirely in what appear to me to be the very conclusive views of the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) on this subject, as a reason why we should not now, and at this stage of our progress, forever close all chance in the future of aid from the Commonwealth in regard to projects of this character, I will take the liberty of presenting very briefly my views upon this question; and while they may be very general in their character, I will premise that if they have no other quality to recommend them, they shall at least have that of brevity.

I am one of those who, from principle, have always adhered to that policy of legislation which is not confined to the minimum amount of legislation—not to those simple and naturally general laws—but I have always regarded it as one of the highest functions of the Commonwealth, and of its legislature, to extend a beneficent and parental aid to those projects which tend to develop all the resources of the State, and for the improvement of the possessions of all its citizens; and is there any gentleman on this floor, or any man in this Commonwealth, that will deny that that policy which has been pursued for twenty or twenty-five years in encouraging these enterprises, has been a good policy? Is there any man who will deny that it has been a sound policy? Will any man deny that it has brought untold riches to the Commonwealth, and that it has contributed, directly or indirectly, to the wealth and prosperity of our citizens? No gentleman, I think, will deny it. Then the question comes, whether at this time the policy should be changed; whether we should introduce into our organic law in absolute prohibition that no legislature hereafter shall grant any such aid? And yet I understand that to be the effect of the amendment as it now stands, if it should be adopted. This matter, then, it seems to me, depends upon higher considerations. If we come to that conclusion, we must foresee that the time has arrived when no farther aid should be granted, and all supplies of this nature in future should be forever stopped. Now, this is sufficiently answered, by the fact that we have brought into this discussion a great enterprise, in which a large portion of the Commonwealth is directly or indirectly interested. It can only be brought in here for the purposes of illustration; and does not every gentleman know that if this provision passes, requiring a vote of two-thirds of both houses of the legislature before any such grant is made, it will defeat the object to which I refer, and perhaps every object, however meritorious?

I concur with the gentleman for Erving, that it might, and in all probability will, have that effect in the organization of the legislature of the Commonwealth on questions of that kind; that there will be differences of opinion—honest differences of opinion—in the first place, as to its necessity, and in the second place, as to its security, and in the third place, as to the propriety of granting aid in any particular instance; and the result will be in every case, however meritorious, if you require two-thirds of each House of the legislature to concur in the grant, that they never will concur. I think, therefore, that gentlemen ought not to come hastily to the conclusion that it may

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—LADD—HATHAWAY.

[July 15th.

never hereafter be desirable that such aid should be granted. And if that be so, are gentlemen prepared to incorporate a provision into the Constitution, the effect of which will be to declare that it never hereafter shall be granted? Such will be the effect of the provision as it now stands. Why require that two-thirds of the legislature shall be required to concur? Sir, it seems to me that such a provision originates in this consideration: that you are not willing to trust the legislature. A distrust of future legislatures, appears to me to be the sole foundation of the argument on which the proposition is based. And why should that be so? Why are you unwilling to repose in successive legislatures a reasonable confidence that they will not abuse the trust confided to them? With all the checks and securities that you have, is there any danger that they will overstretch their power? Is there any danger that any proposition will be passed, unless it be such a one as ought to be adopted? Sir, with the light of past experience, with the facts which we have all around us, illustrating the policy of the Commonwealth on this subject, it seems to me that we cannot shut our eyes to the importance of leaving this matter entirely free to the legislature. We do not, and we cannot know what important questions may arise. I am, therefore, in favor of a reconsideration of this subject, with a view to strike out that provision requiring the concurrence of two-thirds of each House. I would have the matter left entirely to the wisdom and discretion of successive legislatures to determine. We must repose confidence somewhere; and I do not know where we can repose it better, or more securely, than in the legislature chosen by the people to watch over their interests.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. When this subject was under consideration the other day, I had, I believe, about four or five minutes time in which to express what I desired to say. I then stated to the Convention, that at some future time, if I found an opportunity, I should endeavor to present my views in relation to this matter of loaning the State credit. As my friend from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper), remarked, a day or two ago, I never made a set speech in my life, and therefore my remarks may be of rather a desultory character; but I have my views in respect to this question, and they are views which I have entertained for a long period of time.

Permit me to say, before advancing farther, that the gentleman for Erving remarked that this was not a part of the programme under which the Convention was called together. I do not know that it was; but I know very well—as well as that gentleman knows—that this matter has been before the people, and has been discussed for years, and years, and years, that have passed by; and, as my friend from Taunton, (Mr. Morton), said the other day, such is the truth. I have had something to do with this matter for years, and years, and years; and I am not yet convinced but that the argument—I am not about to say in reference to the particular matter which has been referred to, whether all the farms were mortgaged or not, or whether our farmers would suffer from the establishment of railroads or not—but the principle involved in this provision I then maintained, and yet maintain to this day, as being true. In reference to this matter of loaning the credit of the State, or the funds of the State, I have to say, that the funds of the State belong to the State; the credit of the State belongs to the people, and to the individuals who make up that people. But, permit me to say, Sir, that the individuals who make up the people, have an interest not only in the credit of the State, but they have an interest, also, in the money that is in the treasury of the State. I was remarking the other day, when I was up before, when the proposition of the gentleman from Taunton was under discussion, that that proposition did not go far enough for me, but yet that I should vote for it, because I thought it probably was the best we could get. After it was negatived in the Convention, I made up my mind to take the next best that I could find, and that came as near shutting down the gates as might be; and hence I voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Boston, that is now the subject of reconsideration. If any corporation, Sir, in this Commonwealth—I lay it down as a rule, and more especially railroad corporations, when fairly looked at and considered—will probably yield six per cent., and the community are satisfied that it will yield six per cent., there will always be a sufficient amount of private capital in the Commonwealth to take the stock. It probably never will be otherwise in all time. Hence, if the Hoosac Mountain is to be bored, if there is a tunnel to be made through it, if a railroad in that direction will be a six per cent. paying stock, there is no danger but that sharp-eyed individuals and keen-sighted speculators—the men of money and of means—will be ready to take that stock; aye, plenty of them; and there will be no necessity for ever asking the loan of the State credit.

Sir, the Western Railroad was a matter of experiment; so, too, was the great canal which was opened from Buffalo to Albany. Both of these were mere experiments. Every one saw the necessity of having a great highway from Albany to Buffalo, in order that the waters of the Hudson and the waters of the lakes might be connected. Every one saw the necessity of having a highway between Boston and Albany, as the products of the West might as well and as cheaply find their way to the eastern section of the country, as to go down the waters of the Hudson to the city of New York. But, because we have experimented once or twice, and may have come out well, is that any reason why we should be continually experimenting so long as any person wishes so to experiment? By no means. Shall we bring our experiments into competition with each other? I think that that is altogether unnecessary.

If the Western Railroad does all that is necessary to be done, and all that was expected to be done, under that experiment, then why experiment farther? Sir, I am not disposed here to go into statistics, although I have seen some statistics upon this subject. I am not disposed to show here, if I could, that the reduction upon the carriage of freight is going to be but very small, provided you build your railroad from here to Troy. I rather think that a matter not to be discussed here.

But, in reference to this matter of experiment, what are the facts? The great State of New York took the lead, as to these great avenues of travel which have been opened. She opened her canal from Albany to Buffalo. Pennsylvania followed, and she not only opened her canal, but a railroad, in order to connect the two extremes of the canal on either side of the mountains from Johnstown on the one side, to Hollidaysburg on the other. It was an undertaking which required a great amount of capital, but being an experiment, not an individual who was a capitalist, dared to hazard his money upon it. It became necessary, then, in order to ascertain whether this experiment would be profitable or not, that the State should loan its credit to the enterprise. It did not exactly loan its credit either, for that great internal improvement belonged to the State, and not to an individual corporation. The State took the stock, and the State built it. There was no asking the State to loan its credit for the encouragement of any association of individuals. The work was State property.

Well, what followed in process of time? The next thing we see, so far as the State of New York is concerned, is a railroad laid along, almost upon the banks of the canal, from Albany to Buffalo. The different links in the chain were built and owned by different corporations, but they are virtually one. Was there any loaning of the State credit to this corporation. No, there was not. But instead of this, individuals of capital vested their money in different portions of that chain, as they advanced from one stage to another. And what did the State of New York do? She imposed upon that road burdens, and because the State itself owned the canal, she would not permit the railroad from Albany to Buffalo to carry a single pound of freight over their road, between those two points, without paying precisely the same duty to the State, which the owners of property transported upon the canal, paid to the State. That was very well for the time being. In process of time, the project of the New York and Erie road was started. I supposed the gentleman from Boston was going through the history of that enterprise; but he did not tell us the end of the matter. That road went on for a time, and they asked the loan of the State credit to assist them. Mark, the first experiment in reference to the canal was paid out of the public purse, and the first road built from Albany to Buffalo, was an experiment paid for out of individual funds. Then comes the New York and Erie road, the object of which was to open another great highway between the waters of the lakes and the waters of the Hudson River and the ocean, for the exportation and the importation of goods, from this section to that section, and the produce of these different sections to New York. They call upon the great State of New York to loan its credit. The loan was made, to the amount, according to my recollection, of three millions of dollars. Well, they undertook to build their road—that is, the corporation, and not the State—with the loan of about three millions of dollars of the State credit to assist them. They constructed the road as far as the village of Elmira, and there they stopped, for want of funds. The stock was not worth a dollar in the market. But they formed a connection with another road which came down from the head of Seneca Lake to Elmira. By this means they were able to diverge to that lake, take a steamboat, and land at Geneva. Now, pray tell me, if they stopped there in the construction of their road, how much better off the State of New York would have been for this loan of three millions of dollars? What was the consequence? The State of New

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—HATHAWAY—SCHOULER.

[July 15th.

York, to induce that company to carry through their road in a given reasonable time, said: "Gentlemen, I know you will never proceed another inch, and the people of the State will lose the money they have loaned you. We know your work is to come into competition for the same business done upon our canal and by the other road. We cannot raise a single dollar from the road to pay us our three millions, and if you will go on and complete your road in a given time, we will give you the three millions of dollars."

That was the condition in which that great Erie road stood. They went through with the work, and yet, with this gift of $3,000,000, how much is the stock worth? Is it worth the one hundred dollars the share, the par value? By no means, and never will be; and I do not believe that any man in his senses believes it ever will be worth that. After that contribution of three millions, I believe the stock is worth about eighty or ninety dollars on the share. But that is not the end of the matter. The road between Albany and Buffalo comes to the legislature, and says: "You have imposed a restriction upon us in regard to the transportation of freight, and now you have put a road in competition with us. Now, we do not ask of you a gift of $3,000,000, but we ask permission to carry freight free of tolls at that season of the year when your canal is frozen up. You have imposed upon us a duty, when you could not carry a pound of freight upon your canals. We ask you to remove that restriction, and put us upon the same footing with the other road."

And what did the State of New York do? They took off the duty, and that road is now permitted to carry freight in precisely the same manner as the southern road does, and although duty is to be paid upon goods transported upon the canals, no duty is paid upon that which is carried upon the railroads.

This is the history of the internal improvements of the State of New York. Now, who has suffered from that policy? Who but the individuals that live in the State of New York?

Sir, I should not have said a word in reference to the history of these great matters in the State of New York, had not the subject of the Hoosac Tunnel been introduced here. I am opposed to the proposition of loaning the State credit, from principle. If I had been here at the time when the credit of the State was loaned to the Western Railroad, I should have been opposed to it, because it was a matter of experiment; and I hold that the agents of the people ought never to experiment with the people's money. But the loan was granted, and I pray it will turn out well for the State.

I believe the State of New York also loaned its credit to another railroad, called the Hudson and Berkshire Railroad. What is the condition of that road to-day? I understand it is advertised for sale for the non-payment of the interest to the State. It never will be a road paying six per cent.

Well, Sir, what is applicable to a great community is applicable to a small community, and what is applicable to a small community is applicable to a great State. Now, let us see how this matter has worked, when applied to a smaller body than the State. The city of Bridgeport, in Connecticut, under the authority of the legislature, loaned their credit to a railroad called the Housatonic. They did this under the mania and fever that was then raging in relation to railroads. Repudiation was the consequence. When the scrip which was issued by them became redeemable, there was a perfect tumult in reference to the matter; and yet I venture to say that every person in Bridgeport, at the time the scrip was issued, was in favor of it. Yet repudiation took place, and execution after execution issued to enforce the payment. They went to the supreme court of Connecticut, and it was not until the law had been confirmed, over and over again, that they would pay.

In consequence of the great amount of internal improvements in which Pennsylvania became interested, she almost came to the door of repudiation. Time after time she could not pay the interest upon the money she had borrowed in Europe.

How has this matter been at the West? This perfect avalanche of excitement and feeling in relation to railroads, which seemed to pervade the whole community here, found its way to the West. And what was the result? Repudiation after repudiation, and disgrace after disgrace; and I would by no means bring the ancient Commonwealth of Massachusetts within that vortex of repudiation which has been exhibited all over the Western States.

But I would go even farther than to prohibit the loaning of the State credit. I would not only say that the legislature should not loan the State credit, but I would not permit the legislature to authorize any municipal corporation to loan its credit to, or take stock in, any corporation whatever.

How came this matter of repudiation to be so extensive at the West? I think I know something about it. The burnt child always dreads the fire. I had a slight visitation in reference to that matter, and perhaps I am not exactly a disinterested witness in relation to it.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he will have the goodness to inform the Convention which of the Western States have repudiated their debts?

Mr. HATHAWAY. Why, Mr. President, I thought what I alluded to was a matter of public notoriety. It will be recollected that Pennsylvania did not pay her interest. I suppose the gentleman would not call that repudiation. There are some of the Western States which, in a like manner, have declined to pay the interest upon their liabilities. I call that repudiation, but I presume the gentleman would not. The difference between us is a mere difference of words, and I am sure we shall not quarrel about that. He knows what I mean, when I speak of repudiation. I do not say that the people of these States refuse, absolutely, to pay their liabilities, but they did decline to pay the interest upon them, and that I regard as an element of repudiation.

Now, Sir, in reference to these Western States, how came they by these State debts? Just look at the history of the matter. It was not in consequence of the great internal improvements by the States themselves. It was not in opening these great public channels of communication, but it was because the people of the various sections of those States seemed to have an absolute mania for these improvements. Corporation after corporation was authorized by the legislature, supposing that they would be equally beneficial with those great projects which the State had entered into. And what was the consequence? Why individuals connected with those corporations were the sufferers. I speak what I know in reference to this matter, for I have been a sufferer, to some extent, from that mania in one of those corporations. Under Providence, it was my fortune to have a little patrimony, located within the limits of one of them, and it happened to be real estate, and I felt the effects of it. Every town, every county almost, became connected with these projects for internal improvements. And what was the consequence? Why individuals failed in their bonds. They would carry their roads through certain sections, and then bring up. Then they would go into the next county, perhaps, and say: "If you will take half a million of our stock, or get leave of the legislature to authorize you to loan your credit to that amount, one or the other, you may have the railroad through your county. Otherwise, we must go through the adjoining county." Well, Sir, this mania continued to prevail among the people—

Here the hammer fell, the half-hour, fixed by order of the Convention, as the limit for speeches, having expired.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. The gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) has spoken about every State, except the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I was going to speak about that, when the half-hour cut me off.

Mr. SCHOULER. Well, Sir, I do not know what the gentleman would have said, if the half-hour had not cut him off, but I wish to make a remark in relation to what he has already said. In the first place, I understood him to say that he had always been opposed to loaning the State credit to private corporations, though he had never committed himself fully upon the mortgage question. He had never expressed his opinion definitely, upon the question of mortgaging the farms of the people.

Mr. HATHAWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will explain. What I did say was, that in former times, there was a question before the people in reference to the matter of which the gentleman speaks, but whether it was right or wrong, I had nothing to say.

Mr. SCHOULER. Now I wish to say a word to the reformers of this Convention. A great deal has been said about the reform party in this Convention, and, as I place myself in that category, I wish to address myself to the reform members of the Convention.

A MEMBER. As brothers?

Mr. SCHOULER. Yes, as brothers. Now, Sir, we have made some improvements in our Constitution. But that Constitution has yet to receive the sanction of the people, before it becomes the organic law of the Commonwealth. It seems to me that there is such a disposition to load it down with all manner of local questions, that you will kill the Constitution before the people. The very fact of putting into your Constitution this provision, which you are considering, will, in my judgment, deprive it of a great many votes. In certain parts of the State, disguise it as you will, this Hoosac Tunnel question is one which will have an influence on the acceptance of the Constitution we may submit,

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—SCHOULER.

[July 15th.

if it contains a provision incorporated for the purpose of preventing the aid of the State being given for that work. In the northern and western portions of the State, there is a very strong feeling in favor of that Tunnel, and if you place in your Constitution a restriction which shall prevent the majority of the legislature, and a majority of the people of the State, from expressing their opinions upon the subject of loaning the credit of the State to aid in its construction, a large class of the people in those sections of the State, will vote against your Constitution for that reason. I want the reformers of this Convention to consider that fact.

Now, Sir, I want the majority of the legislature to settle this question, just as they have settled it under the present Constitution, in years past. However much we may talk about the improvidence of other States, there has been no improvident legislation in Massachusetts upon this subject of the credit of the State.

I hold in my hand the Report of the Auditor, from which I find that the whole amount of responsibility upon the part of the State, to the different railroads of the State, is about $5,000,000, and here are the details:—

Western Railroad—
Due April 1, 1868,	£135,000
“ Oct. 1, 1868,	327,500
“ “ 1, 1869,	90,000
“ April 1, 1870,	189,000
“ “ 1, 1871,	157,400
	£899,900 is $3,999,555 56
Add for exchange, $320,000.
Eastern Railroad—
Due July 1, 1857,	$100,000 00
“ Sept. 1, 1859,	109,000 00
“ April 1, 1859,	300,000 00
	500,000 00
Norwich and Worcester Railroad, due July 1, 1857,	400,000 00
Andover and Haverhill Railroad, new Boston and Maine, due August 1, 1857,	100,000 00
Boston and Portland, new Boston and Maine, due August 1, 1859,	50,000 00
	$5,049,555 56

Now, Sir, the State has a clear mortgage upon every dollar of property belonging to every one of these railroads for the money, or rather the credit she has loaned them, amounting, in all probability, to not less than from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000. Does that look like repudiation on account of these improvements? Sir, there is not a man in this Convention; there has not been an attempt in this debate, to show where the State of Massachusetts ever run any risk, or that she is likely to lose a single cent, by any act of her legislature in loaning the State credit.

Now, Sir, I am ready to leave this question to the legislature. If it should appear that there is any portion of the State which has not enjoyed the benefit of any assistance upon the part of the State to develop its resources, and the loan of the credit of the State is necessary to carry out any great project which they have in view for that purpose, I say, in God's name, let them have it.

Sir, I say—and I say it without fear of contradiction—that if the State of Massachusetts had to pay every cent of scrip to which she has put her name, for the encouragement of these internal improvements, it would be money spent to better advantage than any ever spent since she became a State. It has raised up the State; it has added to her population; it has added to her taxable property as much as $200,000,000. And if we had not lent the aid of the State, or, at least, if they had not been carried out—and it is exceedingly doubtful whether they would ever have been carried out without the aid of the State—we should have fallen in every respect far behind what we are now; we should have fallen farther behind, in proportion to our former position, than any State in the Union.

I am surprised, that at this late day, when we have the light of experience, that gentlemen should talk about crippling the energies of the State, by placing a provision in our Constitution which shall deprive the legislature—by depriving a majority of the people of the State, through the representatives in the legislature—of the power of expressing their opinion upon this subject. I am opposed to any such provision. I hope the vote of the Convention, by which the provision now before us was adopted, will be reconsidered, and that the whole matter will be left in the power of the legislature.

It will be found very difficult, in practice, to get two-thirds of the members of the legislature to go for any measure of that kind. If such a provision had been incorporated into our present Constitution, in all probability, we should never have had the Western Railroad at all. True, it was an experiment. We could not tell how it would work. But, Sir, when it came to be put through, and to develop the wealth and resources of the Commonwealth, we found that we had made a good experiment. But now we have the light of experience. We know what can be done, by what has been done. And yet, gentlemen are afraid to trust the majority of the legislature, to say whether they will loan the credit of the State, or not.

Sir, it seems to me that it comes with a rather bad grace from the members of the Convention, from the city of Boston, and from members who come from those portions of the State which have been enriched by the credit of the State, to come here and try to cramp the energies of the Commonwealth; to try to place a bridle upon our necks, and to prevent us hereafter from ever assisting that portion of the Commonwealth which has never received one single dollar for the purpose of developing its resources. I am in favor of treating every portion of the Commonwealth with equal liberality.

Now, Sir, the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) and every other gentleman who has spoken here upon the same side of the question, will find it impossible to make out any argument in favor of the provision now before us, from any act of the legislature of Massachusetts upon the subject. If the legislature had been improvident, that might have furnished some ground for an argument. But it has not. The gentleman from Freetown told us of three millions given up by the State of New York, which she had loaned to the Erie Railroad. Why, Sir, if that road could not have been built without the aid of that three millions of dollars—and I take it for granted that it would not have been built—I ask any gentleman here whether it was not a good investment upon the part of the State of New York? Where could she have invested her three millions to better advantage? And I may say just as much for the Erie Canal, which has been so great a source of wealth and population both to the State and city of New York. The whole West have become tributary to her. And, Sir, we wish to avail ourselves of some portion of the wealth of these Western States.

In regard to the State of Illinois, every one knows there was a system of log-rolling carried on in her legislature, which was the cause of all the trouble. In order to get one project through the legislature, members were obliged to vote for others, in which other members were interested, but which were of no public interest or importance whatever. That is the way in which these Western States have become so deeply involved in debt. And I believe repudiation has taught them a lesson in this respect. But, Sir, these States are rapidly filling up, and the time will come when these very improvements, which, up to the present time have not been productive, will become productive, and they will more than compensate for all the losses they have occasioned. But here in Massachusetts we have involved ourselves in no such difficulties. Everything has gone on well, and why not allow the system to remain as it is?

The gentleman talks about experimenting with the credit of the State, and experimenting with the people's money. I will ask him whether it is not, at least, as bad to experiment with the Constitution of the State? He proposes to experiment with the fundamental law in reference to this subject, and I ask him whether the credit of the State is any more sacred than the fundamental law of the State?

Sir, I am willing to stand by the past experience of the State, and I believe the people are willing to stand by it. But I should like to ask the gentleman from Freetown, whether he can tell me if many of these appropriations of other States did not pass by a majority of two-thirds? I think the probability is, that at the time when there was such a rush for these internal improvements, many of the appropriations were passed by a two-thirds vote? There are a number of States which a few years ago were repudiating States, but one by one they have got back again. Pennsylvania was one of the repudiating States, but she has entirely recovered, and I have no doubt, in a great measure, in consequence of these very internal improvements which were the cause of her repudiation. Now she is not a repudiating State. I thought a few minutes ago that Mississippi was the only State in the Union that actually repudiated, but I think Illinois has once not been able to pay her interest, and she will, therefore, have to be placed in the same category. But, Sir, that State is filling up rapidly, and I doubt not the time will come, and within ten years too, when the State of Illinois will be able to pay every cent of principal and interest upon her public debts. It cannot be otherwise.

I had no intention of speaking upon this subject, but I believe it to be a question of considerable public importance; and I believe if the Constitution goes out to the people with this provision in it, it falls dead. That, of itself, will engender such an opposition as to defeat it. The whole people on the line of the railroad for which this loan of the State credit is now asked, will go against it. In the northern part of Berkshire, in the whole of Franklin, in parts of Hampshire, in the city of Boston, and scattered here and there all over the State, there is a class of men who are determined that the credit of the State shall be lent to that corporation, and if this Convention undertakes to go out of its way to prevent it, they will vote against the Constitution.

Again, I ask the reform members of this Con-

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—BISHOP.

[July 15th.

vention if they are ready to put this lump of lead round the neck of your Constitution, which will sink it so deep that you will never be able to find it again? I trust not. I go for the reconsideration of this vote, and for leaving the Constitution precisely where it now stands in regard to this subject. I ask that the people in their representative capacity may decide the matter for themselves, and that this Convention shall not undertake to do that for them.

Mr. BISHOP, of Lenox. Mr. President: On Saturday last, upon the motion of the delegate from Boston, (Mr. Giles,) this Convention resolved that "the legislature shall not have power to grant the credit of the State to any individual or Corporation, without a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives and the Senate in its favor."

The delegate from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) has moved a reconsideration of the vote adopting this resolution. To its general object and policy, I have no disposition, and am not called upon by the motion for reconsideration, to object. The power of the legislature to pledge the credit and good faith of the people, if not a questionable, is, in my opinion, a very limited one. I deny its power, to aid by this mode, enterprises of a merely private character. It has no authority to sign and endorse negotiable notes, or draw and accept bills of exchange, in the name of the State, for the accommodation of individuals, mercantile or manufacturing firms, or corporations, engaged in manufactures, navigation or commerce, for their benefit solely, or to make the people their copartners in business. From this proposition, no well-informed legal gentleman would, I think, dissent. If there be danger of the people's becoming involved, through the act of their legislature, in the hazardous enterprises of navigation, manufacturing, banking, &c., it is wise to dispel it at once, by some decisive constitutional restriction. No danger of this sort, however, is apprehended. The sole question is this, shall the State aid by its credit, those improvements of a public character, now made and to be made by corporations for the benefit of the people, and which can be authorized only by the legislature. Improvements of this character, when too vast for individual capitalists, are, in other States, made, owned, and carried on, by the people themselves. It is thus, with the great canals of New York and Pennsylvania. They are the work, and under the administration, of the State. This State has adopted a different policy, whether safe and prudent, wise or unwise, is too late now for discussion. The policy is fixed and settled, and has now gone too far, perhaps, to be arrested. Whether the people should not have retained in their own hands those great and perilous powers which they have imparted to corporations, and have done on their own account and at their proper charges, what they have employed these corporate bodies to do for them, is a subject past the period of debate and inquiry. The instrumentalities of effecting the great and necessary public facilities, which bring about the intercommunication of Massachusetts with the rest of the world, are established. I can say with truth, to my much respected friend from Taunton, (Governor Morton,) this was no policy of yours or mine. That day may yet turn out to be an evil day, when the legislature of this State carved from the sovereignty of the people, so much thereof, as relates to railroads, and dished it out to corporations. This system of legislation, if pursued in relation to other matters, as it has been in relation to railroads, might, in time, and at some day not very far away in the future, strip the people entirely of that portion of their sovereign power by which they may now plan and execute for themselves, and fatally weaken and abridge the means which they may be required to use hereafter, by the frequently occurring and constantly varying demands and exigencies arising from progressive changes and improvements. Such grants, fixed and rendered irrevocable by the doctrine of vested rights, as that doctrine has been expounded and enforced, may leave the people mere spectators of the achievements of their own delegated strength, and like Sampson, shorn and shaven, they may wake up and find their strength departed, and themselves bound down by Philistines, which their own charters have made.

The people demanded these improvements. The world demanded them. In space, they are local. In usefulness, however, as parts of a great system, they are world-wide. The people have chosen to make them by chartered companies, giving to these companies, for their hazards and investments, an equivalent in special benefits and exclusive privileges. It is solely upon the ground of their having undertaken the State's business, that they are entitled to the State's aid and favorable regard and care—upon the ground, that having assumed the people's obligations, they are entitled to their encouragement and support. Now, Sir, I am opposed to the restriction of this encouragement and aid, which the resolution proposes. I regard it as thoroughly prohibitory; and, if not so, as partial, inequitable, unjust—defeating the reasonable expectations which have been raised. No system of public improvements should be adopted by the State, which is not general; and in considering the question before the Convention, the relative claims and present condition of the several sections of the State, should be regarded. If the system, in order to its completion, ought to be farther extended, if certain parts of the State are not provided with the railroad facilities accorded to others, whose claims are no better, some sound reason should be adduced for withholding them. Impracticable schemes and embarrassed finances would unquestionably be good cause for prohibiting future, or withholding present assistance. If the past shows recklessness, and improvidence, or wastefulness, limitations should be placed upon the exercise of legislative power. With the present influence of railroad corporations over legislative proceedings—an influence, not peculiar, but common to them and all men, and bodies of men of great means and control, I regard the vote passed, not as a restriction, not as a limitation, but as a full inhibition. It is proposed that the Senate consist of forty members. Fourteen only are required to stifle all action upon this subject. It is the interest of existing railroads to prevent their multiplication—to monopolize, if I may use the word, and secure to themselves the entire transportation of men and merchandise; and can they not, with all convenient ease, without apparent activity, or semblance of trick or artifice, throw into that body, of those personally interested, enough to prevent competition by new roads, and defeat every project, which, if carried out, might diminish their profits? The answer is obvious. It would place the enlargement and multiplication of this branch of public improvements, entirely under the control of existing corporations, and to them, in the first instance, would the people have to apply, to extend these great facilities, now made necessary to all departments of industry. In short, upon this great subject, intimately interwoven with the leading interests and prosperity of the country, corporations virtually would legislate, and not the people, through their representatives. Is not this, by indirection, to be sure, but substantially and effectually, a grant by the people, through their legislature, of a part of their sovereign power and right of eminent domain? The grant may hereafter be revoked, if it does not get to be too strong, but while in force, are not that power and that right suspended. I am confident, that such would be the effect of the proposed restriction—that while it takes a measure of power from the legislature, it imparts exactly the same measure to existing corporations. Sir, I am not for such a limitation of legislative action. I am not for a prohibition, which passes over all, which is prohibited to bodies which have had their full share of legislative succor—which have had all they could ask—all, which is necessary to the completion and success of their enterprises. I am for no such constitutional restriction upon the government, as shall operate as a grant of the patronage and aid left to it—to those, to whom aid and patronage have been meted out in generous and abundant measure. "To him that hath shall be given," may be sound theology, but "from him, that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath," certainly requires to be examined, before being adopted, as a rule in the distribution of legislative favors. If the chartered powers and immunities, through which we have chosen to construct our public works, operate safely and beneficially, make them general, as the public good requires. If they prove productive of evil, should not that evil come to us diluted by diffusion. I discuss this question by itself, disconnected entirely from any of the other modes proposed to abridge legislative authority over public credit. I look at it, as an abstract proposition, apart from any particular railroad, which now is, or is proposed to be made.

Much has been said about the Western Railroad, and the Hoosac Tunnel. They are entitled to no specific consideration in the debate upon the proposed limitation. They may be parts of a whole, which may have relation to it. I certainly entertain no hostility to the first, and would not favor the execution of the other, if it be impracticable, or not called for by the general welfare, and whether it be practicable, or would be of public benefit, I certainly am not advised. These questions require more close and accurate investigation than one not specially concerned is inclined to give, or can give. If those mountain barriers can be perforated, so as to admit to a passage through, a locomotive and its train, without great and disproportional expenditures, and the voice of the people call for it, and they can be assured by the severest inquiry which they may make, that no loss will be incurred, let the mountains be tunneled. Pledges, as solid as the bonds of the "solid men of Boston," should be required, if the State, by her credit, gives aid. It is right that such pledges be required, for although a public work,

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—BISHOP—SUMNER.

[July 15th.

it is to be executed mainly upon the judgment of individuals, and largely by their capital, who carefully compare and balance the privileges granted with the risks assumed, and should stand by them.

It is said that the Western Railroad is not only an exhibition of the active, intelligent enterprise, but a standing monument of the munificent wisdom of the State. It has, indeed, thus far accomplished all the purposes of its creation; all that it promised, it has doubly fulfilled, and more. Its security is pronounced ample, firm as "terra firma"—subject to diminution only by earthquakes or volcanoes. Stripped of it, the State would be without one of its greatest sources of prosperity, and, so long as it shall be administered as it has been, with reference to the public accommodation and wants, and economically and efficiently; so long as it shall, as it has done, appoint for its conducting officers gentlemen, courteous, kind, and attentive, to whom we can commit our wives, our children, ourselves, assured of exposure to those casualties only, which come in spite of human vigilance and forecast, it will retain, as it holds, the special favor and regards of the people, and their government. It has, however, been created for special purposes. Its rights and its powers are limited and defined. Other rights, it cannot claim, other powers it cannot exercise, without transcending and violating its charter, and exposing it to forfeiture. It is said that this corporation is here in the Convention—that it sat with the last legislature, during its protracted session. It has no business here. It had no business there. It has no power to make constitutions or laws, except for "the orderly conducting of its own business." It has a legal existence only—is a legal person, with specific functions, created for determinate purposes, and should it assume other offices, or attempt other purposes, its claim to exist would and should cease. It is enough that its stockholders have and retain their several individual rights, and can defend and protect their interest, as others may, whether that interest be in lands, chattels, or stocks. Its officers, like other men, are eligible as delegates and legislators, and if, like others, they are jealous and watchful of their rights, the corporate body, of which they are members, would hardly be obnoxious to censure. When corporations shall appear voluntarily, as such, in either department of the government, expending their funds and using their powers to control its proceedings in matters not within their charters, and attempt to arrest public improvements, cripple private enterprises, or get rid of lawful competition, the time will have come, either for their entire disfranchisement, or for severely stringent circumscriptions, for the world is old enough to have learned, that if there be such a thing as a legal conscience, it has no sting to it. To those who see imminent perils in the factitious powers created by special legislation—powers which set at defiance individual competition, and are strong and dangerous because they can do so, this consolation, at least, is left: that thus far they have been employed, with few exceptions, by honorable men, who know as well their obligations as their rights, and are willing to fulfil them. May a wholesome jealousy watch and guard them, till men, single-handed, with private capital, shall be able to cope with them, as I trust in the revolutions of business they may be, or until a system of general laws, by their impartial operation, shall have placed them upon common ground.

That the inhibitory restriction proposed, should have found an advocate among the delegates from this city is most wonderful. That every one of them should be found prudent, cautious, in favor of a reasonable, and even a stringent limitation, is not surprising. They are "solid men," so all believe—so said the oracle. The industry and prosperity of city and country are compactly interwoven. The interest of mart and field are almost identical. They should be brought, if possible, into close proximity. The heart beats, not for itself alone, but for the extremities, and their twenty terminals. Boston is not Boston, for her own sake only, but also for every mountain, where the chopper builds his cabin—for every hoof-trod hill-side—for every corn-clad valley. Her citizens should coöperate with those of the country, in all reasonable ways, to enable the latter to come here, at the least expense, and in the shortest time. Fears are expressed of centralization. Centralization of government is, indeed, to be feared, and stout resistance to it should be made. No man, unless it be constitutionally delegated, should have more political control, than belongs to him individually. He is one only of many equal parts, a unit in the whole number; and no municipality or city should be suffered to exercise any more of legislative or administrative influence, than its just popular dividend. Business centres, however, have been, and always will be, so long as streams unite and form navigable rivers, and there are found upon the shores of the ocean, at wide intervals only, secure retreats from its storms. Boston is one of these central points, where land meets sea, in safe and commodious harbor—where landsmen meet seamen, and will always meet them—where they interchange the necessities, conveniences, and luxuries of life, and where, I hope, there will always be an interchange of material things not only, but of the sentiments of kindness, respect, confidence, and hearty good-will. Conventionalities may obstruct the ease and frankness of intercourse, may generate castes and classes, may canker the hearts of the exclusives with pride, and tincture the spirits of the excluded with envy. Conventionality and jealousy are everywhere. They are incident to humanity, and among the diversified forms in which human folly and human weakness show themselves. Those who institute invidious comparisons between city and country, claiming for the one all the wealth and munificence, for the other all the solid intelligence and stern virtue, do a positive evil, by postponing the day, when well-bred intercourse and cordial good fellowship will convict each of mistake, and lead to the mutual correction of errors. Away with all factitious social distinctions. There is no place for them among the serious actualities of life—no time for them with those, who by steam and railroad would bring the world into one neighborhood—into one common feeling of mutual confidence and love. Leave such silly matters to brainless men and idle women. An avenue from every section and corner of the State, if it be called for, and will pay, should be opened to her great commercial capital; and it should no longer be complained of by the dwellers on the western mountains, that it costs double to reach their own cherished commercial capital, to what it does to go to that of a neighboring State, at a greater distance from them. Sir, what can be done, with full assurance of no consequent loss to the State, in the way of reaching this city cheaply and quickly, should find no obstacles here or anywhere.

Why, Sir, from the western part of Massachusetts, we come to Boston, thank Heaven, much more readily than we did; but it is a fact, that in order to reach our own commercial capital, we pay four hundred per cent. more than we are obliged to pay in order to reach a great commercial capital of another State, at a greater distance from us. There may be physical difficulties in the way, which cannot be removed; and all that we ask is the removal of every obstacle, the filling up of every valley that can be filled, the lowering of every mountain which can be brought down, that we may reach our own commercial capital, transact business with our own citizens, and derive our full benefit from the fact that we have a great commercial city which we love, whose interests we shall cultivate, and with which we shall forever be connected.

Mr. SUMNER, for Marshfield. Mr. President: I have no desire to enter upon the broad discussion which has been opened by the question now before the Convention. There are considerations, of clear and palpable force, which will determine my vote, and which are as simple as they ought to be decisive. These, with your permission, Sir, I will briefly indicate.

It is proposed, by a permanent provision of the Constitution, to tie the hands of the legislature, so that it cannot hereafter, as in times past, lend the credit of the State in aid of any private corporation; and an amendment has been introduced by my friend from Boston, on the other side of the House, (Mr. Giles,) allowing such loan; but only on the difficult and almost impossible condition of a vote of two-thirds of the legislature. Both of these provisions—the original proposition and the amendment—though differing in form and degree, are identical in principle. They both contemplate a restraint upon the existing powers of the legislature in this regard.

Now, Sir, waiving all question of the propriety of such restraint on grounds of abstract policy, or on grounds suggested by the experience of other States, I believe I may assume, without fear of contradiction, that in times past no crying evil has occurred in Massachusetts from its absence. The credit of the Commonwealth has been rarely lent; and when lent, it has been on sufficient security, and for the general good. Witness the instances which have been adduced in this debate. We are not, then, pressed to this measure by any special experience of evil. We have in no respect suffered from the want of it. No such urgency exists. This is something, and, of itself, in the absence of any commanding principle, may well make us hesitate to depart from the established policy of the Commonwealth. But there is another consideration, to which reference has been already made by gentlemen who have preceded me, which completely disposes of the whole question.

Sir, it is notorious that an application has been recently made to the legislature—in conformity with usage in similar cases—for aid in an important, and, as I believe, practicable work of Internal Improvement, which, when completed, will be a glory to the Commonwealth, and a mighty channel of trade and travel. This application, after ample discussion, found favor in the House of

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—GILES.

[July 15th.]

Representatives, but was rejected, on a very close division, in the Senate—I think by a single vote. But the parties having this grand enterprise at heart, avow their determination to renew it at another session. It is, therefore, at this moment, in the nature of a Pending Question of Internal Improvement, of which the legislature, under the existing Constitution, has jurisdiction. But this is not all. At the very time honorable members were chosen to this Convention, it was then a Pending Question before the legislature. Under these circumstances, and in the absence of any besetting evil, or controlling principle, it seems to me highly impolitic and meddlesome for the Convention to undertake, directly or indirectly, to deal with it. Directly, you would not; indirectly, you should not. On a question thus peculiarly circumstanced—standing by itself, and unlike any other now before the Convention—Public Opinion should be left to operate in its customary channel, without any impediment or breakwater from us.

Sir, I am against the proposition on two grounds; first, because it is not vindicated by any obvious principle, or by any ruling necessity, or even expediency, founded upon the experience of our Commonwealth; and, secondly and chiefly, because, notwithstanding its generality of form, it is practically an offensive interference with a Pending Question of Internal Improvement, which we were not summoned to determine.

Mr GILES, of Boston. I ask the indulgence of the Convention for a few moments, to express some of the sentiments which I have in relation to the resolution now before the Convention. It so happened, the other day, that I found this question up and under discussion. The general drift of the motions before the Convention, was to place a limit upon the legislative power to grant the credit of the State. With that intention I concurred, but I did not assent to the various propositions to obtain that object. During the vote upon one of them, I framed the amendment which is now before the Convention, and with reference to which, as I understand, a motion has been made, and is now the immediate question before us, to reconsider, and which was offered by my friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson). The object which I had in view in framing that resolution, which was done on the spur of the moment, was two-fold; first, to make it intelligible, and second, to make it in a form which would admit of being easily amended. It therefore provides that the legislature shall not have power to grant the credit of the State, to any private corporation without two-thirds of the House, and two-thirds of the Senate agree to it; and it so stands, that if any gentleman wishes to strike out the provision requiring a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and insert one requiring a majority only, or to strike out the provision requiring a two-thirds vote of the House, and insert a majority, it may be easily done.

I wish now to suggest some reasons upon which I found the expediency of some limitation, and make a few remarks with reference to the points which have been started this morning, in the debate. Mr. President, what is the foundation of this resolution? Is it baseless as a vision or a dream in the night; or has it a foundation in reason? If so, what is it? I say it does stand on a foundation; and that foundation is, first, that the granting of the State credit is no part of governmental action; it is an exception, an extraordinary act, and it is no part of ordinary governmental action to grant the credit of the State to private corporations.

That being one corner-stone of the resolve, I say that the act of granting the State credit, should be guarded farther than the ordinary acts of the legislature, which simply require a majority. The other foundation is, that the history of these grants of the State credit to individuals and corporations in this country, including the government of the Union, and the government of each State in the Union, shows that there is danger of abuse. I am not going into any particulars; I am not going to assert that any particular instance is an abuse; but I do say that it is the conviction of the public mind in this country, and not only in this country, but in other countries, that there is danger of abuse from this power of the legislature.

Then, this being an extraordinary act, and one which is in danger of being abused, it does call for more guards than ordinary legislation, to wit: the majority vote.

The proposition the other day, was to put the question to the people. I opposed it; not upon the ground of any distrust of the people. I said then, and I say now, that if I thought there was not sufficient intelligence in the people to enable them to pass upon any proposition which this Convention should put to them, I would vote to double the school fund again and again till there was. But the reason why I would not put it to the people, was this. I am in favor of internal improvements, as well as my friend for Erving, (Mr. Griswold); I go for them, heart and hand. I always have and always will. I wish these improvements to have the good will of every man in the Commonwealth; and that is the reason why I would never put one of these great enterprises to the people in a shape that would compel them to take sides for or against it. You put a proposition of this kind to the people, and they are compelled, by all the machinery of caucus and electioneering, and party influences, to take sides for or against it. And what would be the result? Suppose they go for it, and you get the credit of the State. Good. But suppose that half, or nearly half, the people of the Commonwealth go against it, and you do not get the credit of the State. Bad; bad every way; bad, because the corporation has not got the State credit to aid the enterprise, and because there will be thousands of men in the Commonwealth ready to rejoice in the failure, and say that it was but a fulfilment of their prophecies, that they always knew it was a bad enterprise, and must fail. That is the reason why I would never put a part of the people in a position which would make them the enemies of any project for internal improvement. Credit is based on good-will. I wish every one of the improvements in the State to have the general good-will, and the particular good-will, of every man in the Commonwealth.

My friend says, leave it to the legislature. So say I. But not without a limit, because the very legislature to which you leave it, is the identical legislature which will be deeply interested in the question for or against it, and men are but men, and subject to influences, and I am not one to stand here and condemn the fact that men are subject to influences. I agree with the old philosophic doctrine, that man is but a bundle of influences. I assent to the sentiments of Cicero, uttered in the chamber of the Senate of Rome, on a remarkable occasion, when he made a remarkable oration, and was reproached by the demagogues of that city and that day, who said that his knees trembled so that they knocked together in the presence of that august body of patricians; and his reply was: "I did tremble; and my knees did knock together, but not because I feared the face of man, but because I was a man; and I thank the gods that I am subject to influence, because if I am not subject to influence by others, how can I influence others myself?"

Now, Sir, it is the part of wisdom not to impeach our Maker, and condemn his arrangement of the human mind and human system, but to take it as we find it, and act wisely in reference to our organic laws, for their action and development. My friend said again, that the experience of this State has been fortunate; that it has not lost a dollar. Agreed. That it will not lose a dollar. Grant it. That it will make, has made, and does make, much money. True. But I do not assent to that policy. I say it is wrong for a State to enter into the business of the people, and take it out of the people's hands. I am for having this business done, but I am for having it done by the people, and if it be successful, I would have the people put the money into their own pockets, and not be obliged to go into competition with corporations aided by the State. Therefore, it is no argument in favor of granting the State credit, that the State will thereby replenish its treasury. If that be good policy, I would say to the gentleman from Lenox, why not go into the issuing and endorsement of bills of exchange, and go into the bonding system, and inspect the board of fancy stocks, day by day. Nobody wishes for that.

One word more, Mr. President, upon the subject of corporation influence upon the legislature. I have called no corporation by name, and I shall not do so—I allude to no individual and to no corporation; that makes no part of my thoughts, or of my argument. My friend from Lenox said that no corporation is here to-day. I wish that were true; but if no corporation is here to-day, why do we hear of any corporations? Now, Sir, I am ready to express the conviction which I have for several years felt; but before I do it, I will state what is hardly necessary for me to state to anybody who knows my course, that I am a friend to corporations—that I have called them, and I still believe them to be, the right arm of the industry and enterprise of this Commonwealth. I could talk an hour upon their beneficent action, and describe the blessings which they have spread through the land, where they have brought comfort and luxury, and have stimulated all the best appetites and tastes of our nature; but I have not time for that. I say they have done what must be done, and what will not be done at all except by associated wealth, in every new country. But there is a period coming, and it has begun in this country, when your corporate production cannot compete, and will not compete, with individual production, and enterprise, and capital, because it can no more produce a yard of cotton cloth so cheap as I can, than the State can do so cheap as I can. No, Sir; it neither makes the market more than it is, nor has its sensitive hand upon the public pulse to know when to produce, and when to stop—when to buy, and when to sell;

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—GILES—THOMAS—EARLE—LORD.

[July 15th.

and it has, in addition to its ordinary expenses, a whole roll of corporation expenses, salaries, &c. But in reference to corporation influence upon the legislature, what is my conviction? It is this. I speak from what I do know; I am not going to speak from anybody's knowledge, but from that which produces my own convictions; and I say here, to this Convention, and to the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, that your corporation wealth is, at this day, and at this moment, too strong for your Commonwealth. Your corporation wealth has been increasing, is increasing, and in my judgment, ought to be restrained. Your corporation influence has increased, is increasing, and in my judgment, ought to be restrained. It is too strong for the Commonwealth, and your corporate wealth is too strong for the Commonwealth; and I say that, in my judgment—friend to corporations as I am, and it may go for what it is worth—I say woe to the corporate institutions of Massachusetts, and the corporate interest and the corporate influence of Massachusetts, when, by intermeddling with the legislature of the people, or the conventions of the people, they shall touch and rouse the heart, and muscle, and bone, of the masses of the people to come to the rescue of the people's legislatures and the people's conventions against corporations. Woe to them, when they bring that day upon their heads, and that day they are bringing.

One other point I will allude to. I must go by points or I shall not get through. That is this: I have heard it said by distinguished gentlemen here to-day, and heretofore, that the State credit is to be claimed, is now claimed, and I know it has been claimed from other quarters, independent of the specific merits of the specific cases, merely because the State has granted its credit to others; and every road and every enterprise is in its nature local, and is producing great advantages in a particular locality. The claim comes up; "You have granted it here, you have granted it there, and you ought to grant it again, because you have granted it so and so before." Now, Sir, every road is local; every road must lead somewhere. I will say what was once said by a distinguished man in reference to a western road, the Maysville Road—no road can lead everywhere, except the road to ruin. I do not recognize the solidity of this argument in favor of the State granting its credit, merely because it has done so before; for that would lead us into the maelstrom of speculation; and if we came out whole and sound, we should have another cause in addition to the innumerable instances which we now have, of grateful acknowledgment to that superintending Providence which is wiser than we, and most wise where we are the least so.

Now, Sir, in regard to the particular number of two-thirds, amend it as you please—make it two-thirds of the House and a majority of the Senate, or the other way, or suppose you adopt anything near two-thirds, anything that shall accomplish this result; when a case comes up, I wish the attention of the legislature drawn right to this point—is this an extraordinary exigency? Is it one that will justify the State in granting its credit? I want it to serve at the same time as a caution to them and to the petitioners, and to support your legislature and your governor; for I do believe that every successive legislature and governor that shall ever honor this State and be honored by it—and I hold that the State and its officers, thus far in its history, to have mutually honored each other—will be thankful for something of this kind in your Constitution. Any basis of representation that is likely to be adopted will result in this, that two-thirds of your House may be elected by about one-half of your people; and that is an idea that is worthy of consideration. This restraint will not, therefore, be like a restraint upon the majority of the people, so far as this is concerned.

Now, with regard to the effect which this would be likely to have if ingrafted into your amendments to the Constitution, when you put it to the people for a popular vote upon its adoption or rejection, that is a thing that I have not looked at; but it is a consideration worthy of being looked at. I would not put anything in which I thought would be likely to endanger that which I deem important and valuable; and I would put nothing in which was not needed to bring the Constitution nearer to perfection. If, therefore, you think that such a proposition would endanger any of its associates, put it separately, so that the people can say yea or nay upon it, and nothing else; and if a majority of the Convention shall deem that its being in their amendments at all will endanger the rest, do with it in your wisdom what you please. I have myself but one course, and that is, to consider every effect within my knowledge of the course of action which I am about to take, and to do as well as I can, according to the dictates of my judgment and my conscience, and put unbounded confidence in the good and judicious action of the people; in other words, I shall do according to what is termed part of the code of a gentleman, and that is, to consider every man a gentleman until he proves himself to be no gentleman, and treat him accordingly; and I shall treat the people accordingly. I will put to them, therefore, what I deem to be best; and if they do not agree to it, they can reject it, as we have agreed they shall. I have no desire to have one improvement in the Constitution carried by connecting it indissolubly with another, when it is of a doubtful character; but I do believe in the expediency of some restriction upon this granting of the State credit.

My friend alluded to the idea that this restriction was in the nature of a cramp; yea, and a cramp upon the industry of the people. But do I go for any such thing? No, Mr. President. Did I not say to him the other day, lay not the icy hand of death upon the enterprise of the people of this Commonwealth? This enterprise is instinct with trade, with life, and energy; and I said then, as I say now—support, encourage, cherish, sustain that enterprise, here and everywhere. But it is with the enterprise of this community as it is with the leading and dominant spirit that acts in man and in the nation; it is not to be cramped, but it is to be guided, and this is the way in which you are to aid it. Let the flood burst from your mountains, and fall into a course where there are no banks; will it not overrun your plains and devastate your fields? But let it go in such channels as the Maker of the earth has formed for such beneficent streams, and what is the result? It makes a river, bordered with cities and villages; it is then a blessing to the country, for it makes it populous, prosperous, productive, and happy. I claim, therefore, that I go with him who goes the farthest in favor of enterprise and credit, energy and industry, and everything that we deem good; but I claim it to be wise, from past experience and the nature of the case, to impose some restriction upon the granting of the State credit.

I will say to my friend from Lenox, who doubts the constitutionality of any grant, that the Constitution says that the legislature shall have power to enact all wholesome and reasonable laws, and to take private property for public uses. There is the foundation of this policy, and there let it be. It has worked well, and it will work well; but when you come to grant the State credit, which is my credit, and your credit, and his credit, and every man's special and private credit, as well as the associated credit of the whole, then let it be done wisely. Let the instance be such as to commend itself to more than a bare majority, under all the influences which I do not deprecate, but which I expect will be brought to bear upon the legislative body in that particular case; and if the case be a good one, it can command more than a bare majority of the legislature, and it will command the assent of the people. But if it fail, this failure will not destroy its own credit, as a failure under a mere majority might. If it succeeds, it will give you not only the amount in millions, but it will double that amount in the good-will and coöperation of the whole people in your favor. That is what you need—that is what I want you to have—that is what I design to give you, and that is the object of this resolution, so far as my individual mind enters into it. It is in the power of the Convention to do with it as seems just and expedient to them, and I shall be content.

Mr. THOMAS, of Weymouth. Mr. President, this subject has been amply discussed on both sides; every member of this body has probably made up his mind upon the subject, and I therefore move the previous question.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being then taken on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was ordered to be read a second time, on a division there were—ayes, 189; noes, 87—so it was agreed to.

The question then recurred, on ordering the resolve to a second reading, as amended.

Mr. FREEMAN, of Franklin, demanded the previous question.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I desire to inquire of the Chair, whether, if the main question were not pending, it would not be in order to move for a reconsideration of the vote by which the Convention adopted the amendment which now stands as the resolve.

The PRESIDENT. It would be in order.

Mr. EARLE. I suppose that many gentlemen voted for a reconsideration under the belief that it might be done.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I move to amend the resolve by striking out the words "two-thirds," and inserting the words "a majority." The resolve now reads:—

That the legislature shall not have power to grant the credit of the State to any individual or corporation without a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives and the Senate in its favor.

I understand the motion to reconsider, is made with the view of striking out the words "two-thirds" and inserting instead the words "a majority," and if I understand rightly, the President

Friday,]

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — GRAY — CROWNINSHIELD.

[July 16th.

ruled that amendment out of order. Since that time, I understand that the President has reversed that rule, and now rules that such a motion is in order. I only desire to know whether the President considers that motion before the Convention, so that if the previous question be voted down, the question will recur on that amendment, or whether the previous question having been called for at a time when the President ruled the motion out of order, that motion will now stand.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Salem, the position of the question as it now stands. The resolution is as follows: That the legislature shall not have power to grant the credit of the State to any individual or corporation, without a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives and the Senate in its favor. To strike out the words referred to by the gentleman from Salem, and insert those proposed by the gentleman from Monson, would make a change in that to which the Convention have already agreed, and it is not, therefore, in order at this time.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I would ask the Chair if the demand for the previous question prevails, and the main question is ordered, whether that main question will not be the passing to its next stage, of the amendment of my colleague?

The PRESIDENT. That will be the main question.

The call for the previous question was sustained.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Boston, moved, that when the vote be taken, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion was agreed to, and the yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas, 112; nays, 199—as follows:—

YEAS.

Aldrich, P. Emory
Appleton, William
Austin, George
Barrows, Joseph
Beach, Erasmus D.
Beal, John
Bliss, Gad O.
Boutwell, Sewell
Bradford, William J. A.
Breed, Hiram N.
Briggs, George N.
Brown, Hiram C.
Brownell, Frederick
Cady, Henry
Carter, Timothy W.
Case, Isaac
Chapin, Chester W.
Clark, Henry
Cogswell, Nathaniel
Copeland, Benjamin F.
Crane, George B.
Crowninshield, F. B.
Davis, Solomon
Deming, Elijah S.
Denton, Augustus
Doane, James C.
Dunham, Bradish
Earle, John M.
Eaton, Lily
Ely, Homer
Fitch, Ezekiel W.
Fowle, Samuel
Gardner, Henry J.
Gilbert, Wanton C.
Giles, Joel
Gray, John C.
Hale, Artemas
Hallett, B. F.

Hammond, A. B.
Hapgood, Seth
Haskell, George
Hathaway, Elnathan P.
Hayward, George
Heard, Charles
Hersey, Henry
Hobart, Aaron
Hopkinson, Thomas
Hurlburt, Samuel A.
Jackson, Samuel
James, William
Jenkins, John
Knight, Hiram
Knight, Jefferson
Lawton, Job G., Jr.
Lincoln, Abishai
Littlefield, Tristram
Lowell, John A.
Miller, Seth, Jr.
Morey, George
Morton, Elbridge G.
Morton, Marcus
Morton, Marcus, Jr.
Newman, Charles
Nichols, William
Norton, Alfred
Oliver, Henry K.
Orcutt, Nathan
Orne, Benjamin S.
Parker, Adolphus G.
Parker, Joel
Peabody, George
Peabody, Nathaniel
Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
Perkins, Noah C.
Rantoul, Robert
Rawson, Silas

Reed, Sampson
Rockwood, Joseph M.
Rogers, John
Ross, David, S.
Royce, James C.
Sikes, Chester
Simmons, Perez
Simonds, John W.
Sprague, Melzar
Stevens, Granville
Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Stevenson, J. Thomas
Stiles, Gideon
Taber, Isaac C.
Taft, Arnold
Talbot, Thomas
Taylor, Ralph
Tilton, Horatio W.

Abbott, Josiah G.
Adams, Benjamin P.
Allen, Charles
Allen, James B.
Allen, Joel C.
Alley, John B.
Allis, Josiah
Alvord, D. W.
Andrews, Robert
Aspinwall, William
Atwood, David C.
Ayres, Samuel
Baker, Hillel
Ballard, Alvah
Ball, George S.
Bancroft, Alpheus
Barrett, Marcus
Bates, Moses, Jr.
Bell, Luther V.
Bennett, William, Jr.
Bennett, Zephaniah
Bigelow, Edward B.
Bird, Francis W.
Bishop, Henry W.
Booth, William S.
Boutwell, Geo. S.
Braman, Milton P.
Brinley, Francis
Bronson, Asa
Brown, Alpheus R.
Brown, Artemas
Brown, Hammond
Brownell, Joseph
Bryant, Patrick
Bullock, Rufus
Bumpus, Cephas C.
Burlingame, Anson
Butler, Benjamin F.
Caruthers, William
Chandler, Amariah
Chapin, Henry
Childs, Josiah
Churchill, J. McKean
Clark, Ransom
Clarke, Alpheus B.
Clarke, Stillman
Cleverly, William
Cook, Charles E.
Coolidge, Henry F.
Cressy, Oliver S.
Crittenden, Simeon
Cross, Joseph W.
Cummings, Joseph
Cushman, Henry W.
Cushman, Thomas
Dana, Richard H., Jr.
Davis, Charles G.
Day, Gilman
Dean, Silas
Denison, Hiram S.
Duncan, Samuel
Durgin, John M.
Eames, Philip
Easland, Peter
Edwards, Elisha
Edwards, Samuel

Turner, David
Turner, David P.
Wallis, Freeland
Walker, Samuel
Ward, Andrew H.
Waters, Asa H.
Weeks, Cyrus
Wetmore, Thomas
Wilbur, Daniel
Wilbur, Joseph
Wilkinson, Ezra
Williams, Henry
Williams, J. B.
Willson, Willard
Winslow, Levi M.
Wood, Nathaniel
Woods, Josiah B.
Wood, Otis

NAYS.

Ely, Joseph M.
Eustis, William T.
Farwell, A. G.
Fay, Sullivan
Fellows, James K.
Fisk, Lyman
Foster, Aaron
Foster, Abram
Fowler, Samuel P.
Freeman, James M.
French, Charles A.
French, Rodney
French, Samuel
Gale, Luther
Gates, Elbridge
Gilbert, Washington
Giles, Charles G.
Gooding, Leonard
Graves, John W.
Green, Jabez
Griswold, Josiah W.
Griswold, Whiting
Hadley, Samuel P.
Hall, Charles B.
Hapgood, Lyman W.
Harmon, Phineas
Haskins, William
Hawkes, Stephen E.
Hayden, Isaac
Heath, Ezra 2d.
Henry, Samuel
Hewes, James
Hewes, William H.
Hillard, George S.
Hindsdale, William
Holder, Nathaniel
Hood, George
Hooper, Foster
Howard, Martin
Hoyt, Henry K.
Hunt, Charles E.
Hunt, William
Huntington, George H.
Hurlburt, Moses C.
Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
Jacobs, John
Jenks, Samuel H.
Kellogg, Giles C.
Kendall, Isaac
Kimball, Joseph
Kingman, Joseph
Knight, Joseph
Knowlton, Charles L.
Knowlton, J. S. C.
Knowlton, William H.
Knox, Albert
Kuhn, George, H.
Ladd, Gardner P.
Ladd, John S.
Lawrence, Luther
Leland, Alden
Lincoln, Frederic W., Jr.
Livermore, Isaac
Marble, William P.
Marcy, Laban
Marvin, Abijah P.

Mason, Charles
Meador, Reuben
Merritt, Simeon
Moore, James M.
Morton, William S.
Noyes, Daniel
Ober, Joseph E.
Osgood, Charles
Paine, Benjamin
Paine, Henry
Park, John G.
Parris, Jonathan
Parsons, Samuel C.
Partridge, John
Penningman, John
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Jesse
Phelps, Charles
Phinney, Silvanus B.
Plunkett, William C.
Pomroy, Jeremiah
Pool, James M.
Prince, F. O.
Putnam, George
Read, James
Rice, David
Richards, Luther
Richardson, Nathan
Richardson, Samuel H.
Sanderson, Amasa
Sanderson, Chester
Schouler, William
Sheldon, Luther
Sherril, John

Sleeper, John S.
Southern, John
Spoonor, Samuel W.
Stevens, William
Sumner, Charles
Thayer, Willard, 2d
Thomas, John W.
Thompson, Charles
Tilton, Abraham
Tower, Ephraim
Train, Charles R.
Tyler, William
Underwood, Orison
Upham, Charles W.
Viles, Joel
Vinton, George A.
Walcott, Samuel B.
Walker, Amasa
Warner, Marshal
Warner, Samuel, Jr.
Weston, Gershom B.
Wheeler, William F.
White, Benjamin
White, George
Whitney, Daniel S.
Whitney, James S.
Wilder, Joel
Wilkins, John H.
Wilson, Henry
Wilson, Milo
Winn, Jonathan B.
Wood, Charles C.
Wood, William H.

ABSENT.

Abbott, Alfred A.
Adams, Shubael P.
Allen, Parsons
Banks, Nathaniel P., Jr.
Bartlett, Russel
Bartlett, Sidney
Bates, Eliakim A.
Beebe, James M.
Bigelow, Jacob
Blagden, George W.
Bliss, William C.
Bradbury, Ebenezer
Brewster, Osmyn
Brown, Adolphus F.
Buck, Asahel
Bullen, Amos H.
Chapin, Daniel E.
Choate, Rufus
Clark, Salah
Coggin, Jacob
Cole, Lansing J.
Cole, Sumner
Conkey, Ithamar
Crockett, George W.
Crosby, Leander
Crownell, Seth
Curtis, Wilber
Cutler, Simeon N.
Davis, Ebenezer
Davis, Isaac
Davis, John
Davis, Robert T.
Dawes, Henry L.
Dehon, William
DeWitt, Alexander
Dorman, Moses
Easton, James, 2d
Eaton, Calvin D.
Fiske, Emory
French, Charles H.
Frothingham, Rich'd, Jr.
Gardner, Johnson
Gooch, Daniel W.
Gould, Robert
Goulding, Dalton
Goulding, Jason
Greene, William B.
Greenleaf, Simon
Hale, Nathan
Heywood, Levi
Hobart, Henry
Hobbs, Edwin
Houghton, Samuel
Howland, Abraham H.
Hubbard, William J.
Huntington, Asahel
Huntington, Charles P.
Hyde, Benjamin D.
Johnson, John
Kellogg, Martin R.
Keyes, Edward L.
Kinsman, Henry W.
Langdon, Wilber C.
Little, Otis
Loomis, E. Justin
Lord, Otis P.
Lothrop, Samuel K.
Loud, Samuel P.
Marvin, Theophilus R.
Mixer, Samuel
Monroe, James L.
Morse, Joseph B.
Nash, Hiram
Nayson, Jonathan
Nute, Andrew T.
Packer, E. Wing
Paige, James W.
Parker, Samuel D.
Parsons, Thomas A.
Payson, Thomas E.
Perkins, Jonathan C.
Pierce, Henry
Powers, Peter
Preston, Jonathan
Putnam, John A.
Richardson, Daniel
Ring, Elkanah, Jr.
Rockwell, Julius
Sampson, George R.
Sargent, John
Sherman, Charles
Smith, Matthew
Stacy, Eben H.
Stetson, Caleb
Stevens, Charles G.
Storow, Charles S.
Strong, Alfred L.
Stutson, William
Sumner, Increase
Swain, Alanson

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE, &c. — MARVIN — KNOWLTON.

[July 15th.

Thayer, Joseph
 Tileston, Edmund P.
 Tyler, John S.
 Upton, George B.

Wales, Bradford L.
 Wallace, Frederick T.
 Wright, Ezekiel

Absent and not voting, 107.

So the resolution was not ordered to be read a second time.

On motion, by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention then adjourned until three o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

A Committee Appointed.

The PRESIDENT announced the following gentlemen as constituting the Committee, under the order adopted by the Convention, relative to legal remedy to representatives of persons deceased by railroad accidents: Messrs. Hallett, for Wilbraham, Stevenson, of Boston, Haskins, of Medford, Richardson, of Middletown, and Fowler, of Danvers.

Vacancies Filled.

The PRESIDENT appointed Mr. Knowlton, of Worcester, to fill the vacancy in the Committee, on Reporting and Printing the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention, occasioned by the death of the Hon. F. R. Gourgas.

Also, Mr. Bird, of Walpole, to fill the vacancy in the Committee, on the Preservation of the Records.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, of Medway, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

Reconsideration.

The first subject on the Orders of the Day, was the motion of Mr. Marvin, of Winchendon, to reconsider the vote by which the Report of the Committee on the Qualification of Voters, was accepted.

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. I ask the indulgence of the Convention for a few minutes, to explain the design which I had in offering this order. The order, as will be seen, requires that all persons who may attain to the right of voting in the year 1856, shall be able to read the Constitution of this Commonwealth, printed in the English language; and, as the object which I had in view in offering it, has been much misunderstood, I have desired the privilege of briefly stating what that object was. This is the reason why I made the motion to reconsider.

From conversations which I have had with various gentlemen, I believe that there is very little probability of this order being passed, and I suppose, probably, the chief reason is, that it is too far in advance of the times. I merely wish to explain it.

The object, as will be seen, is so to provide in the Constitution, that from and after the year 1856, all persons admitted to vote for any officer in the State of Massachusetts, shall be able to read the Constitution of the Commonwealth, in the English language; because, I think if they can read that, they can read almost anything else. The design is not, as many gentlemen suppose, to restrict the right of suffrage at all; and the order was submitted to the Committee for the Encouragement of Literature, because the object of it was the promotion of education. It did not, by any means, look to the restriction of the right of suffrage. I will go as far as any gentleman, in extending that right; but it seems to me, in adopting this order, we put into operation a strong motive to induce every person, and especially every man, to learn to read. It would not affect any person who has the right to vote at present, nor any one who might become entitled to the right of suffrage previous to that time. All young men, who are eighteen years of age, and upwards, would have three years in which to learn to read; and, as we have the means of education provided for all who choose to avail themselves of it—both children and adults—there is no reason why every man in the Commonwealth, in the course of three years, should not be able to read the English language. That was the object I had in view, and it appeared to me to be an object highly worthy of our attention, if, by any possibility, it could be reached.

Some few years ago, it was recommended that all persons should be compelled to send their children to school. I suppose, however, that that could not be done. Indeed, I suppose it never would be done—at least, I hope not, for I dislike compulsion in this matter; but if a provision of that kind was made, there would be an inducement held out to every man to learn to read.

I will not dwell upon the subject longer, except to say that nothing would contribute more to the honor of Massachusetts, than that every man who was a voter was able to read; and secondly, that having such a provision in our Constitution, it would make every man who might come to our State from other countries, truly American. I do not mean by this, that we should do anything to prevent foreigners from coming amongst us; I hope that every foreigner who comes into the country will be welcomed by us with cordiality—that they will feel that they are at home here, and that they will learn our customs, and support and honor our institutions.

Having made this explanation, and understanding that there is no hope of this order being adopted, I will now move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was accordingly laid upon the table.

Harvard College.

On motion by Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester, the Orders of the Day were laid upon the table, and the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

On the Report of the Committee on Harvard College, Mr. Morton, of Taunton, in the chair.

The resolution reported by the Committee, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Constitution ought to be amended by adding to chapter 5, section 1, the following article, to wit:—

The legislature shall forever have full power and authority, as may be judged needful for the advancement of learning, to grant any farther powers to, or alter, limit, annul, or restrain, any of the powers now vested in the President and Fellows of Harvard College: provided, the obligation of contracts shall not be impaired; and shall have the like power and authority over all corporate franchises hereafter granted for the purposes of education in this Commonwealth.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester. Mr. Chairman. It would have been more agreeable to me, and more just to the cause, if the duty of sustaining this Report had been assigned to one of larger experience in deliberative assemblies. But trusting to the forbearance of the Convention, I shall present some of the considerations which seem to me to be pertinent to the subject. My colleagues of the Committee will be able to supply my deficiencies.

Harvard College, Sir, is not alone a question of to-day; but in many of its phases it is a question of the past and of the future. It covers a period of more than two centuries of our history; starting from a point almost back to that in which the germ of our civilization, now so largely developed, was perilled in a bleak winter, upon a desolate coast. The college was, undoubtedly, among the ideas which the colonists brought with them, for its foundation was laid only sixteen years after the landing at Plymouth. Something of history, as well as of legal and moral right, must therefore enter into the discussion of this resolution.

The rights of the Commonwealth in the college, and the power of this Convention to interfere with its organization, depend largely upon certain facts in history. Those facts must arrange themselves around one or two points: first, who was the founder of the college; and second, what were the rights of the founder, and were they ever transferred or surrendered?

These two questions involve two theories, the practical results of which are wide asunder.

If John Harvard was the founder of the college, by his own will or the will of the government, and his rights as founder were never transferred or surrendered, then the power of this Convention to touch the organization of the college, may perhaps be questioned. But if, as I believe, the Commonwealth was the founder, and has never parted with its rights as founder, then the whole subject is clearly within the power of this Convention. We may do what we please, and as we please, with the college, provided we do not subvert or contravene the original purposes of its foundation.

It does not become me, Mr. Chairman, in this Convention, or elsewhere, to assert what is law and what is not law, upon a question of so much importance as this. But I understand, Sir, that our laws and the laws of England are coincident upon this subject; and that the general principle is that the founder of the college—be he the king, an individual, or the state—is the one who first erects and endows it; and that all subsequent donors stand to it in the relation of benefactors. It matters not how great or how numerous may be their donations; they cannot dispossess the founder of his rights as such. He may transfer them to another; but he cannot rightfully be deprived of them; and if he does not part with them, they descend to his heirs or successors.

What, then, are the rights of the founder? If he places the property in the hands of trustees, he parts with none of his rights, but may recall the trust. But if he places it in the charge of a corporation, the right of control is then vested in the corporation; and nothing remains to the founder but the right of visitation; that is, a sort of judicial authority over the corporation to call

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE.—KNOWITON.

[July 16th.]

the corporators to account for any perversion of the funds, or any divergence of the corporation from the aim originally given it. This great right of visitation exists of necessity. If the founder fails to provide for its exercise, then the law provides it for him. If Harvard, as some assert, was the founder of the college, and failed to provide for a visitor, or if the right was parted with or lost, then the general court is in full possession of it. But if the Commonwealth was the founder, then the State, having a self-perpetuating existence, retains the right forever unbroken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts which history teaches on this subject?

At a session of the general court held in Boston in September, 1636, as the record says, "the court voted, for the erecting of a public school or college, at Cambridge, £400, to be paid out of the country treasury." It has been found convenient, in later times, to deny that this sum was ever paid; but the denial will avail nothing against the fact of the grant; and besides, the treasurer of the college, in a recent publication, places this grant of the general court of 1636 at the head of the list of donations to the college.

In 1637, Nathaniel Eaton was chosen professor of the school, and was charged with the management of the donations, or funds, or "college stock," as the properties of the college were designated in those times.

In the following year, 1638, the Rev. John Harvard, of Charlestown, died, and made by will a donation to the college of £779 in money, and 320 volumes of books. The general court, the same year, in gratitude for this princely benefaction,—for such it was in those times, and in the then condition of the infant colony,—ordered that the name of Harvard should be given to the college. At that time, there was no corporation in existence. None was then created. It was emphatically the college of the general court. The court had established the rights of the Commonwealth as founder by making the first donation. It appointed the first officers. It directed where and how the college should be built. It took John Harvard's donation, and, to perpetuate his memory, it gave the college his name. But nowhere, and at no time, did it decree that he should be held as the founder of the college, or that his heirs or successors should have the ordinary visitatorial powers that attach to the founders of such institutions. On the contrary, four years afterwards, in 1642, the general court proceeded to establish—not a corporation—but a Board of Overseers, with power to manage the funds, and make all necessary laws for the government of the college; and, at the same time, accountable in all things to the general court.

Such was the character and condition of the college for the first fourteen years of its existence—from 1636 to 1650; and during those fourteen years there was no act of the government that declared Harvard the founder of the college, or even indicated an intention of the court to recognize in him, his heirs or successors, the well-established rights of the founder of such an institution. It is not to be supposed that there was any accidental omission to make such recognition; for the colonists, be it remembered, had but recently left the mother country, where the whole subject of college law was thoroughly understood, and in whose colleges many of them had been educated.

Harvard himself was a remarkable man. He was an educated clergyman, comparatively affluent, as money was then valued, and yet bestowing his wealth in the full confidence of one gifted with the power to anticipate the wants of the advancing generations of men, and to foresee the coming glories of the land on which he had scarcely pressed his foot before he went to sleep in its bosom. Yet nowhere, and at no time, did he express a desire to be considered as the founder of the college, or to reserve to his heirs or successors the ordinary visitatorial power incident to a founder.

He came up to the general court with no such petty interrogatory upon his lips as, "What security can you give me for my money?" No, Sir; he participated in the idea common to the colonists, that it was their mission to establish, upon the new continent, a new order of civilization, founded upon the Christian doctrine of the equality of all men, in the state as in the church. Herecognized, in its full force, the democratic idea of popular sovereignty, and of the capacity of the people to make a perpetual demonstration of the Christian rule that the powers of government are in the people themselves, and not in the institutions of government which they themselves may organize. Acting upon this idea, he placed his munificent donation in the hands of the general court, with no injunction, but to TAKE IT—USE IT; in the concise and explicit language of Puritan legislation, "For the advancement and education of youth in all manner of good literature, arts, and sciences." He did not ask that a self-perpetuating corporation should be established, to watch over his donation; but he trusted to that strong sense of right that pervades the broad bosom of the people, in full assurance that his confidence would never be found misplaced. He no more distrusted the future than he distrusted the Ruler of the universe. He believed that the living ages, as they should advance in perpetual succession, would be just to the ages gone by; and, while he had faith in their integrity, he believed in their right to adapt their institutions to their existing condition.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the consideration of the second period in the existence of the college—that of its charter, in 1650. The general court then gave it form, substance, and existence, as a corporate body. Did the general court give it the character of a close corporation? or was there an essential reservation in the charter?

By the charter, the corporation was to consist of seven persons, with power to receive and manage the college funds; to fill vacancies caused in their body by death or resignation; to choose college officers or servants; and, generally, to make all necessary rules for the government and conduct of the college. But there was an important reservation in the charter. The counsel and consent of the board of overseers, as established in 1642, were required, to give force and effect to the acts of the corporation. That board is fully recognized, but was not established, by the charter. As its name implies, it was not an independent body, but stood around the college to oversee and guard the rights of the Commonwealth in the institution. Neither body alone was the government; and conjointly their powers were not full powers. The corporation, with the consent of the overseers, had the power to fill vacancies in its body, but it had not the power to create vacancies. It could, by the terms of the charter, choose its officers, and remove them; but it could not, by the charter, remove one of its fellows, that power belonging to the founder in the exercise of his visitatorial or judicial authority over the college. The visitatorial right, as we have seen, was never in John Harvard, or in any of his heirs or successors. It was originally in the general court, as the founder; it was not transferred or surrendered by the court when it granted the charter, in 1650; it has never, as I believe, been transferred since that day; and being in the law-making branch of the government, in the outset, it has continued so through the successive generations of men that have held in their hands the legislative power of the Commonwealth during the two centuries that have passed; and must, of necessity, continue there through all time, unless specially and explicitly transferred by the people, or their authorized representatives.

The charter of the college was subsequently amended in 1657 and in 1672, but was in no way materially changed. Other changes were subsequently made, and with like effect.

In 1691, the provincial government was established by William and Mary, in place of the colonial government; and in 1707, the general court confirmed the college in all the rights it had by the charter of 1650. That confirmation was given in these words:—

"And inasmuch as the first foundation and establishment of that house, (Harvard College,) and the government thereof, had its original from an act of the general court, made and passed in the year 1650, which has not been repealed or nullified, the President and Fellows of the said college are directed, from time to time, to regulate themselves according to the rules of the constitution by the said act prescribed, and to exercise the powers and authority thereby granted for the government of that house, and the support thereof."

Four charters were sent to England, but were disallowed by the crown, because the general court would not surrender its control of the college to the royal authority. This was after the colonial charter had been recalled by the crown.

By the charter of 1650, thus revived and confirmed by the general court in 1707, the college was made not an absolute but a qualified corporation. The president and fellows had not then, and have never had, any vested rights which were distinctively their own. All their rights are rights of trust; and those rights were placed in their hands originally by the general court, as the founder of the college, with the explicit provision that they should hold and manage, for specific purposes, the properties given to the college by the founder, and by its long and brilliant array of benefactors, in successive generations, from Harvard to Bussey, and Lawrence, and Phillips.

I have said that it was not an absolute corporation. The act of 1642 established the board of overseers as the representatives of the general court. In the college charter granted in 1650, the power of the corporation is qualified by an explicit recognition of the board of overseers, in these words:—

"And the said seven persons, or the greater number of them, procuring the presence of the Overseers of the college, and by their counsel and consent shall have power, and are hereby authorized, at any time or times, to elect a new President, Fellows, or Treasurer, so often, and from

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE.—KNOWLTON.

[July 15th.

time to time, as any of the said persons shall die, or be removed," &c.

Through the whole original charter, and in its subsequent modifications—none of which were material—the counsel and consent of the overseers were made essential to render valid the acts of the corporation, with the single exception of receiving and investing of funds, or dealing in real estate for the use and benefit of the college.

The power of the overseers was not a mere advisory power. Their consent was necessary to most of the acts of the corporation. They had the power to render null the elections and appointments of the corporation. They and the corporation had the power to dismiss the officers and servants of the college; but the two boards, neither separately nor conjointly, had the power to dismiss a member of the corporation. That power was in the general court, as the visitor on in its foundation; it was exercised by the court, and has never been given up; and cannot be given up unless the present generation or future generations shall be false to the great trusts confided to them by the founders of the Commonwealth.

Whatever power the Commonwealth had over the college by the charter granted in 1650, it has fully and completely at this day. It is true that in the transitions of political power, consequent upon the English Revolution of 1688, the result of which, so far as this Commonwealth was concerned, was the substitution of the provincial for the colonial government—it is true, that the government was unable, at times, to exercise its rights, through the overseers; but at no time did it lose those rights; and to whatever extent it might have been stayed in the execution of them, they were fully revived and confirmed when the crown tacitly gave its assent to the act of the general court, in 1707, which reaffirmed, in all its original force and effect, the college charter of 1650.

Now, if John Harvard was the founder of the college, by his own will, or was made founder by the act of the general court,—as I understand the college at this time maintains,—then the general court, from that time, had no visitatorial power in the premises; and, of course, it could exercise no such power. But what was the fact? By no charter, act, resolve, or decree of the general court, did the court expressly, or impliedly, transfer, surrender, or part with its original visitatorial or judicial power over the college. In compliment to its first private benefactor, it gave the college the name of Harvard; and that was all it gave. On the contrary, the court went on in the execution of its duty as founder and visitor of the college, the same as it would have done if no such man as Harvard had ever existed, or no such fund had ever been given to the college. Contemporaneous construction shows the character of the charter.

The college charter, let it be borne in mind, was granted in 1650. In 1654—four years only after the establishment of the corporation—its first president, the learned and pious Henry Dunster, resigned his place as president of the college and of the corporation. To whom did he resign? Not to the corporation, or the overseers, who had the power to fill the vacancy, but to the general court, in a letter addressed, in his own language: "To the wherryppful and honored Richard Bellingham, Esq., Governor of the Massachusetts Colony, with the rest of the honored Assistants and Deputies in the General Court at Boston, now assembled."

In the conclusion of his letter, he says:—"Therefore I here resign up the place wherein hitherto I have labored with all my heart, (blessed be the Lord who gave it,) SERVING YOU AND YOURS. And henceforth, (that you in the interim may be provided,) I shall be willing to do the best I can for some weeks or months to continue the work, acting according to the orders prescribed to us," &c.

Upon receiving Dunster's resignation, June 10th, 1654, the general court passed this order:—

"In answer to a writing presented to this Court by Mr. Henry Dunster, wherein among other things he is pleased to make a resignation of his place as president, this Court doth order: That it shall be LEFT to the care and discretion of the overseers of the college to make provision, in case he persists in his resolution more than one month, and inform the overseers, for some meet person to carry an end that work for the present, and also to act in whatever necessity shall call for until the next sessions of this court, when we shall be better enabled to settle what will be needful in all respects with reference to the college. And that the overseers will be pleased to make return to this court, at that time, of what they shall do herein. The Deputies have passed this, and desire our honored Magistrates' consent thereto:

1654. WILLIAM TORREY, Clerk.
Consented hereunto by the Magistrates,— RICHARD BELLINGHAM, Governor."

In this matter, the overseers did not act from any rights of their own, but under powers expressly delegated to them by the general court; and for their exercise they were required to make a return to the court. This resignation of Dunster's implied something more than a voluntary retiring from the college. He had fallen under censure for some heretical notions on the subject of baptism; and therefore the overseers, acting for the court, said to him, that "unless he would give satisfaction, according to the rules of Christ, they must be constrained to furnish the college with another president." That, is he must be dismissed from the presidency, and another appointed in his place.

In the same year in which Dunster resigned the presidency of the college into the hands of the court—four years after the charter was granted—the general court exercised, in a remarkable manner, its visitatorial power over the college. The records say that the court, "on perusal of the return of the committee appointed to consider of the college business, order that the stock appertaining to the college should be committed to the care and trust of the overseers of said college."

By the law of 1642, the funds were placed in the hands of the overseers; by the charter, they were taken from the overseers and confided to the corporation; and then, four years afterwards, as I have shown, the corporation was dispossessed of the funds, which were again placed in the keeping of the overseers. A member of the corporation, writing upon this transaction, nearly a century afterward, said:—

"At first view this may seem an extraordinary act in the court, who, by a solemn grant in the charter of '50, had vested the property of that stock in the said corporation. But there is really nothing extraordinary in this act; for, as visitors of their own college, the court had the right at all times, to see that this stock was well taken care of." "This was an act that, in common law, the visitors of a college had a right to do."

Twenty years afterwards, in 1674, the general court again exercised its visitatorial right over the college. The president, the corporation, the overseers, and the students, were summoned before the court; and, after an examination into the condition of the college, the court voted:—

"That if the college be found in the same languishing condition at the next session, the president is concluded to be dismissed without farther hearing."

In 1693, Increase Mather was president of the college. He was a man of ability and learning, but exceedingly ambitious to figure in politics, as well as in religion and literature. He not only chose to retain his place as pastor of the North Church in Boston, but he even left both his church and the college, to go on a political mission to England. In view of his course, the general court voted, that "the president of Harvard College, for the time being, shall reside there, as hath been the custom in times past;" and five years afterwards the court found it necessary to declare again, that "the president should reside at Cambridge." But president Mather, still disregarding the wishes of the government, the general court, in 1701, dismissed him from the presidency, and placed the college in the charge of vice-president Willard; and in 1707, Willard having deceased, John Leverett was chosen to fill the place, and the general court, accepting and approving of the appointment, voted to pay him a salary of £150 from the public treasury, "for his encouragement and support during his continuance in said office, he residing at Cambridge, and discharging the proper duties to a president belonging, and entirely devote himself to that service."

In 1742, Nathan Prince, who had been a member of the corporation for fourteen years, was dismissed by a vote of the Board of Overseers. He was a vigorous and earnest writer, and although guilty of some dereliction in those rigorous times, he was not disqualified to bear witness to future times against an act of usurpation on the part of the overseers. In his appeal to the public, he said:—

"The next, and the only other dismissal of a member of said corporation, was on February last, 1741-2; without any power from the court, or any act of said corporation for the same, but by the sole and sovereign authority of the overseers of the college; who, having no plain law for it, nor from times immemorial any instance of such a thing on their side, seemed now resolved to make one, that so they might plead in future times. Precedents against law are dangerous things; especially if they rise so high as to turn out members of corporations. Such a thing done in England would cause an insurrection; and if this power does not belong to the corporation and overseers of said college by law, the overseers of said college, by such an act, have assumed to themselves the powers of the general court, viz.: those powers, which in President Dunster's case were not the powers of the overseers, but were delegated to them from the court, and so were the powers of that court. Nothing, therefore, can demand a more critical examination than such precedents; and that at their first beginning, before they acquire the force of laws, and in future times will be pleaded as law, against the rights of the general court itself."

The whole drift of Prince's appeal, was to the effect that the power of removing a fellow of the corporation, was not given by the charter to the

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE. — KNOWLTON.

[July 15th.]

college government, but, in his own words, "that the court had reserved it to themselves;" thus bearing his own testimony, in the most emphatic manner, to the visitatorial right and power of the general court as the founder of the college.

The general court, in all the times of the colony and province, showed its zeal in maintaining the foundation it had established, by paying, for a long period of time, the salary of the president of the college out of the country treasury; by numerous payments to professors in the college; by grants of land; and by donations of £1,500 in 1718, for the erection of Massachusetts Hall; of £1,000 in 1726, for the president's house; of £2,500 in 1762, for Hollis Hall; and of £4,100 in 1764, 1765, and 1766, for rebuilding Harvard Hall; amounting in the aggregate, down to 1786, as stated by the treasurer of the college, to over $91,000. And he says that in those early days money had a value six or seven times greater than its value in later times.

But the Commonwealth's bounty to the college did not stop with grants of money. In 1640, it gave the college the ferry across Charles river. How much income it afforded, I have not the means of knowing. But in 1785, after the charter of the Charles River Bridge Company, the general court provided for an annual payment of £200 a year by that company for the benefit of the college; and subsequently, for £100 a year each, from two other bridges across the same stream.

In the consideration of this subject, Mr. Chairman, I come now to the third period in the existence of the college; and that is under the Constitution of the Commonwealth, as established in 1780, and revised by the Convention of 1820.

The college had existed in name, though not in law, as a college, from 1636 to the time of its charter in 1650. It then became both in law and in fact a college. The board of overseers, as I have already said, was recognized by the charter, and made a component part of the government. An appendix to the charter was given in 1657. Another modification was made in 1672; and the whole was confirmed by the general court in 1707.

These were all the laws that were in force touching the college, when the Convention of 1780 assembled. Such was the understanding of that body, and such is the voice of history upon the subject.

In forming the Constitution, the Convention proceeded to secure the rights of the corporation, and the rights of the people as the founder, so that they should be transmitted unimpaired, to future times. The result of its action was the fifth chapter of the Constitution, which was approved and adopted by the people.

The chapter is divided into three sections. The first declares:—

"That the president and fellows of Harvard College, in their corporate capacity, their officers and servants, shall have, hold, use, exercise, and enjoy all the powers, authorities, rights, liberties, privileges, immunities, and franchises, which they now have, or are entitled to have, hold, use, exercise, and enjoy; and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed unto them, and to their successors, and to their officers and servants respectively forever."

The second section confirms to the college all the gifts, grants, devises, legacies, and conveyances, made to the college, to be held and used in conformity to the will of the donors.

The third section provides for the perpetuity of the board of overseers, closing with this proviso:

"Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the legislature of this Commonwealth from making such alterations in the government of the said University as shall be conducive to its advantage and the interest of the republic of letters, in as full a manner as might have been done by the legislature of the late province of the Massachusetts Bay."

This proviso refers not to the corporation alone, or the overseers alone, for neither of them in their separate capacity constitutes the government of the college. The form of expression is such that it must embrace both boards, or it would be without sense and meaning. Of course, under the constitution, the legislature of to-day has the same powers of legislation which were had by the general court previous to 1780; and what that power was we have seen in the whole history of legislation during the times of the colony and the province. The court claimed and exercised its rights of visitation, as founder, in as full and perfect a manner as it would be possible for it to claim and exercise any right pertaining to the functions of government. To deny this, is to deny the whole history of the Commonwealth. It is to deny that the college was built, located, and named by the general court. It is to deny that the court watched over it by day and guarded it by night, and sustained it as a parent sustains a child, in all its trials and perils, from its infancy, when Cambridge itself was but a wilderness, up to its strong and vigorous manhood. Without this visitatorial guardianship of the Commonwealth over the college, its light would have gone out, its funds would have been dissipated, its charter would have been a dead letter, and the donations of Harvard, and other generous benefactors, would have been lost forever; and there would have been no broad foundation on which to pile up the splendid legacies of later days.

With all deference, Mr. Chairman, to the opinions of gentlemen learned in the law, I am unable to believe that this is a case beyond the reach of ordinary comprehension; or that it is involved in intricacies and mysteries which common sense cannot fathom. The corporation itself, in its memorial two years ago, told the legislature that:—

"There is no doubt that the founder of a charity has the right in its creation to prescribe the terms and tenure upon which it shall be held, and the statutes by which it shall be governed, and to reserve the power of altering them from time to time; as also general legislative and judicial authority over the trustees, with power of removal and substitution; provided that such terms, tenure, and reservations, be not repugnant to the general law. Nor can it be doubted that, if the grant be general in its terms, for the purposes of the charity, without prescribing any terms upon which it shall be held and managed, such general legislative and judicial power will remain in the founder, to be exercised at his pleasure; nor that, if the whole tenure and government are not granted to the trustees or other persons, the portion not thus parted with will remain in him. And any power thus expressly or tacitly reserved in the founder, is called visitatorial, and may remain in him, or be at any time granted to other persons; and it constitutes a valuable estate or property, recognized as such in courts of law and equity."

This opinion is signed by the chief justice of our supreme court, and by one of the judges of the United States court, and may, therefore, be taken as sound law in the case. This doctrine is not inconsistent with that of Mr. Justice Holt, that if the founder of an institution fails to provide a visitor, the law provides one for him.

But if I understand the memorial, it avoids the conclusion, by the assertion that Harvard College is a close corporation; and that its franchise is a vested right in the Fellows, which the legislature cannot touch.

If that be so—if John Harvard was the founder of the college, and the right of visitation was in him, his heirs, and successors—then Harvard College can be brought into the same category with Dartmouth College; and the law of the United States court will apply in the one case as well as in the other. But I find no analogy between them.

Dr. Wheelock was the founder of Dartmouth College, and retained for himself, his heirs, and successors, a visitatorial right over the foundation. The legislature of New Hampshire intervened, and changed the organization of the corporation. The trustees appealed to the United States court for redress, under that provision of the United States Constitution which declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." The court sustained the appeal, and the legislature was defeated. But whether a contract was or was not involved in that case, is a question I leave to the logic of the legal profession; as also those other questions, whether the same doctrines were upheld by that court, and if so, how far, in the more recent case of the Warren Bridge; and also whether, as the supreme court of the United States has been constituted of late years, it is probable that the same doctrines would now be laid down as law which ruled in the decision of the Dartmouth case.

In the Convention of 1820, Mr. Webster admitted, in his report, that the college was founded by the Commonwealth. His opinion will, of course, have great weight with a portion, at least, of this Convention. If he was correct in his opinion, then the Commonwealth has a perfect right to modify the organization of the college, whenever the exigencies of the case may require it. Should it do so, upon the theory admitted by Mr. Webster, then there will be no impairing of the obligations of a contract that would make a case that could stand for a moment in the United States court. The exigencies of the case must rule the decision. The court will admit the full rights of the Commonwealth as visitor upon its own foundation; unless, of which I should entertain no serious apprehension, it should throw over the case one of those constructive interpretations of power in the general government, which tend to rob the States of their sovereignty, concentrate all power in the general government, and subvert the liberties of the people.

If the Commonwealth has all the rights and powers of founder of the college, and there exists an exigency, then the corporation is in the power of the general court, acting under such constitutional provisions as the people may prescribe; and there is, and can be, no contract that can be impaired by the action of the people through a Convention, or the general court. In good faith to our forefathers who established the college, and watched over it in its early perils, and fully recognized it in the Constitution—and especially in good faith to its early and its later benefactors, who have enriched it with a princely munificence—we are under the most sacred of obligations to see that its funds are not perverted from the purposes to which they were dedicated. If a perversion is proved—or a failure to give them their full force and effect—then the exigency is made out; as it was in the case of Dunster in 1654, and in the case of the summons to the college to appear before the general court in 1674. In such a case, the plea of a contract cannot avail against the Commonwealth.

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE. — KNOWLTON — BRAMAN.

[July 15th.

But in supposed cases of conflict between the general government and the government of a State, it is important to bear in mind the relative powers of each to the other—the theory of civil government among us, and the mode in which power is distributed by our institutions.

The general government is an organization of delegated power. It has no original sovereignty. It is a creature of the States, which created it by contributions from their own sovereignty, powers and rights. It can act upon such powers only as were expressly delegated to it by the States; and the powers which it may exercise are plainly and specifically defined and set forth in its constitution, as well as the powers which it is forbidden to exercise. With the single exception of the powers thus delegated, every State is sovereign of itself, up to the full measure of its reserved powers, rights and privileges; and can be held accountable in no manner to the general government, except for an invasion of the powers it expressly delegated to that government when it became a party to the compact between the States of the Union. When, therefore, there is no collision between a State and the general government, and no question in dispute in the nature of a contract to be impaired, the Commonwealth cannot be called to account in the courts of the United States for any exercise of its reserved sovereignty and power in or upon its own institutions. Upon these premises, it is my full belief that the general government, acting within the limits of its delegated sovereignty, and without the line of the reserved rights of the States, has no more right to touch the Commonwealth for its action upon Harvard College, than it has for its action upon the State Lunatic Hospital, or the State Reform School. Both of those institutions are corporations, substantially of the same nature as the corporation of Harvard College admitted itself to be, from the period of its organization down to about the commencement of the present century.

The provision that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," was originally a compact of amity between the several States, to protect the rights of the citizens of one State from destruction or invasion by the government of another State.

By the resolution upon your table, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed to affirm in the Constitution the full power of the legislature over Harvard College, as a State institution; subject, however, to such restrictions as shall forever protect the college in all its legal rights. It is a simple proposition, and needs no labored exposition. It gives to the legislature all the power which the people have over the college. It places it in the Constitution as an express power, where it now exists in the nature of an implied or inferential power; the extent of which has always to be determined by judicial interpretation. The language of the resolution is almost identical with the charters of the other two colleges in the Commonwealth. The charter of Williams College was granted in 1793; and in it the general court expressly provided, in these words:—

"That the legislature may grant any farther powers to, or alter, limit, annul, or restrain, any of the powers vested by this act in the said corporation, as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interests of the said college."

This charter was given thirteen years after the adoption of the Constitution of 1780; and, (as suggested by a member of the committee,) was in all probability an exposition of the view which was then entertained of the powers of the general court, affirmed by the Constitution, as existing under the Province Charter.

Thirty-two years afterwards, in 1825, the legislature chartered Amherst College, and placed in its act of incorporation a transcript of the provision contained in the charter of Williams College; with the farther provision, however, that the legislature should forever elect a portion of the trustees of the college. And that is now done.

One other point, Mr. Chairman, remains to be briefly considered, and that is whether there exists a necessity for the Commonwealth to intervene, in the exercise of its visitatorial rights and powers, to correct abuses in the organization and operations of the college; or to give to the institution greater force and effect.

In the matter of the funds of the college, I make no charges against the corporation. I have none to make. If any are to be made, they must come from some other source. I know nothing of its funds—how they have been invested and applied—except in common with the whole community. I never entered the doors of the college, and know nothing of its internal order and life. Its own reports, and the records of the general court, show that it has been endowed with a profusion that is almost prodigal. And what is the result? A less number of students than is found in some colleges more recently established, and charges for education that are onerous to many who avail themselves of its benefits.

These facts have led to the inquiry whether the college has, or has not, failed to meet the just expectations of the people. Those expectations were expressed in the charter. They were—not that it should be a select school for the education of classes or cliques in particular theories, principles, or tenets, religious or secular—but, in the concise language of the charter, "for the advancement and education of youth in all manner of good literature, arts, and sciences."

What, then, Mr. Chairman, is the relation which the college now holds to the Commonwealth?

Its corporation is now, and long has been, composed of men who are understood to be of one sect in religion, and of one party in politics. That religious sect does not embrace more than one-tenth of the people of the Commonwealth. I do not charge, Sir, that in some of its acts the corporation has shown a culpable insensibility to public opinion; but I do say, that while the college remains in the hands of a sect or a party, it is outside, over and beyond, the reach of the sympathies, the approval, the cooperation of the mass of the people.

Its founders and benefactors never designed that it should be a sectarian, a narrow, or an exclusive institution. They, of course, had their peculiar notions in theology and in government; but they nowhere incorporated them into the constitution of the college, or made provision that they should rule in its administration.

For one, Mr. Chairman, I propose to make no changes in the original character and purposes of the college. All I propose, is to bring back the college upon its first foundation; to give greater activity and effect to those means of education that have been so liberally supplied by the Commonwealth, and by the largesses of its long line of private benefactors; and, by future constitutional legislation, to place the college in full contact with the beating pulse of the great heart of the Commonwealth, that the generous sympathies of the whole people may cluster around it in the present and in all coming time. Ours is a powerful Commonwealth. Its amplitude of means is daily augmenting. The platform of the college is a broad one. Without impairing the efficiency of the institution that now occupies but one of its corners, the Commonwealth can rear upon it an organization such as the progress of society may demand.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I have no sympathy with those who cherish errors and abuses because they are old; and dread the progress of truth because its revelations are new; who regard every change as innovation; and who hope that the future may be as the present is, or as the past has been. The Committee with whom I have had the honor to act in reporting this resolution, do not even contemplate a subversion of the established order of the college, or a change of its studies or discipline. If there are duties unperformed, all will agree that they should no longer be neglected. If there are drones in the hive, they should be set to work, or driven out. But these are the appropriate duties of an energetic administration of the college, that comprehends its duty, and has the moral courage to do it.

Harvard College has the means—and what it has not it can have—to place it beyond the reach of competition from all other American Colleges.

Popularized as it should be, and in a land that is progressing with giant strides, it should have its thousands of students where it now has its hundreds. It should be a great centre of good influences—the prolific fountain, from which "all manner of good literature, arts, and sciences" should flow out in abundant streams, to enlarge, to invigorate, to refine, the public mind. It should be the head of our system of public instruction:—not standing aside, in narrow exclusiveness, to furnish a few individuals for the professions:—but educating men, of all classes, for a higher aim in all the pursuits and avocations of life—especially that great body of public teachers who are hereafter to give tone and direction to the ideas and sentiments of the people.

With these views, thus imperfectly presented, and with the hope that my colleagues of the Committee will supply my deficiencies, I ask pardon, Mr. Chairman, for the extent to which I have trespassed upon your forbearance.

Mr. BRAMAN, of Danvers. Being a member of the Committee which made this Report, I ask the indulgence of the Convention for a short time, in order that I may have an opportunity of expressing my views. With some of the views which have just been expressed by the chairman

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE.—BRAMAN.

[July 15th.]

of that Committee, I entirely concur; but from others of them I as entirely dissent, although, without doubt, those views are conscientiously and honestly entertained.

I should have preferred to have stricken out of the Constitution all that related to Harvard College; and failing in that, as the next best thing, I would have chosen to have retained the provision as it is in our present Constitution, without alteration or addition.

I have some objection to the present Report. The principal objection I have to it is, that it leaves the relation between the government and the college precisely where it was. It neither confers an additional power on the legislature, nor does it compel them to do anything which they had no power to do, without such a provision. I do not think it wise to make any change in the Constitution, without something is to be effected—without some new power is granted to the legislature, which it did not possess before.

Another objection which I have is, that it rather invites the legislature to do what I believe it has no power to do; and if it should undertake to exercise such power, it would be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. The contract to which allusion has been made, is a contract which comes within the meaning of the article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts, and they probably would refer to the celebrated Dartmouth College case as an authority. In 1769, the crown of England created a corporation consisting of twelve of the corporators of Dartmouth College, by which the whole management of that institution was intrusted. The college continued to flourish under this charter, fulfilling the benevolent intentions of its founder and benefactors, till in 1816, the legislature of New Hampshire—thinking, as many do now, with respect to the corporation of Harvard College, that the institution could be rendered more extensively useful, by putting it immediately under the control of the State—proceeded to provide that there should be two new boards created. Nine trustees were added to the original twelve. There was also a board of overseers, consisting of twenty-five, having a negative upon the acts of the corporation; and the members of both of these boards are made elective by the governor and council. The corporation of Dartmouth College resisted the act. They contended that it was an invasion of their chartered rights, and that it was an indirect contravention, both of the Constitutions of New Hampshire, and of the United States. They took the case into the courts of New Hampshire, and then, after the decision of the courts of that State went against them, they appealed to the United States court, and, after an argument, conducted by some of the most eminent legal men of the country, and after an investigation by the court, adorned by the names of a Marshall, and a Story, the decision of the New Hampshire court was overruled, and the corporation was restored to its original condition and privileges.

Now, I maintain, that the charter of Harvard College is as strong as the charter of Dartmouth College, in its main features; and having read them both, and carefully compared them together, I put it to any legal gentleman, whether there is any such difference between the corporation of Dartmouth College, and that of Harvard College in 1650, as does not place them both alike under the Constitution of the United States.

Views have been advanced by the chairman of the Committee, and they are advanced also by other individuals, going to show, that the corporation of Harvard College stands on a different footing from that of Dartmouth College, and that it is not within the protection of the Constitution of the United States. I am aware that there are some persons who think that this Convention can exercise a control over this college, which cannot be exercised by the legislature of the Commonwealth; but, Sir, there is no foundation for this idea. The Constitution of the United States has just as much power in a State, acting through a Convention, as it has acting through a legislature, and if any act should be passed by this Convention, if anything should be incorporated into that instrument which is in contravention of the United States Constitution, it would be, just as quickly overruled as it would if it had been done merely by State authority. I know that there are individuals who say that the corporation of Harvard College is a State institution, and they therefore maintain that it is under the control of the State. Now, the phrase "State institution" is a very indefinite phrase—too indefinite to be made the foundation of an argument, without it is more precisely defined. What then is meant by calling it a State institution? Does it mean that the State gave it its charter of incorporation? Some acts of incorporation are contracts, and are, therefore, exempted from all legislative interference. They are not under the control of the State, and are beyond all interference on the part of the government of the State. It must be determined that the corporation is without the control of the Constitution of the United States, before it can be assumed that it can be interfered with. The question, therefore, depends upon the nature and the objects of the corporation that is created. The act of incorporation determines nothing, one way or the other; and if the act of incorporation of Harvard College of 1650, was a contract within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, then, of course, it is protected by that instrument, and is not otherwise under the power and control of the State, than as its members are subject to the laws which apply to all other parts of the community.

The question then arises, whether a power can be deduced on the part of the State in relation to this institution, in consequence of its being a benefactor to the State.

It has, doubtless, conferred many peculiar benefactions upon the government, but it would have been impossible for the college to have proceeded, without the assistance of the State. But, was it ever known that the conferring of a gift carried with it the power of control over the person or body to whom it was made? When was such a thing ever known? If the State has conferred a gift upon the college, it carries with it no control, except so far as the power is deduced from the assumed fact that the State is the founder of the college. The learned chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Knowlton,) maintained that the State was the founder. This assertion has been disputed, and I think it remains doubtful to this day, whether the appropriation which the State made to the college was ever applied to the uses for which it was made, before the donation of John Harvard was applied to set the college in operation.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the existing Constitution of the State does not declare that our ancestors founded Harvard College in 1636, and whether at the Convention of 1779, the corporation and board of overseers did not both assent to the insertion of that declaration into the Constitution of the State.

Mr. BRAMAN. The words "our ancestors," may refer to the State, or they may not. But I will waive the point whether the State founded the college or not, because the mere fact that a person, or state, or government, founded an institution, does not necessarily imply that it has the control of it. The doctrine of the common law upon the subject, is this: that the founder retains the right of visitation over the institution as long as he chooses to do so, but he has the right to part with it at any time. He retains the power as long as he lives, and then, I believe, it descends to his heirs, unless he otherwise makes provision for its disposal. But, I say, he has the power to devolve it upon any other body, and when he has disposed of it, whether to an individual, to a state, or to a board of trustees, the whole power is gone from the founder. Mr. Wheelock founded the institution of Dartmouth College, and, as such, had the right of visitation and control. But he chose to part with the power and privilege, and the moment he did that, he had no more authority to meddle with the institution, than the Emperor of China has. And, I maintain, that the State can just as well part with its power over a corporation as an individual can. Cannot the State sell, or convey away property, by gift? Cannot she also dispose of her corporate franchises? I believe this doctrine is maintained by all the writers upon common law. So the fact, if admitted, that the State founded Harvard College, does not give it any right of control over the corporation, provided it has parted with its power. And I maintain that it parted with all its power when it gave the charter of 1650. If that act does not convey complete control to that body over the college, then there are no terms which can convey control; and if it is not a contract within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, it is not in the power of language to frame a contract.

But, it is said, that the Constitution of 1780 gave to the State all the power over the college which might have been exercised by the provincial government. That Constitution says:—

"Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the legislature of this Commonwealth from making such alterations in the government of the said university, as shall be conducive to its advantage, and the interest of the republic of letters, in as full a manner as might have been done by the legislature of the late province of the Massachusetts Bay."

Now, I think, by a fair construction, that the language refers only to the board of overseers. But, suppose it extends to the corporation also; then the question is, what was the power which the provincial government might have exercised over the college? for it is necessary to determine the amount of the one, in order to ascertain the other.

I ask, first, what power did the provincial government exercise? It never exercised any. From the first moment that the charter was granted, up to its reestablishment in 1707, there was no act of interference by the legislature, until the Revolution which severed this country from Great Britain. The college went on during that time, and acted according to the powers conferred upon it by the charter, and as independent of the government as though the government had not existed.

Friday.]

HARVARD COLLEGE. — BRAMAN — HOOPER — BUTLER.

[July 15th.

But I ask, secondly, was it a power which the government attempted to exercise, by one or more of its departments. It was attempted to be exercised, but the attempt failed. In 1722, I believe, two members of the academic faculty applied for seats in the corporation. The corporation rested their defence upon the charter, and maintained that that instrument confined the membership of the corporation to residents of the college. This measure originated not merely from a desire of the petitioners to obtain seats upon the board, as a desire to remove some obnoxious members from the corporation. This board resisted, and, at length, an appeal was taken to the general court, and the legislature passed resolves favorable to the views of the petitioners. They were concurred in by the council, but were negatived by the governor.

It is maintained, by some, that this attempt on the part of the provincial government, shows the views they entertained, respecting the liability of the corporation to their control, and determines that the government entertained opinions in favor of its powers over that body, which, though rightly possessed, failed to be carried into accomplishment from motives of expediency.

But, let me ask, what was the nature of this power, attempted to be exercised over Harvard College? It was, to all intents and purposes, a judicial power. It undertook to fix the construction of the charter. It undertook to interpret the law, and that law a contract, and to depose some individuals of their franchises, and to admit others in their places.

Now, it belongs to courts of law, and not to the legislature, to exercise judicial powers. I am aware that there are cases where laws are ambiguous and of doubtful construction, and a legislature sometimes passes other laws to remove that ambiguity and doubt; but such laws are, to all intents and purposes, new laws, and not an attempt to ascertain the intention of previous legislatures.

Now, if this was a judicial exercise of power, it does not belong to our legislature, because the Constitution of the Commonwealth expressly makes a distinction between the powers of the legislature and the powers of the judiciary, and says that the one shall not exercise the functions of the other. Of course, therefore, as it was a judicial act, it does not belong to our legislature or to any other.

Let me also ask, whether it was a power which might be rightly exercised, according to the views of morality, for doubtless it refers to such a power as this, if it refers to any power at all. And what is this power? It has no right to annul the charter of any corporation, or to impair it to any extent whatsoever.

"When," declares Judge Story, "a private eleemosynary corporation is thus created by the charter of the crown, it is subject to no other control on the part of the crown, than what is expressly or implicitly reserved by the charter itself. Unless a power be reserved for this purpose, the crown cannot, in virtue of its prerogative, without the consent of the corporation, alter or amend the charter, or divest the corporation of any of its franchises, or add to, or diminish the number of trustees, or remove any of the members, or change, or control the administration of the charter, or compel the corporation to receive a new charter."

I believe Judge Story says, in another place, that the idea that a state cannot interfere with the charter of a corporation, is one of the most stubborn doctrines of the common law.

This was the contemporaneous construction, in 1650, when the charter was given, and again, in 1707, when the charter was reestablished: that a power which gave a charter could not resume it, and could not impair any of its first rights whatsoever.

I am not forgetful of the fact that the parliament of England possesses an omnipotent power; that it has the power of annulling corporate rights, and of violating contracts. It is so, because there is no authority to restrain the exercise of such power, if it chooses to exercise it. It might annul the charters of both Cambridge and Oxford tomorrow, if it saw fit to do so. But it will probably not exercise such power, because it would create a sensation which would endanger the stability of the government.

But while it is admitted that parliament possesses that power, it is also firmly maintained that it has no moral right to exercise it. Should it proceed to violate a charter, it would be considered as an exercise of tyrannical power, and a flagrant outrage upon all principles of morality.

In 1783, an attempt was made by parliament to alter the charter of the East India Company. But it met with strenuous opposition, and failed. It was styled, in the petition of the city of London, not only a high and dangerous violation of the charter of the Company, but a total subversion of all the principles of the law and constitution of the country. It was called, by Lord Thurlow, a rash, atrocious violation of private property, which cut every Englishman to the bone. And this was said, be it remembered, at a time when it was admitted that parliament had omnipotent power.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester. I would ask the gentleman whether the English law places the East India Company upon the same basis as that of literary and charitable institutions; and whether there does not exist a distinct right as to such institutions, which is not recognized by the law of England in regard to business corporations?

Mr. BRAMAN. I think there is a distinction, but it is all in favor of private corporations. They have much less power over such corporations, than they have over the East India Company.

Now, the provincial government might possibly have possessed and exercised the same power, within its sphere, that parliament had. It will be recollected that the colonial government maintained that it had, within its own sphere, powers as transcendent as the parliament of England had within its sphere. But suppose that it had this power, it had no more right to exercise it than the omnipotent parliament had.

It is a power which does not belong to our legislature, and which is against all authority, all right, and all justice.

But I have another argument upon this subject. The Constitution of 1780 confirmed to Harvard College its privileges and franchises. It is declared—

"That the President and Fellows of Harvard College, in their corporate capacity, and their successors in that capacity, their officers and servants, shall have, hold, use, exercise and enjoy, all the powers, authorities, rights, liberties, privileges, immunities and franchises, which they now have, or are entitled to have, hold, use, exercise and enjoy; and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed unto them, the said president and fellows of Harvard College, and to their successors, and to their officers and servants, respectively, forever."

It confirmed all their liberties and all their franchises. Now, what is a franchise? Blackstone defines it thus:—

"It is likewise a franchise for a number of persons to be incorporated and subsist as a body politic; with a power to maintain perpetual succession, and do other corporate acts; and each individual member of such corporation is also said to have a franchise or freedom."

It seems, then, that when the Constitution confirmed these liberties and franchises of Harvard College, it confirmed franchises which it is not in the power of a legislative body to take away. And it was intended as a protection of the college against any such interference. Would it have been wise and consistent for them, after having thrown this shield around the college, to have put another paragraph into the Constitution which should proceed to surrender up the corporation to the mercy of the legislature.

[Here the chairman's hammer fell, the half hour allotted to each member to speak, having expired.]

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River, moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, with the view to a temporary suspension of the operation of the order adopted this morning, limiting speeches to half an hour.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes, 106; noes, 86—agreed to, and

The Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported progress, and leave was granted to the Committee to sit again.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, moved a suspension of the rule limiting speeches to half an hour, for this day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Worcester, so as to suspend the operation of the rule altogether.

Let us, said Mr. Butler, either have the rule enforced, or let us abrogate it.

Mr. HOOPER. My object in moving that the Committee rise, was, that the rule might be so far suspended, as to give to gentlemen on each side of the question, an equal chance of being heard.

The PRESIDENT. By the rules of the Convention, the question on suspending the operation of the order, is not debatable.

Mr. WESTON, of Duxbury, moved that the question on the motion of the gentleman from Worcester, be taken by yeas and nays. The motion did not prevail, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HOOPER moved to amend the motion of

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE. — BUTLER — RANTOUL — BRAMAN.

[July 16th.

the gentleman from Worcester, so far as to give to the gentleman who was last in possession of the floor in Committee of the Whole, the same length of time to reply, as was allowed to the chairman of the committee on Harvard College, who preceded him, to address the Committee.

Mr. ALLEN accepted the amendment, as a modification of his motion.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the order limiting the duration of speeches, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on suspending the rule for a limited time.

Mr. SCHOULER. Does the Chair decide, that the order adopted this morning is one of the rules of this body, requiring a vote of two-thirds for its suspension?

The PRESIDENT. It is a standing order, and will require a vote of two-thirds for its suspension.

Mr. RANTOUL, of Beverly. It seems to me, Sir, that this is a very simple matter, that it is but a matter of simple justice, to allow the gentleman representing the minority of the Committee, the same opportunity to explain the views of the minority, that was accorded to the gentleman who represents the majority of the Committee, to explain the views of the majority. I hope, therefore, the rule will be suspended, so far as to allow the gentleman from Danvers an opportunity to conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition, as modified, is that the order adopted this morning be so far suspended, that the gentleman who last addressed the Committee of the Whole, be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, the Convention again resolved into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Sumner, for Marshfield, in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the subject of

Harvard College.

Mr. BRAMAN. I am very sorry to have been the occasion of so much inconvenience on the part of the Convention; I began to wish I had continued to preserve the silence which I had hitherto preserved in the Convention, for I perceive that I am likely to acquire a good deal more notoriety than fame.

When I was cut off in my remarks by the falling of the hammer, I was proceeding to controvert the remark, that the legislature exercised, or might exercise, the power of government over Harvard College. Now, Sir, they never exercised any power over that institution, and they never attempted to exercise any power over it, except that of a judicial character.

Hamilton, in the Federalist, says: "The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex."

Now, Sir, what is the use of applying any governing power to these institutions, except to restrain abuses? It was competent for the legislature to make any provision, almost, in relation to that college, because there was no power to circumscribe its action. They had no power to set the action of a legislative body aside, if its inter-ferences with the corporation of Harvard College had been ever so numerous. Yet, it would be just as unreasonable to attempt to justify the legislature in its acts of interference with that corporation, as it would to justify the English government in its acts of oppression to its subjects at home and its subjects abroad. It would be just as absurd in one case as in the other. How many acts of wrong make a right? If the first interference with the charter of Harvard College was wrong, then any subsequent act of interference was also wrong.

It may be maintained, that the acquiescence of the corporation in the acts of interference upon the part of the government, were a tacit admission by that corporation, of the right of the legislature to interfere. But gentlemen must remember that Harvard might have acquiesced because it had no power to resist. It might have forborne opposition to the interference of the legislature, because its opposition would have been unavailing. It must also be borne in mind that Harvard College was the weaker power, and that it was dependent upon the beneficence of the State for its pecuniary means to carry on its operations. It might naturally be expected, that, although they would regard the interference upon the part of the legislature as improper, yet that they would succumb to an interference upon the part of the State, to a greater or less extent, because the two parties were united together in a contract—one strong and the other weak,—the latter having no power to restrain any exercise of power upon the latter. But to justify acts of this sort would lead to every possible enormity.

But, to proceed. In 1657, additional powers were conferred upon these corporations. They were authorized to do certain things which they had not before been authorized to do. Among other things, a board of overseers was recognized. They accepted the act very cheerfully, although they well knew that they could not have prevented its formation if it had been unacceptable. I do not know of but one act of resistance upon their part, which was in 1676, when this charter was attempted to be enforced upon them, and they refused it.

Subsequent to this period, another act was passed, empowering the president and fellows of Harvard College to impose upon delinquent students a fine, not to exceed ten shillings, and stripes, not exceeding ten in number. This act was considered as enlarging the privileges of the corporation most essentially, because it suited the stern and rigid temper of the men of those times. It conformed with the habits of those men who had lived under monarchical institutions. This privilege was made use of very frequently, and under circumstances of very great solemnity. It would even be inflicted in the chapel, after a sermon, and then the president would proceed to pray that the infliction might be sanctified to the offender. [Laughter.]

There was also another interference which has been alluded to, and one which was submitted to, certainly not because it was considered a proper interference. When the overseers of the corporation, with the instructors and students, were called before the legislature to receive a reprimand. Now this was such an act of interference—so flagrant in its nature—that I suppose no one would claim it as a precedent for interference upon the part of the legislature. I suppose no one would claim it as a precedent, even if the act had been comparatively reasonable and moderate. Suppose that now, we should summons the president, professors, and students of Harvard College, to appear before us for any such purpose. We might call the spirits, but would the spirits come when they were called? When such a summons shall be given by our legislature, like Cowper, I should "like to be there to see."

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester, (interposing). I desire to ask the gentleman whether, when the corporation, officers, students, &c., of Harvard College were summoned by the general court to appear before them, they did not appear—thus acknowledging the right of the general court to make the demand?

Mr. BRAMAN. They appeared, but it was not necessarily an act of acquiescence. It was rather an act of submission. It was a submission to a power which they could not resist. They submitted to a power they could not control, because they did not dare to do otherwise. But, Sir, I should like to see such an act enforced now. I should like to see the board of overseers, with its distinguished members of church and state, preceded by the president of Harvard College, with his academical gown, closely following in his footsteps the venerable chief justice of the Commonwealth, bearing in his presence the awful majesty of the law. Nay, I would follow the professors and tutors, fresh from their literary and scientific pursuits; and, bringing up the rear, the whole corps of students, wondering at that mysterious and awful power, before which they with their instructors, were to be brought. Well, Sir, all are marched in solemn procession into this hall, to receive, perhaps, the reprimand of the late speaker of the House of Representatives, or of the president of this Convention. Sir, I should like to see how our worthy president would compose himself to his situation. I would like to see him summon dignity adequate to the occasion. I would like to see whether he would proceed to administer that reprimand with all the self-possession and grace with which he performs the ordinary duties of the Chair.

But I presume, as I have said, that with regard to the interference of the legislature in this instance, no one would quote it as a precedent.

But there was another act of interference upon the part of the legislature, to which I wish again to allude. That was, the attempt to force the charter upon the corporation, in 1672. The corporation refused to receive it. Now, I wish to say that if the interference by the legislature with the corporation of Harvard College upon this occasion, was an act of contemporaneous construction upon one side, the resistance of the corporation to the act of the government, was a contemporaneous construction upon the other. One may very well balance the other, and I let them pass for what they are worth. I have only to say, that these are the only acts of interference under the colonial government. One is so flagrant, that no one would think of quoting it as a precedent, and the other was resisted by the corporation. That is the whole amount of control which the colonial government exercised over the corporation of Harvard College.

Let me ask, what would be gained by the change contemplated by the introduction of the Report of the Committee on Harvard University, and the legislature should proceed to elect members of the board of the corporation of that university, instead of leaving them to perpetuate themselves by election, as now. Would any more able and devoted men be secured to the college, than now compose that corporation? The members that have always, and do now, compose that board, are some of the ablest men in the community, and their fitness to discharge the high trust reposed in them, has never been disputed. No set of men could be elected by the legislature, that would have more needed wisdom to discharge the high obligations which are imposed upon them, and their fidelity and devotion to the interests of the college also are just as freely acknowledged as is their ability. I believe there has been no complaint in this respect. I do not suppose that their places could be supplied by persons who would be more untiring in their exertions to discharge the high trusts which are reposed in them. Being possessed of such a character themselves, the board would be more likely to choose persons of similar ability and devotion, to serve under them, and thus we have as good security as the nature of human things and the allotment of humanity admits, that there would be perpetuated such a body of men to all future generations, as would satisfy all the reasonable wants and expectations of the community. I suppose if the legislature were to elect the corporation, it would be required that it should embody as good a representation as it could, of the various religious denominations of the Commonwealth. These, it is well known, are very numerous, much more numerous than could be exhibited in a corporation consisting of seven members at any one time. Let me mention some of them. There are the Unitarians, naturalists and supernaturalists; the Congregationalists, old and new school, and intermediate schools; the Baptists, Calvinistic and Free Will; the Methodists, Protestant, Episcopal, and Protestant Non-Episcopal; the Universalists, the Restorationists, and the ultra; the Roman Catholics, and Quakers, not to mention numerous other sects existing in the Commonwealth, composed of the odds and ends and scraps of all other denominations, going under the fanciful name and delectable appellation of Come-Outers. [Laughter.] All these, of course, would claim some sort of representation in the corporation of Harvard University, because, being a State institution, as contended for by gentlemen here, of course they must have their share in the representation. Suppose all should be arranged in this respect. What should be done in regard to filling up the departments of instruction. These are so numerous that they might exhibit a good specimen of the great variety of the religious sentiment of the State. What shall be done with the Hollis Professorship of Divinity, at Harvard? How will you divide that? That is a professorship that acts more powerfully upon the theological opinions and character of the students, than all of the other professorships put together. What shall be done with that? Shall there be a coalition formed in regard to it? Political coalitions of two or more parties, for the purpose of dividing political offices among them, will answer very well in the State, but how are you to divide the Hollis Professorship of Harvard University? What is one fish, or one loaf, among so many? The only practicable method would be to select the professors annually, semi-annually, quarterly, or monthly, and let the students select their opinions according to the assortment which these various professorships would present them. I suppose, also, that gentlemen would require that political sentiments should be represented in the department of instruction, as well as the religious sentiments. Not long ago, a very distinguished candidate for a professorship at Harvard, was rejected by the board of overseers, because he had advanced some obnoxious opinions in regard to the Hungarian Revolution. The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) said the other day that he was not removed for his obnoxious political opinions, but for his ignorance and incompetency. I think, to charge such a body of men as the corporation of Harvard University, with choosing an ignorant and incompetent man to fill one of its departments of instruction, is a very strong assertion for the gentleman from Natick to make. The gentleman said that he was rejected. He told us in another form, rather, that he was rejected because he made a false statement of the truth. A fact is truth. Put it in another form, and it means an untrue statement of truth.

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE. — BRAMAN — WILSON — BOUTWELL.

[July 15th.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I wish to explain by saying that I did not mean what the gentleman says. I meant precisely and exactly what I said then, and now repeat, that Francis Bowen was rejected for the office to which he was nominated, for three reasons: in the first place, for his sentiments and opinions; in the second place, for his ignorance of history; and in the third place, for mis-stating and mis-quoting history; the truth of which, I am ready, here or elsewhere, to prove.

Mr. BRAMAN, of Danvers. The expression which the gentleman used, struck me so forcibly at the time, that I am pretty sure I recollect it. I am quite sure that he said he was rejected for ignorance and incompetency. He says now that he was rejected for ignorance. Then, I repeat again, that it is a strong assertion for the gentleman from Natick to make. Let me say farther, that the members comprising the corporation of Harvard University—I mean no disparagement to the gentleman from Natick, for whom I entertain the highest respect—are quite as competent as he is to judge whether a candidate for a professorship at Harvard is an ignorant or incompetent man. Was there ever any historian, or narrator of any portion of history whatsoever, who has not been detected in mistakes; and I have no doubt that if Hume and Gibbon were alive, and should advance opinions obnoxious to the ascendant party in the State, that they would be rejected by the board of overseers if they were nominated by the corporation of Harvard, on account of ignorance and incompetency. I have not the least doubt, if Macauley should be presented as a candidate for a professorship, if it was known that any of his opinions would not agree with those of the dominant party, that he would be rejected also for his ignorance and incompetency, for the reason that some individuals have criticized his history, and detected mistakes, which they consider as important. All historians commit mistakes, and it cannot be otherwise. They belong to the imperfections of humanity. But, however this may be, there is no doubt that a coincidence of opinion with the dominant party would be considered as an indispensable qualification for a candidate. Men would be chosen to fill departments of instruction, on account of their political opinions, in preference to those who are much more competent to fill the offices, because they were of a different persuasion. The numerous offices of instruction at Harvard, would present an invitation to patronage too inviting to be resisted, and violent partisans would be rewarded with places of instruction in the university, for whom there was no room in the political department. Stump speakers would teach stump rhetoric from the chair of oratory. There would be professors of logic, whose speeches would be of no other use than to make very excellent specimens of false reasoning. The fair sex, not always having a fair representation at the university, knock at the doors of the Convention for admission. I mean the male portion of the sex. [Laughter.] They have already knocked at the doors of the Convention, and they have knocked at the doors of the university also. I know that the Convention have treated the application of the fair sex in rather an ungallant manner, notwithstanding the earnest advocacy of Mr. Lucy Stone, and Miss Wendell Phillips, Esq. I should not wonder if, in some future time, and the progress of that political perfection about which we hear so much, that the women shall be admitted not only to the right of voting, but also to a share in the public offices of the other sex, and along the line of illustrious names of those who have presided over the university at Harvard, would be the names of Abby, Ann, Lucy; and then when we shall have a bloomer at the head of the university, it would indeed be entitled to the appellation of alma mater, in more senses than one. [Laughter.] Let me say, in conclusion, that I would caution gentlemen very earnestly against doing anything which would commit, or seem to commit, the State to a violation of public faith. The character of Massachusetts for integrity and adherence to justice, has always been high. She has now repaid her obligations, and her bonds are confided in now, as the most valued securities in the world. This reputation for integrity ought to be dear to all her sons, who, while they take pride in her industry and enterprise, in her literary and historical ability, hold dearer than all, her character for uprightness. Let there be no spot on the fair garment of her renown. Let there be nothing done, or attempted to be done, that shall give our posterity cause for emotions of regret and shame; and may her name go down to future generations adorned with every virtue which shall cause the heart to swell; and may the Constitution ever be held in grateful and honored remembrance.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I shall not detain the Convention so long as to prevent the question being taken before the usual hour for adjournment arrives. This question is within a small compass, and does not, to any considerable extent, involve the early history of the university. We propose, by this resolution, to declare that the legislature shall have power to do all that may be done by the people, in reference to Harvard University, and we claim that the people may do everything within the limit of supreme and complete sovereignty, except so far as their power is controlled by the Constitution of the United States. That instrument declares, that no State shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." We propose, by this resolution, embodied in the Constitution of the State, to authorize the legislature to march boldly up to that line, without, however, authorizing them to go one step farther.

Now, then, the propriety of the resolution is in this: that there is at present some doubt on

Friday,]

HARVARD COLLEGE.—BOUTWELL—BRIGGS.

[July 15th.

the question whether the Constitution of the State authorizes the legislature to go thus far, or not. Therefore, if the people, in their Constitution, have imposed any restriction upon the legislature, we intend hereby to remove it. We do not intend to harm the college in any manner; but propose to place in the legislature the authority which now resides in the people. This is a plain proposition. Therefore, it does not involve the consideration of the question, whether the college has rights under a contract, or not. I have an opinion on that point. It differs entirely from the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Danvers, (Mr. Braman,) and I think that in a word or two, I can state the elements on which an opinion may be formed by any individual. It is a plain principle, that that which a person produces or creates, is his own. The State created Harvard College; the Constitution declares that it was founded in 1636, two years before the bequest of John Harvard. The record is, that our ancestors created it; the fact that the general court, in 1636, appropriated four hundred pounds for a school or college at Newton, afterwards Cambridge, identifies our ancestors, constitutionally speaking. That is the declaration. The general court created this institution and endowed it. Who shall control it? The general court and their successors, the people and government of Massachusetts, or the corporation of Harvard College? I take it that what our ancestors, as the government of this State, created, we, the governors of the State to-day, control and use, unless we have surrendered that control. I ask gentlemen to consider this plain proposition of law and of right. For there is no difference, whatever men may suppose who have devoted themselves to the consideration of particular topics, there is no difference between law, the perfection of human reason, and that attribute or rule of right and of justice which the Supreme Creator has implanted in the breasts of all. What is this rule? It is, that what we have created we may use, and that that which we have created we may use forever, unless we have surrendered its use into other hands.

Mr. BRAMAN, of Danvers. The gentleman says, that what a person has created, it is his to control entirely. I would like to ask him, if a person who has created a thing has not a right to part with it by giving it away.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will come to that soon. Those who claim that the right of control has been surrendered, stand in the place of grantees, and it is for them to show explicitly, definitely, and accurately, when that surrender was made. I would ask the gentleman from Danvers, to point to the time when, and the manner in which, that surrender was made on the part of the Commonwealth. Throughout the whole period of its history, it has never surrendered its right to control the college at Cambridge. Trace the records all along through the Colony, the Province, the State, covering a period of more than two hundred years, and you will find nothing to show that we have surrendered our control. Therefore, if we have not surrendered it, it stands to-day. And it is not for us to show the negative, but for those who contend that it has been surrendered, to make that fact appear. They will find that a very difficult point.

I have a word to say to the gentleman in reference to the authorities upon this point, and especially in regard to the Dartmouth College case. That case I have not read for some time, yet I think I can state the principle upon which the decision of the supreme court of the United States rested. President Wheelock created an institution in 1769, afterwards known as Dartmouth College. In that case the supreme court judged, as we judge to-day, that that which an individual has created, he has a right to control, and inasmuch as President Wheelock had invested that college in his successors forever, there was a contract; and the State of New Hampshire could not come in and violate it.

Now, we stand upon the doctrine of a contract; and inasmuch as our colonial government established this institution, it is not in the power of any body to come in and say we shall not control it. I do not propose to take anything from Harvard College which they have. If the doctrine of a contract gives them exclusive control over that institution, they will have it if we pass this resolution and the people adopt it. But the point of difficulty which we wish to relieve, is this. There may be some doubt as to whether the people, by their Constitution, have conferred the authority upon the legislature to deal with Harvard College, to the extent, and in the manner, that the people themselves may deal with it. We purpose to remove all difficulty upon that point, by giving to the legislature power to do what the people of the State have the right to do, and nothing more. That is safe, proper, wise, and just. Because, whatever may be said of the character of Harvard College,—and I am not here to denounce it, or make any imputation upon it,—I know, well enough, that there are men on this floor who have been acquainted with it, and who will not endorse the doctrine of the gentleman from Danvers, by any means, either in public or in private. They will not endorse it, Sir; and I believe there are those connected with the college to-day, who were as much alarmed two years ago, at the proposition to make the overseers elective by the State, as the gentleman from Danvers is in respect to the corporation, and those same gentlemen are now satisfied that that was a wise and proper measure. The cause of education has been promoted by it; and I look to this institution, notwithstanding the position which I occupy is somewhat hostile, perhaps, as the apex of the educational system of this Commonwealth. And in order that it may be free from sectarianism, and from the control of any party or sect, we put it on the basis on which our common schools rest. Nor will it happen that all the odds and ends of civilization and society will come in and control this college. Gentlemen know well enough the character of Massachusetts; the people will regulate this institution as they regulate other institutions in the State. Gentlemen need not be alarmed. Sir, there will be no coalition in reference to the university at Cambridge. And if there were, it would not be a very disastrous thing, by any means. It might happen, that by bringing together in that institution, men of different opinions in the government, in the discipline and education of the young men, that some broader and better ideas of humanity might be acquired. I am, therefore, in favor of the passage of the resolution, not because it interferes with any of the rights of the college,—for it does not,—but because it gives to the legislature that power which we now believe resides in the people; and we trust that it will be exercised for the good of the Commonwealth, and the advancement of learning in the university.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I had the honor to be a member of the Committee which reported this resolution, and, though I was not present at the meeting when the resolution, was adopted, I was at a previous one, when, I believe, substantially the same proposition was agreed to. This is a matter environed with a good many difficulties, if we choose to enter upon the ground where those difficulties exist. But, I believe, it was the opinion of the Committee, and I concur with the gentleman who last spoke, that this resolution would avoid difficulties which would open upon us if we advanced farther, and not do any violence or wrong to the corporation of the college, and, at the same time, assert all the rights of the people in respect to it. Sir, my wish with respect to the Cambridge College, was this: that just so far as the State was concerned, we should cut her adrift; just sever, in an amicable manner, all connection with her as a State, and let the college stand as the other colleges do, upon her own foundation, and be left to her own conduct and management. But it was found, and I think any gentleman who will look the matter in the face, will find, that it was somewhat difficult to do this; certainly the Committee could not see their way clear to do it. They, in their labors, which were repeated and earnest, came to the result which you find in the Report, and I concur with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that that leaves the matter substantially where it is now, though, perhaps, under a more clear and distinct declaration; that is, the resolution declares that the legislature shall have the power over this institution, which, by the Constitution of the United States, it may have. Sir, it has that now, as I apprehend. But this is a clear, plain, distinct declaration to that effect. Now, Sir, what that power is, I do not think we should discuss, and, though the gentleman from Worcester, and the gentleman for Berlin, have stated, learnedly, intelligibly and ably, the subject, yet, let me say that this is not the place to discuss a great constitutional question of this kind, and the discussion is not needed. The gentleman for Berlin says, he is very clear in his opinions on this subject, as I understand, that the State has the power and control over this corporation. It may be so, and it may not be so. It may not be amiss to say, that our predecessors, something like a generation ago, had this same subject before them, and I think they came to a pretty general, if not a unanimous conclusion, that they had no such power as this. They were good men, wise men, learned men in the law, who spoke and acted on that occasion, and they left the matter as we find it. Now, I think we shall do wisely in doing the same thing; and I believe, if this resolution is adopted, it does not infringe upon the rights of the college; and if, hereafter, a legislature shall attempt to exercise the powers which the corporation think they cannot exercise, all that will remain to be done will be, to go into the proper judicial tribunal, and let them settle it. I hope the resolution will pass in the Committee, and that it will pass in the Convention, and, I think it will meet with the approbation and satisfaction of those, of all denominations and politics, who sent us here.

Mr. PARKER, of Cambridge. I wish to ask

Friday,] HARVARD COLLEGE. — PARKER — BRIGGS — BOUTWELL — KNOWLTON — FRENCH — LOTHROP. [July 15th.

of the gentleman from Pittsfield, and the gentleman from Berlin, and the chairman of the Committee, one or all of them, whether they understand—and I wish the one who does understand that this makes any difference, would make the answer—I wish to ask them, whether, if this resolution passes, and is incorporated into the Constitution, it will give the legislature any more power than it will possess, if no action is taken upon the subject?

Mr. BRIGGS. For one, I will answer that I do not think it does. I agree with the gentleman from Berlin, perhaps, in saying, that if the existing Constitution does not confer as full power upon the legislature as the Constitution of the United States would, then this resolution may confer an additional power. My opinion is, that it does confer no power whatever, and that it does not substantially, if at all, change the relation between the State and the college.

Mr. PARKER. I would ask for the understanding of the gentleman from Berlin, on this question, if he has no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand this resolution to confer all the power upon the legislature, which the people of the Commonwealth have, with regard to the institution at Cambridge. The existing Constitution may, or may not, confer all the power which the people of the Commonwealth have. If the gentleman asks what I understand to be the limit of that power, I take it to be this: The power of the people of this Commonwealth is complete and supreme over that institution at Cambridge, except so far as it is limited by that provision of the Constitution of the United States, which says, that no State shall make any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." Therefore, if there be any doubt about the power conferred by the present Constitution, the legislature has permission to march up to the line laid down by the Constitution of the United States, and we remove that doubt, by giving them the power.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that all the power which the people have over this subject, is the power which they have asserted in the provision of the Constitution alluded to, reserving to themselves and the legislature all the power that belonged to the provincial legislature over the subject.

Mr. PARKER. The purport of my inquiry, was, whether, in the opinion of gentlemen, this resolution made any change. If the gentleman from Berlin has no objections, I ask, if in his opinion, this provision inserted in the Constitution, will confer a greater power upon the legislature, than they possess at present, and if so, what that power is?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose the gentleman from Cambridge asks me for an interpretation of the Constitution of the State. I am not quite prepared to give that. I say, that in the minds of some gentlemen, there is a doubt, as to whether the people of the Commonwealth have conferred upon the legislature all the power which the people themselves have, and that this resolution is for the purpose of removing that doubt. If the legislature has not got the power now to march boldly up to the line laid down by the Constitution of the United States, we desire to give that power, by the act of the people.

Mr. PARKER. I asked merely for the personal opinion of the gentleman from Berlin, in relation to the matter, whether this resolution makes any change. I turn to the chairman of the Committee, and ask him.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester. Not being a professor of law, I do not know that I am qualified to answer that question.

Mr. PARKER. I do not ask the question as a matter of right, but I would be glad to have the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. KNOWLTON. I understand the matter as has been stated by my friend, the delegate for Berlin. If there is a power in the hands of the people which is not conferred upon the legislature by the present Constitution, over the institution at Cambridge, we express the opinion, that the legislature has that power, and that they may exercise it. It seems to me, to exist in the Constitution now, rather as a matter of inference, than of express declaration. If it exists there as a matter of inference, then it is to be determined by judicial authority. But, by the resolution, we propose to express an open and explicit declaration in the Constitution, that the legislature has that power, and shall exercise it.

Mr. PARKER. I made the inquiry of gentlemen in favor of the passage of this resolution, for the purpose of ascertaining the views which they individually have upon the subject, in order that I might govern my action as a member of this Convention—not as a professor of law, Sir, but as a member of this Convention—upon the subject matter before the Committee at this time. If this resolution, as put into the form of a constitutional provision, is entirely inoperative and ineffective, giving to the legislature no more power than the legislature at present possesses, then all the objection which I could possibly have to it would be that it is useless. The opinion that I entertain of it myself, after having examined it with all the care of which I am capable, leads me to just that result, that it is entirely inoperative; and, therefore, I can raise no other objection to it. But, if it is unnecessary and useless, that is, to my mind, a sufficient reason why we should not adopt it as an amendment to the Constitution. If I am mistaken in this, I desire to know how far I am mistaken; and for this purpose, I wished to ascertain the individual opinions of gentlemen in relation to the operation of this provision, so as to know, if it is to accomplish something, what it is expected will be accomplished by it, and then I could tell better whether I had any objection to it or not. If it is to accomplish anything, I desire to know what it is to accomplish—what power it is to give beyond that which is already given. Until I know that, of course I do not know whether I object to it or not. With the view which I have of it at present, I have no disposition to detain the Committee with any discussion, farther than to say that my vote will be given against it, because I deem it inoperative and useless.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford. Mr. President: I regret, Sir, that any gentleman upon this floor, any member of this Convention, should undertake to hold up to ridicule the lady and gentleman who had the honor of appearing before the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters. Sir, they need no defender in me; for, if that lady and that gentleman were here, and had an opportunity of defending themselves, I run no risk in saying, that no member of this Convention would envy the position of the delegate from Danvers, (Mr. Braman,) who so irreverently attacked them. Sir, there are gentlemen whose position enables them to say what they please in many places, and no reply can be made. It is not so here. Let me say through you to that gentleman, that, although he may slander them and hold them up to ridicule, and attempt to excite the mirth of this body by saying "Mr. Lucy Stone," and "Miss Wendell Phillips"—he may do that, Sir, but he is powerless to reproach them.

The question being then taken on the adoption of the resolution, on a division, there were—ayes, 125; noes, 31—so it was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved, that the Committee rise and report to the Convention that the resolution under consideration ought to pass.

The motion was agreed to. The President having resumed the chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman, Mr. Sumner, for Marshfield, reported accordingly.

The question was then stated on ordering the resolution to be read a second time.

Mr. LOTHROP, of Boston, moved to amend the resolution, by inserting after the words "Harvard College" the words, "the Board of Trustees of Williams, and the Board of Trustees of Amherst College."

Mr. BRIGGS. As I said before, Sir, I was not present when this resolution was drawn, but my impression is, that its language conforms as nearly as possible to the language of the acts of incorporation of those colleges. The gentleman from Worcester can state how that is; but I understood that it was intended to place her upon the same ground as the other colleges, in this respect, reserving any rights of contract.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester. I will read the language of the charters of those colleges, and if gentlemen will turn to the resolution as printed in document No. 72, they will see that the language of the resolve is almost identical with that of these charters: "that the legislature of this Commonwealth may grant any farther powers to, or alter, limit, annul or restrain, any of the powers vested by this act in the said corporation, as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interests of the said college." The Convention will find that, by turning to the law passed in the year 1793.

Mr. LOTHROP. I see no objection to my amendment on that account, but a farther argument in favor of it, from the fact that the same language is used in the incorporation of those two institutions. If, as has been understood, and as has been stated here by learned legal authority, and by some of the members of the Committee, this resolution does not confer upon the legislature any power over Harvard College but what it now possesses, and if we are to have anything about one college in the Constitution, I would have all colleges put upon precisely the same platform. I would have the recognition of one as distinct as that of the other, and the same power that is now expressed in the acts of incorporation reiterated again in the Constitution, if it is necessary to reiterate it in relation to Harvard College. If the legislature have all the power now which is given to them by this resolve, in relation to the president and fellows of Harvard College, it is unnecessary to make the statement at all; if they have not all this power, then I would, in the recognition of that institution in the Constitution,

Saturday.]

HARVARD COLLEGE, &c. — HOPKINSON — BOUTWELL — GILES — FRENCH.

[July 16th.]

recognize all the others, and place them all upon the same platform. No evil is done, certainly, by the introduction of two other colleges; and we announce the great constitutional fact that all the colleges stand upon the same platform and bear the same relation to the State.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston, refers to a subject different from that under consideration; and therefore, by the rules of the Convention, it is not in order. The subject under consideration, is in relation to Harvard College; and the proposed amendment relates to other colleges.

Mr. LOTHROP. I submit to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. I propose to amend the resolve by striking out the words "advancement of learning," and inserting in lieu thereof, the words "best interests of the college," so that it would read as follows:—

The legislature shall forever have full power and authority, as may be judged needful for the best interests of the college, to grant any farther powers to, or alter, limit, annul, or restrain, any of the powers now vested in the president and fellows of Harvard College: provided, the obligation of contracts shall not be impaired; and shall have the like power and authority over all corporate franchises hereafter granted for the purposes of education in this Commonwealth.

The object of this amendment will be apparent. It is to carry out precisely the intention expressed by gentlemen here upon this floor, who tell us that the resolve under consideration is to put Harvard College upon the same footing with the other colleges; and I find that in regard to Amherst College, the language is precisely that which I have incorporated into the amendment. The extract from the law which has been read by the gentleman from Worcester, says, such powers "as shall be judged necessary to promote the best interests of the said college." I have used the words "the college," omitting the word "said." I do not propose to make an argument upon this point, but I do propose to say, that if the intention is to put them all upon the same footing, and if the only reason why such an amendment as was proposed by my colleague who sits opposite, (Mr. Lothrop,) should not be adopted, is, that it is unnecessary, inasmuch as the language used was intended to be the same as the language of the other charters, then it is well enough to conform to that language. Now, Sir, it may be asked, perhaps, whether there is any substantial difference; but it has been thought a sufficient answer to that question, to say that there may be a difference. For that reason, it was deemed proper to adopt a provision in the Constitution which it seems is generally understood to leave the college precisely where it is, but which some gentlemen think may make some change, but what change they are now unprepared to state. I do conceive that there may be difference, and that difference consists in this: the legislature, in order to carry out the Constitution practically, must act in reasonable conformity to the design of the power which is granted in the Constitution; and there might be legislation very diverse from "the interests of the college" covered up by some general idea of promoting the "advancement of learning" in a general sense; legislation which would not be for the interests of the college, and so palpably so that the court would feel bound to set it aside. It appears to me, that if the intention is to put all the colleges upon the same platform, it is expedient and proper to adopt this amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose the proper interests of a college are to promote learning, so that we propose to come to the result directly, by saying, that the legislature shall have power to make all such rules as may be necessary to promote the interests of learning. It might happen,—I do not think it would happen, but it might happen,—that in the judgment of some people, the interests of a particular college would be somewhat different from the interests of learning; and for that reason, I do not want to leave that question open. All that we want of a college, is to promote the interests of learning, and, for that reason, we desire to say in our Constitution just what we mean; so that if, in the judgment of anybody, the interests of a college should happen to differ from the interests of learning, they could not have an opportunity to put that construction upon the provision.

Mr. GILES. I think that my colleague who presented this amendment, upon a full examination of the subject, and reflection, would deem it unnecessary. He would be satisfied that the same object is already attained; for, as I understand it, the very amendments which he now proposes to put in, were left out because they were already in the Constitution, in relation to Harvard College. In the proviso of the present Constitution, which was referred to your Committee, you have provided that "nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the legislature of this Commonwealth from making such alterations in the government of the said university as shall be conducive to its advantage and the interest of the republic of letters." That stands now, and is to stand.

The Constitution makes it the special duty of the legislature to cherish that university, and indeed to cherish all our institutions of learning of every kind. In looking through the previous charters of Harvard College, my friend will find the expression, "for the advancement of learning," a good Baconian phrase, "invented," if you choose, by Bacon, and immortalized by the work bearing that name, or upon that subject, which has made his fame as high, as solid, and as immovable as Mont Blanc, or Mount Atlas, or any other mountain whose summit glistens in the sunlight shed upon its everlasting snows. It is a good phrase, and I would not strike it out. It directs the legislature directly, and at once, to the point mentioned by my friend for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) that is, "for the advancement of learning." We do not wish to cherish Harvard College, or any other institution of the kind, for any other purpose. That is the polar star of its destiny. I believe, therefore, that the acts of future legislatures, as referring to this institution, will not only have to be "for the advancement of learning," but for the benefit of that university, as far as that university exists for the benefit of learning; and I understand that to be its object—meaning by "learning," of course, the broad, catholic sense which was given to it by our forefathers, which included divinity first, then law, and the classics, and mathematics, and Hebrew, and all good learning, which is summed up in the fifth chapter of the Constitution, in language which is not exceeded by any sentence that ever was constructed in the English tongue. That paragraph alone has brought more honor to Massachusetts, where it has been seen and understood, than all the blue books that any legislature, or succession of legislatures, have made in ten years,—not to disparage the legislature, but to exalt it. It is a monument of the wisdom, and of the purity of language, and of the eloquence of expression, used by our forefathers. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Boston will not move to strike out this expression. I really think that the resolution, as it is, embraces the whole object, and is sufficiently definite to guide the whole action of the legislature. If there were time, and the occasion required it, and I felt a disposition to use my half hour, I should like to say something upon it; but, I see that the resolution is likely to be adopted as it is; and as that is my desire, I will not farther detain the Convention.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. It was not my intention, when I offered this amendment, to substitute a better phraseology than that which I have moved to strike out, because I am equally as partial to it as the gentleman who has just sat down. My design was, to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact, which seems to be disputed, that there was a distinction now being made between the colleges, in a resolution professedly drawn up in order that they might all be treated alike, and all placed upon the same footing. It was not, therefore, for the purpose of delaying, or defeating any action upon this subject, but for the purpose of pointing out distinctly, what appears to me, to have the air of an intention to make a distinction, and single out this college for dissection, leaving the others untouched. Had I proposed to strike out the word "hereafter," in the last line but one, it might, perhaps, have effected the same purpose. If it is expedient to make any provision applicable to one college, it is expedient in reference to all.

I do not care to insist particularly upon this amendment, because I do not think that it will make very much difference. My purpose is gained, if I point out the distinction between the language proposed, as applicable to this and the other colleges.

Having made this explanation, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford, moved a suspension of the rules, in order that the question might be taken on the final passage of the resolution, without passing the question over to another day.

Mr. BREED, of Lynn. I hope the gentleman from New Bedford will withdraw that motion for the present.

Mr. FRENCH. I will not press it, if there be objection.

Mr. BREED. I move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention, at half past six o'clock, adjourned.

— SATURDAY, July 16, 1853.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, at nine o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS, &c.—KNOWLTON—WILSON—HALLETT.

[July 16th.

Hour of Meeting on Monday next.

Mr. CRESSY, of Hamilton, moved, that when the Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Final Adjournment of the Convention.

Mr. KNOWLTON, of Worcester, presented the following order, which was adopted:—

Ordered, That be a Committee to consider and report at what time the session of the Convention may be brought to a close.

The following gentlemen were appointed as a Committee for this purpose: Messrs. Knowlton, of Worcester; Schouler and Giles, of Boston; Cushman, of Bernardston; Wilson, of Natick; Burlingame, for Northborough; and Eames, of Washington.

Adjournment this Day.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that the order to adjourn at one o'clock, be modified for this day, so that the time of adjournment be extended to two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Orders of the Day.

On motion by Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day, the first order being the resolve on the subject of General Laws for Corporations.

It was read, as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution, a provision that corporations may be formed under general laws, in all cases where the object of such corporation is attainable under the same; and where provision is thus made by general laws, no corporation shall be formed by special act.

The pending question being on the following substitute, offered by Mr. Davis, of Worcester:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution, a provision that corporations shall not be created by special act, when the object of the incorporation shall be attainable under general laws.

Mr. DE WITT, of Oxford. I would inquire of the Chair, if an amendment to this substitute will be in order.

The PRESIDENT. It will be in order.

Mr. DE WITT. Then, Sir, I move to amend the substitute, by inserting before the word "corporations" the words "manufacturing, mechanical, and banking."

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oxford, (Mr. De Witt,) is designed to embrace manufacturing, mechanical, and banking corporations, and thereby, by that limitation, to admit all other incorporations. I am opposed to that amendment. The proposition, as it is reported by the Committee, contains the general principle, that it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that corporations shall not be created by special act, when the object can be attained by general laws. That, I regard, as a fundamental principle worthy of being incorporated into the Constitution; but if you incorporate into the Constitution a provision that certain trades or occupations shall not have charters, leaving it to be inferred by implication, that all others may, then I think you are making your Constitution a mere specific act of legislation. I think, therefore, that this amendment involves a specification which ought not to be adopted, as a general principle, because it makes a discrimination. It virtually says to the legislature, "you may take care of the interests of certain classes, in this respect, but in regard to the interests of other classes, you shall not interfere." I go for a general principle, to be applied in all cases—either that you should leave to the legislature a discretionary authority, untrammelled by a limitation of this kind, or else leave the matter in the precise manner in which it now stands, permitting every individual to come and get a charter of incorporation, by purchasing a ticket in this lottery of special legislation; because that it is a lottery, every one knows who has been engaged in it, either on his own account, or for the benefit of others. The provision, submitted as a substitute for the resolution first reported, brings the principle directly to our consideration. It seems to me to be one of the best expressed provisions for a fundamental law, that I have yet seen introduced in this Convention.

Now, Mr. President, we have simply to choose between special legislation upon incorporations, in all cases, or general legislation in cases where general legislation will meet the case. The proposition to which I allude, is the one which is offered as a substitute, and which I perceive was offered by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis).

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution, a provision that corporations shall not be created by special act, when the object of the incorporation shall be attainable under general laws.

That is a provision which I desire to see incorporated into the Constitution, and it is the most unexceptionable provision, which, in my judgment, it is possible for words to place there. It expresses exactly what we mean, and that is, if I understand it, that all subject matters of incorporation which can be embraced by provisions of general legislation, shall be provided for, by general laws, which the legislature will be bound to enact, by this injunction in the Constitution. This will take care of all general business concerns, and, on the other hand, whenever a great question arises, which the legislature, in their judgment—subject to the revision of the judiciary if they violate this provision—shall determine is not within the powers of the general law, shall require some special guards or privileges, then the legislature is at liberty to act, by a law to meet the case.

Now, I ask, if there can be any citizen of this Commonwealth, who has no other good in view except that of the Commonwealth, who will stand upon any other principle than that of equality, as here set forth in all business concerns? Can he desire anything more than this? because, if he believes in the propriety of embodying fundamental principles in the Constitution, he has no right to ask for special privileges which are not conferred by general laws; and, in this matter of special incorporations, it is neither more nor less than a special privilege or advantage, conferred upon the few to whom it is given, to the exclusion of all the rest; and to obtain it, outside of a general law, a great public good must be made to appear, which the general law cannot secure.

Mr. President: I am not going into the general question of incorporations. It is one on which I have said and written a great deal, in the course of my life; but I am not considering it now as a question between parties. It comes up here as a fundamental principle; and therefore, I say, in regard to this matter of special incorporations and privileges to enable one man or class of men to carry on any particular occupation or business without giving to all others the same rights, that it is special legislation; and, therefore, when you come to that point, you must do one of two things: either leave it to the will of the legislature to determine in each case that certain persons or classes are, or are not, entitled to these special privileges, and thereby violate the Bill of Rights, or else you must so open this privilege of incorporation, that any and every man may avail himself of it under general laws, giving to the public a proper security, and conforming to proper restrictions.

In regard to this matter of special business incorporations, many persons have held, and still hold, the doctrine that they ought never to have been granted, except under general laws. But if the people, for a long series of years, have failed to check special legislation hitherto, and it has run on to such an extent that benefits and favors have been conferred upon a minority of the community, to the exclusion of a large majority, then the only way is to go on and extend it as far as you can; and for that reason, in regard to this matter, I would at once either establish a constitutional rule that every man, or every class of men, petitioning for any trading charter of incorporation, should have it, as a matter of course; or else I would establish a general rule under which every class of men might incorporate themselves, conforming to the laws in such case provided; and there is not a single special provision which is requisite for a company or association, without exclusive favors, to carry on any trade, occupation, or business, that cannot be incorporated into a general law.

But, it will be asked, "Have we not a general law now in regard to corporations?" True, we have; and what is it? How does it operate? Why, Sir, you will not allow anybody to have a charter of incorporation for anything, unless he petitions the legislature, issues the required order of notice, goes before the committee, employs his counsel, has an agitation about it whenever he is coming in contact with his neighbors; and, finally, either obtains his charter of incorporation, and gets an advantage he is not entitled to have, or loses his time and money if he does not obtain it. Now, what sort of a tribunal is the legislature, to decide upon such matters in individual cases? Why should that body be called upon to determine between the interests of two competitors in trade in some city or village; one party, perhaps, starting the business upon his own real capital, and another upon capital borrowed from his neighbor, or a bank which he has got chartered, each contesting which shall have the advantage over the other? To interfere in such a case, is "special legislation," and that is the very special legislation which is applied to these business cor-

Saturday.]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—HALLETT.

[July 16th.]

porations, manufacturing, trading, mechanical, and banking, and others of a like nature, the result of which is, that the legislature in this Commonwealth has become a complete nuisance. Yes, Sir; your legislature has become a public nuisance. I speak, of course, not of the individuals composing that body; for them, individually, I have the highest respect; and I would say that it is impossible that in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts you can gather together, as the representatives of the towns and cities, four hundred men of whom the majority will not be both honorable and intelligent; but when they get here, they are operated upon by influences of which they are not aware in judging of what is proper and what is improper, fair or unfair, in these matters; and it would be expecting too much of human nature, to suppose that they will not, on some occasions, make mistakes, and do great injustice to petitioners, and great wrong to the public.

They must sometimes give the charter where they ought not to give it, and withhold it where it ought to be granted. Well, how will you avoid that result? Instead of requiring that every individual or association shall come and apply for the privilege of corporation, and that no person shall have it unless he has the special favor of the legislature, you will say, by this proposed amendment, that the legislature shall make a general law, and when it is made, that those who conform to it, shall have the privileges and benefits of it. That is all we need say in regard to any business corporation, all that the legislature need do, and all that the people want. This will not destroy competition, nor check industry. The interest of the public consists in opening all business to competition, and that interest only wants to be guarded against fraud, and the injury which may arise from persons recklessly, unguardedly, or with fraudulent or speculative intention, engaging in those various combinations of business which come to the legislature for charters. Can anything be more simple than to say that general laws shall govern them in all cases? and then make the general law safe and practicable.

If you do this, the legislature, which has well been considered as a nuisance, because of this very kind of endless and conflicting special legislation, will cease to be such, and you will be able to confine its sessions not only to one hundred days, but much within the hundred days. Take, for illustration, the action of the last legislature—and I do not mean to censure that legislature, because I believe that whatever fault is connected with it, was, to some extent, the fault of our system, rather than the fault of the individuals which composed it—I say, if you look over the whole course of proceeding of that legislature, you will find there never was a body that labored harder than they did; but they were working upon the miserable issues brought before them, and they were working upon a false system, namely: that the legislature is assembled every year to legislate upon every man's particular business, instead of framing general laws, and then leaving every man to take care of his own affairs. Unless we strike down this sort of special legislation, the legislature, because of the increasing business and enterprise of the community, which is constantly accumulating, must go on, not only during the one hundred days, but from day to day, and become not only a general court, but an everlasting and unadjourning court, the mere makers, managers, and agents of special incorporations.

Now, as to the practical operation of this principle. Is this sort of legislation wholesome or necessary? I think there are some business men here, within the sound of my voice, who know the practical operation of business interests of this sort, and who begin to perceive that Massachusetts has gone too far in special legislation. Take, as an illustration of the practicability of general laws, one interest, to which the attention of men of science and business, having large commercial views, has been recently directed. I mean the great copper interest of the West, which is growing up in this country. Why, Sir, in a very little while, the copper of the United States, by reason of its great superiority and productiveness, will supersede that of all other parts of the world. In all the great manufacturing marts of the world, the copper of America will become as common, and as much in demand, as the best staple cotton of the United States. But all the resources of this material, which lie all around the northern lakes, are being developed under one simple general law of the State of Michigan, which does not occupy more than a page or two upon the statute book; and there is now invested, under that general law, millions of capital and industry; and I undertake to say, invested with as much security and profit as it could be under any special act of incorporation upon the statute book of Massachusetts; and invested, too, with as much safety and security, not only to the companies, but to the public. One general law has done all this, and nobody has complained of any fraud, or any danger of fraud, from it, except the tendencies of all business to speculation; and the stocks of these companies are just as good in our market, as are the shares of the Lowell Railroad, or the State Street banks. Now, if all this has been done by this young State of Michigan, having these rich resources within her bosom, why cannot the same thing be done by the old, experienced, and intelligent State of Massachusetts?

I say, Mr. President, there cannot an argument be fairly raised against the proposition that general laws should be made, to enable persons to associate together for the purpose of performing all business transactions which can be performed under general laws. What gentleman contradicts that proposition? No one can.

What do you need to provide for in these general laws? You want simply to give corporations the power of succession, that vital principle that will never let them die out; you want to alter the mode of administration, in regard to the real estate which may belong to them, so that when one member of the corporation dies, it shall not work the dissolution of the corporation. These are fundamentally the whole principles which you need to insert into these general laws, with, of course, proper guards and securities to the public, and especially to labor. Now, in regard to this last point of absorbing real estate into these incorporations, I want to say a word, for I am a practical man, and when propositions are presented to me, they do not strike my mind very favorably, unless I see something practical in them. Hence, when I have heard in this discussion of women's rights, very learned gentlemen elaborating themselves upon it, I have wondered why they could not think of one practical fact, by turning their attention to which, they could do more good to the women than they can by talking this enthusiastic nonsense all their lives. I refer to the subject of woman's dower. That is a practical subject, but this discussion as to whether women shall participate in politics, or whether she shall have the exclusive monopoly of a certain branch of medicine, is all without point, use, or meaning. But when we talk about a woman's dower, and her right to have it secured to her, in all cases, we are talking of something which affects her directly.

Well, Sir, how stands this matter here in Massachusetts. There lies upon your table a report from the Secretary of State, showing that four hundred millions of the property of Massachusetts is invested in corporations! Many of them land corporations, which trade in real estate. I believe that the whole valuation of the State is only about six hundred millions of dollars. Four hundred millions out of six hundred millions—two-thirds of the property in the whole State—are already invested in incorporations! Well, if we have indeed come to that, then let us form a corporation of the whole Commonwealth in a lump, and be done with it. Let us have a joint stock corporation of Massachusetts, for we have almost come to that. I did not think it was as bad as that, until I saw that report from the secretary. I did not suppose that quite one-half of the valuation of Massachusetts had gone into incorporations. But it seems that in fact two-thirds of the whole of the property of the State is put into mortmain in these corporations—for this is the modern mode of locking up property in mortmain. Now, of this four hundred millions of dollars, put into this kind of mortmain, what proportion of it is real estate? I presume at least one-half of it is. And what is the result upon the women of the Commonwealth? The men have cheated every woman in this Commonwealth out of her dower in two hundred millions of dollars of real estate! That is the way men have plundered women by special legislation. And that is the subject to which I should like to see the gentleman in the gallery, (Mr. Whitney, of Boylston,) and other gentlemen who believe with him, direct their reforms. Here is a practical question, affecting the rights of women more deeply than any other upon which you can touch in this Commonwealth, for you have got two hundred millions of dollars of real estate of the Commonwealth put into corporations, and what do you provide in relation to it? You say that this two hundred millions of dollars of real estate shall be considered as personal estate, without the women having the right to say whether they will sign off their dower or not, and when the husband who owns in it, dies, it goes into the hands of the administrator, as personal estate, and is applied first, to pay the corporate debts, and then to pay his individual debts, and the widow can have no right of dower in it. There the widow and the orphan stand helpless.

I say that is legislative robbery, and you cannot defend it by any principle. You have herein violated that great principle of law which declares that laws are made, and communities are governed, by the consent of the governed; and you have violated another principle of common law, which provides that when a right of property is vested in an individual, you cannot by any law, divest him of that right, without compensation. Gentlemen get up here and argue earnestly upon the question of a change in respect to the government of Harvard College, and they cite the decision protecting charter rights, in the case of Dartmouth College, but when the question comes up as to the rights of the women of the land, when these landed and special corporations are granted to steal their dower, who says a word for them? You have gone on taking this landed property from women, and invested it in corporations, and deprived them of their right of dower in it, against the fundamental principle that you cannot deprive individuals of their private rights, without an equivalent.

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—HALLETT—SARGENT—FROTHINGHAM.

[July 16th.

Now, whether it is in the power of the legislature to redress this state of things, I do not undertake to say. That is a very great and important question. It is much easier, as we have already heard, to descend into the lower regions, than it is to get back, when once down in the abyss. I do not know what we can do as to the past, but I do know what we can do as to the future. Grant no more incorporations, special or general, that shall deprive woman of her dower! We are here as the representatives of women, and does any man mean to deprive his wife and children, his daughters who are growing up, and who, in the progress of life and society, are liable to become widows, of their right of dower? No, Sir, there is not one capable of saying or meaning such a thing as that, directly, and yet, the people have sent legislatures here for seventy years, that have taken away from her in that period of special legislation, her thirds of almost one-third of the real estate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and thus violated that great principle of the common law of England, that under no circumstances shall a woman be deprived of her right of dower. That is, of itself, reason enough for requiring general laws as to corporations, and for guarding against their operation in depriving woman of her dower in lands incorporated, or held in copartnership concerns.

[Here the President's hammer fell, under the order of the Convention limiting speeches to one half hour.]

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I suppose, Sir, that in this case, as in all others, we are first to consider and ascertain whether any evil has arisen under the present Constitution, and, having ascertained that fact, if we find such evil has arisen, we are then to determine what is the proper remedy.

The gentleman from Oxford, (Mr. De Witt,) this morning, if I understood his argument rightly, stated that a very large portion of the taxable property of the State, was now in the hands of corporate companies, and that, in 1840, it amounted to two-thirds the whole taxable property of the State. This, I understand that gentleman to assert, to be an evil. And he says it has grown up at the expense of the small towns. Sir, is that position correct? Is the position that this is an evil, burdensome upon the small towns, correct?

First, has it depreciated the property, or injuriously affected the interests of the inhabitants of the small towns? If it has not, then, in that point of view, the small towns have not suffered.

Again, when you apportion a tax throughout the Commonwealth, do you find that there is oppression of the small towns, growing out of this system? Do they not, on the other hand, find it a great relief? Is not their proportion of the taxes greatly diminished, by the increase in the property of the Commonwealth, which has accumulated under this system of corporations? If the answer be yes, then I hold that the argument of the gentleman from Oxford, altogether falls in this respect.

The gentleman from Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) adduces, as another evil growing out of the present system, that it deprives the widow of her right of dower. Now, is that an evil which ought to be remedied? It may be an evil, so far as those acts of incorporation cover real estate, and convert it into personal property.

The gentleman proposes a general law, as the proper remedy. Now, will a general law remedy that evil? or will it remedy the evil complained of by the gentleman from Oxford? If, under special charters already granted, one-half, or two-thirds of the property of the Commonwealth is already covered, and, in that is included a large portion of real estate in which the widow is deprived of her right of dower, I ask you, if the remedy proposed, either in the Report of the Committee, or by the amendment of the gentleman from Oxford, is calculated to remedy or lessen that evil, and restore to the widow her right of dower. Will it not have directly the contrary effect. Will it not, by adopting a general law, open the door through which every acre of land in the Commonwealth may be brought under acts of incorporation, and thus deprive every female in Massachusetts, of her right of dower. I do not understand that either the gentleman from Oxford, (Mr. De Witt,) or the gentleman from Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) propose to limit this right of incorporation; but, on the other hand, they propose to enlarge and extend it. If, then, it is an evil, as now limited under the proposed Constitution, I ask if that evil will not be increased just in proportion as you enlarge and extend the power?

I believe, I have always believed, that the interest of Massachusetts, in all her acts of incorporation, and, indeed, the very success of those corporations themselves, has depended, in a great degree, upon the fact, that the legislature held a wise controlling power over every special act they granted. And, I believe that the moment you yield up that wise controlling power over these corporations, you will place the interest of the Commonwealth in jeopardy, and just so far as you place the interests of the Commonwealth itself in jeopardy, to that extent you place the interests of all its citizens in jeopardy. I hold, then, that the remedy proposed, instead of removing the evil complained of, will increase it.

First, it is alleged that too much property is already vested in; and under the control of corporations; but this proposition will open the door for a larger amount to be vested in them, than under the present Constitution.

Second, it is alleged, that under the present provisions of the Constitution and laws, the rights of the widow are taken away. Now, it seems to me, that by the proposition before us, the door is opened for every acre of land in Massachusetts, to be brought under acts of incorporation. I do not believe that such a thing would ever take place; but you will enlarge the amount of property vested in these corporations very much. I therefore think the measure which is here proposed, will not remedy the evil, but rather increase it, and I hope it will not be adopted by the Convention.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I am in favor, Sir, of the resolution now before the Convention, but not for the precise reasons which have been adduced, however much force there may be in those reasons, but for others which appear to me to be conclusive. Before I proceed, however, I desire to ask the President if the whole subject is under consideration?

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the gentleman from Oxford, (Mr. De Witt,) opens the whole subject for discussion.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I understand, then, that as the matter is now before the Convention, if this proposition be adopted by the Convention, and approved by the people, they will then say to their agents in the legislature, that, in reference to the principle of granting acts of incorporation, it shall be done under a system of general legislation, whenever it is practicable, and not by means of special charters given by the legislature, which has been the policy heretofore acted upon to such a great extent in Massachusetts. I am in favor of laying that down as sound policy.

Now, Sir, say what we will in favor of the advantages of individual enterprise, the corporate principle is valued highly by business men. That is the practical fact, and there is no denying it. It is seen in all the various operations of business. It is seen here in this State, where it has been carried to such great lengths, and it is seen in every other State. Wherever the progress of things carries American principles and American enterprise, there is seen a tendency to adopt this corporate principle, this custom of association and organization of effort. And why? Because, at the bottom, in itself considered, it is a democratic principle. It is a simple way of getting together the means of men of small capital, and thereby combining and accomplishing objects which they otherwise could not accomplish. That is the principle of association in business matters. The tendency is, to carry this to a great extent. Pushed to its extreme point, it is communism, socialism, or what is generally understood by those terms. But here, as we have it in Massachusetts, and in all the States of this Union, it is nothing more than a principle by which men with small means can combine and accomplish those objects which they could not otherwise accomplish, but which would have to be left to the heavy capitalist.

Now, Sir, I am in favor of laying down this as the general policy of Massachusetts. Then, instead of being used only by those who succeed in making out a case, as it is called, before a committee of the legislature, or before the legislature itself, and in this way of being obtained as a privilege, that it should be open to all, as of right, under a system of general laws. This will take from the practice its monopoly feature, and substitute for it the just feature of equality; giving to all equal chances. What now is distributed as patronage, as matter of favor, political or otherwise, will then be at the option of all, as matter of right.

Such a policy will have to commend it the consideration that it will be in accordance with that internal freedom of action which has done so much for Massachusetts, and for the country; and it will also be carrying out the legitimate functions of government. It is not the true province of the latter to meddle with, or control private interests, to act as their director and guardian, and exercise a paternal care over them. It has even proved

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — FROTHINGHAM — SCHOULER.

[July 16th.]

itself a poor regulator of the pursuits of business. Interest is sharp enough to look out for itself, and all experience has shown, that when government travels out of its province to become the ruler instead of the agent of the people, it has mistaken its office.

Now, it has been this individual freedom of action, which has contributed so much to promote the material prosperity of Massachusetts, and of the country. If there is any one thing more than another which has contributed to build us up in this State, it is that large measure of internal freedom as to trade, as to manufactures, as to commerce, and as to all the industrial pursuits of life, which the people of Massachusetts have exercised to a very large extent. This remark will be found to be true, notwithstanding the restrictions which, in our early history, were placed upon business. It is said by legal gentlemen who have looked into the early laws of our colony, that the people here were at least one hundred and fifty years ahead of all the world besides, in relation to penal laws, and the same thing is true also in relation to business laws. Now, I know what may be said in answer to this. I know it may come up in the minds of many, as this remark is made, that there will be found upon the pages of our statute books ridiculous provisions of law for regulating business. But the true point is, not what there was in Massachusetts alone, but what elsewhere was customary at that day; what, for instance, there was in the old country, at the time our trade and commerce first begun. If the state of things over the other side of the Atlantic at that time, be examined, it will be seen what were the rules and regulations and restrictions imposed by the governments of the old world, upon all the trades and avocations of life. The paternal system then and there, was in full operation. It will be found that the great end and object almost, of those governments, in their assumptions, were to regulate, restrict, and control the business operations of individuals. It was assumed, with respect to the farmer, the mechanic, and the laborer, that they had not sufficient intelligence or business faculty to take care of themselves, but that they needed to be cared for, like so many children, as to all the minute relations of life. It was held, that such care was necessary for the common good, for the safety and even existence of society. This was, in brief, the doctrine of hereditary legislators and rulers, who claimed the divine right to rule the rest of mankind, and to extort monstrous sums for their services. And they exercised this right freely. There was not a business pursuit in the mother country at the time Massachusetts was settled, that was not absurdly and wantonly regulated. There was not an article that could be used on the table, or on the person, or on the farm, or in the workshop, that either was not the subject of some monstrous monopoly, or some absurd restriction, as to manufacture and sale, and all were fortified by penalties. And this was carried, too, into regulations as to laborers' meat, and drink, and wages.

Now, Mr. President, it was under such a state of circumstances, that the farmer, the mechanic, and the trader, commenced here in Massachusetts. It was when monopoly and restrictions on trade were in their carnival, and, to judge the early people of this State rightly, this should be borne in mind. Another thing may be worthy of remark. When legal gentlemen praise the early penal legislation of Massachusetts, and when others, with equal justice, praise its business legislation, let the credit of the great and undoubted advance it all shows, be placed where it belongs. For two or three generations, the general court was composed solely of farmers, mechanics, traders, and laborers. Without intending to reflect on the great profession of the law, it may be well to remember, that for many years the people and laws too, would not allow a lawyer to be a member of the general court. Hence, it is to the common sense of these classes, that we owe the comparatively liberal legislation under which our infant manufactures thrived.

Very early in the history of our government, the general court, in the face of this old world restriction, passed one short act, if I remember rightly—and I think I remember the whole of it—saying exactly what it is now asked should be put into our Constitution. I cannot speak with precision, as to the exact words, for I have no brief or notes before me, not expecting to speak upon this subject; but it was about 1640, or thereabouts, the general court of Massachusetts passed an act, in which it was ordered that there shall no monopoly exist amongst us, except as to authors of inventions, and to them only for a short time. That was the whole of the act. And, from that day to this, there has been a constant tendency, upon the part of the business of Massachusetts, to relieve itself from those absurd restrictions, which were, from time to time, imposed upon it, and which were derived from the mother country.

Now, Sir, I am in favor of carrying out the idea, that here, in Massachusetts, there shall be no monopoly amongst us, in relation to corporate rights. I am in favor of saying, that, whatever advantages there may be in them, they shall not be confined to those who now enjoy them, but that they shall be enjoyed by all who choose to take advantage of them—thereby taking the matter out of the category of privilege, and putting it upon the ground of right.

But, Sir, we have tried the experiment, to some extent, here in Massachusetts. I think there are, upon your statute books, general laws in relation to the incorporation of lyceums, cemeteries, and other objects of association. I do not know in how many cases the system of general legislation has been applied. Take, for instance, one of the late acts passed by the legislature, by which any individual may go to a probate court and have his name changed, whereas, it used to be necessary for every individual who wanted to change his name, to apply to the legislature for that purpose.

Then there is another general law in relation to closing the concerns of corporations. I do not believe there is but one opinion about the wisdom, the safety, and the soundness of that law. It is a short act, but it provides that, when a corporation closes up its proceedings it shall pursue a certain course, by application to the supreme court. That is about the extent to which this system of legislation has been carried in Massachusetts. But, look at the neighboring State of Connecticut. Look at New York—look at Michigan—look at nearly all the Western States, and it will be found that general laws have been applied to nearly every kind of business concerns.

Now, if I understand the objections to this principle, they all centre in about this: that it is the duty of the government to see that unworthy individuals do not receive from the legislature power to cheat other individuals. I believe that is the whole objection—the whole ground of hesitation—upon the part of those gentlemen who oppose the adoption of this resolution. They say, that if you allow any set of individuals, for any purpose whatever, to form themselves into corporations under general laws, that it will open the doors to enormous frauds and cheats, which it is the duty of the legislature to prevent. I admit it is the duty of the legislature to make these general laws so sound, so safe, and so secure, to the property that invests itself under them, that this fraud, as much as possible, may be prevented; and farther than that, it does not seem to me that it is the duty of the legislature to go. When it goes beyond that, it steps into that round of paternal legislation which has been the curse of commerce for ages. I undertake to say, that it is not the duty of the legislature to take care of the private interests of men, but only to furnish those sound, safe, and general rules, by which they may conduct their business. It is for this reason, therefore, and not for other good reasons that have been alleged, that I am in favor of extending this principle of legislation, and of inserting in our Constitution a short and simple rule or instruction to our agent, the legislature, to this effect: wherever it can be done, the legislature shall make those general laws, and cease granting special privileges.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I have only a few words to say in regard to this matter. This subject has been discussed in this hall, in days gone by, with great ability, but I have never become a convert to these general corporation acts. I am not quite so much a corporation man as to give every set of men who may combine together the right to form themselves into a corporation. I think it is the duty of the legislature, to investigate all applications for corporations; and, if the applicants make out a case, to give them their charter. But, to pass a general law whereby any persons may combine—Tom, Dick, and Harry—and form themselves into a corporation, and go into any kind of business, I think ought not to be tolerated. The gentleman from Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) and the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) have spoken against this idea of encouraging associated wealth. They are in favor of having everything done, that can be done, by individual corporations, and so am I. It is because I am in favor of individuals doing all the work that can be done, that I am opposed to passing a general corporation act, whereby any persons may form themselves into corporations. We have a certain kind of business in this State, that has never been transacted by corporations, and that is, the great trade of manufacturing shoes. The shoe and leather business in this State, has never been transacted by corporations, and I trust it never will be. The great work of building ships has never been in the hands of corporations, and, if persons should come up to the legislature and ask for an act of incorporation for that purpose, they would not get it, upon the principle that this business, as has been shown, can be done by private enterprise; and whenever this can be done, I say there let it remain. I ask the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) and also the gentleman from Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) supposing that men form themselves into corporations under this general corporation act, and it is found out afterwards that they do not transact their business properly, you cannot take away from them their charter. They are independent of the legislature and the people. You cannot stop them, unless you repeal the general act; and when you do that, you punish the innocent with the guilty, because there may be a hundred other corporations incorporated under this general corporation act. It may be said that we may pass a special law in regard to men associated together under general law, if they transcend the power of that general law. But, supposing we do, what is to hinder those men, the next day, from forming a corporation under this general law. Last year, we had an application here to the legislature, to form a company by the name of the Worcester Caloric Power Company. They were to have $500,000 capital, and it appeared in the bill, if I recollect aright, that they were to hold real estate in the city of Worcester to the amount of $400,000. It was well known that it was nothing but a land speculation, got up under this title, intended to create the impression that it was intended for mechanical purposes. This is what gentlemen might call mortmain, although this definition of mortmain is a little different from the original definition. But, when that came to be discussed before the House of Representatives, they killed it by a decisive vote. I do not know but what they may have forced themselves, under general laws, into the Worcester Caloric Company. What you can stop by legislative enactment and investigation, they can obtain under general laws. The gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) says the amount of property owned by corporations, amounts to four hundred millions, and yet he is the advocate of a system, by which you can put the whole mechanical, and other business of the Commonwealth, into corporations. He talks about corporations owning this great amount of property, and yet he advocates a law whereby they can hold the whole State, and the legislature cannot say no. And they will be independent of the people and the legislature. I am not such a corporation man as that.

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — SCHOULER — WALKER.

[July 16th.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question. If four hundred millions of property have gone into corporations, I should like to ask him what right he has to exclude the other two millions from going into corporations also.

Mr. SCHOULER. If the gentleman comes before the legislature and makes out a good case for an act of incorporation, he will get it. I was reminded, while the gentleman was speaking about monopolies, that if there is anything like a monopoly, it is the profession which the gentleman himself follows. Why does not the gentleman go for incorporating into the Constitution a provision that every-body should be a lawyer, and that he shall not have to serve three years, and then be examined before a certain legal tribunal, to see if he is fit to exercise the duties of the profession.

Mr. HALLETT. If the gentleman will incorporate a provision into the Constitution that would make lawyers, I would be very willing to do it.

Mr. SCHOULER. I believe that lawyers can be made about as easily as anything else.

Mr. HALLETT. I wish barely to make one statement. I wish to say, under a law in our Constitution, that that gentleman, or any citizen may be admitted for an examination to the bar to-morrow, if he possesses good moral character and general information.

Mr. SCHOULER. Suppose he should not be able to pass an examination. What would be the case then? But, to pass from this, I say that that profession is the only profession in this whole Commonwealth that approaches anything like monopoly; and I have noticed in the Revised Statutes, that they have a lien law whereby they can keep the money of their clients, and pay themselves, before they pay over to their clients the money which they may collect for them. I say, if you pass this general law, you make all the corporations in existence monopolies, and you are shutting down the gate in such a manner, that these corporations will stand without any rivals and without any competition. They have got their charters, there they will remain, and the Commonwealth will grant no more. I desire to know if this Convention is ready to assert and maintain such a doctrine. I desire to know if we are intending to pass a law which will give to the banks that have been incorporated within the last two years, and those which have had their charters renewed, the whole monopoly of banking in the Commonwealth for the next twenty-five years. The gentleman says that all the new banks can come under the general banking law. The people do not want it. It is well known, at least financiers tell me so, that the banks under the general banking law cannot compete with those under special charters. Last year, or the year before, the legislature amended the law, by saying, that those banks that went into operation under the general law, should not pay any taxes for it. They offered this as an inducement, but you cannot find any company in Massachusetts that would avail themselves of this advantage. So it was in regard to the general corporation act for manufacturing, which was passed two years ago. There are a very few, I believe, that have availed themselves of these privileges; merely enough to make exceptions to the rule. As a general thing, the people of Massachusetts are not in favor of that law. I judge so from the fact that persons have come up to the legislature to get their charters, entirely disregarding the general corporation act. These are the general reasons why I am opposed to placing in our Constitution this provision, although other States may have passed, as we all know, general corporation acts, still, I believe our system is better than any which has been adopted anywhere else; and, I think all the time expended in legislating upon and investigating this matter of incorporations, is time well spent. I would warn this Convention against incorporating a provision into our Constitution which will give to irresponsible persons the power of forming themselves into corporations, and in that way getting rid of individual responsibility for their debts. The gentleman from Charlestown (Mr. Frothingham) is an anti-corporation man. I recollect that, in 1844, when we had that long debate about the camels, down in Nantucket, that the gentleman from Charlestown was very earnest in his opposition to all kinds of corporations at that time, and particularly against those small corporations. He has changed his ground altogether. He is now in favor of every-body forming themselves into corporations, and of throwing the whole business of the Commonwealth into the power of citizens who form themselves into corporations, and of placing them above the people, and the representatives of the people.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. The gentleman very truly says, that in some year, before the legislature, I had the honor of making an argument against granting special acts of incorporation. I have now very feebly made an argument against such special acts. I am in favor of granting now to all, those privileges which so large a body of our fellow-citizens have.

Mr. SCHOULER. The gentleman's explanation amounts to this, that he was opposed to that camel corporation, because it was a special corporation. I understood his argument to be, and I believe it was always so argued on that side, that corporations of that kind were unnecessary, and I wish to know whether the gentleman would be in favor of the camel corporation, if it was incorporated under the general law. What difference is there in principle, between a special and general act? If a corporation is good, it is good by a special act. There are certain kinds of corporations that require a great deal of capital and associated wealth, in order to carry on their business, and it is necessary that they should have an act of incorporation; but, before that grant is given, I would have every one of them come up here before the representatives of the people, and make out a full and clear case, before an act of incorporation should be given them.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. This question is one of great interest in this Commonwealth; it is peculiarly a Massachusetts question, because no other State in the Union, and I suppose no other country in the world, has so many incorporated industrial institutions as the State of Massachusetts, or so much wealth embarked in enterprises of a corporate character; and, therefore, the question is one of very great importance. In most other states and countries, corporations are resorted to as a necessity; with us they are mostly used as a matter of convenience. No one will pretend that nine-tenths of all the projects now carried on by corporations, could not be carried on by individuals. I think the gentleman from Boston, the other day, told us that one private firm in England owned more spindles than there are in the city of Lowell. Probably the founders of that establishment were poor men in the beginning, and that they attracted to themselves, by a necessary law, all the capital they needed, because they were men of character and ability. Such persons always attract to themselves all the capital they require; because capital needs talent and skill, as much as talent and skill need capital. From the statistics contained in our document, No. 37, the best deductions we can make, I think, will show that something like $250,000,000, or $300,000,000 of capital in this Commonwealth, are locked up in corporations. That is about half of the wealth of the State.

I suppose it is a foregone conclusion, that Massachusetts is to try this experiment to its fullest extent, and that we are to illustrate what the advantages or disadvantages of corporations may be. Corporations now, with us, have the ascendancy. I ask any man to say, if he believes that any measure of legislation could be carried in this State, which was generally offensive to the corporations of the Commonwealth? It is very rarely

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — WALKER.

[July 16th.]

the case that we do not have a majority in the legislature, who are either presidents, directors, or stockholders in incorporated companies. This is a fact of very grave importance.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I would like, with permission, to ask the gentleman from North Brookfield, if the secret ballot law was carried by the influence of corporations in this Commonwealth.

Mr. WALKER. I have reason to think that the corporations did not have a chance to rally and combine their forces on that question, either for or against it.

Now, if it be a foregone conclusion—if this corporation principle is to be carried out to its full and legitimate result, as I fully believe it is in Massachusetts, then I am decidedly in favor of the resolution before us. I think that is a resolution which we ought to pass. I will give an anecdote, in illustration of the reason why I am in favor of it. In 1850, certain tailors of the city of Boston, I think to the number of twenty or thirty, came before the legislature, and asked to be incorporated, that they might have an opportunity to put their small capitals together, and unite in the manufacture and sale of clothing. They came before the legislature, and it was shown that they were honest, industrious, and deserving men. I think their united capital amounted to only fifteen thousand dollars. What answer did they receive to their application? They got a negative. "You cannot be incorporated," said the legislature. At that very moment, there was a project before the same body, to increase the capital of a corporation, already amounting to two millions, to three millions. That was granted; that was worthy the attention of the law-makers of Massachusetts. That petition came from great capitalists. Laborers came forward and asked to be incorporated, and it could not be done. They were men of no influence, comparatively, and they could not have the privilege of uniting their capital together, so as to increase the benefits of their own industry, and obtain a profit on the sale of their own products.

Now, Sir, for one, I must, before voting on this subject, say, that if this policy is to be pursued, if this grand corporation system is to be continued, I think it should be extended to all, so that all may participate in it equally, and the privilege of incorporation should not be a matter of favor, but of general right. I have great doubts as to the expediency of creating these business corporations, either by general or special laws. I do not believe in the utility or rightfulness of the system itself; I do not believe in the necessity for it, as suggested by the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham). I think there is no force in his argument, because we have had, for many years, an act for general copartnership, by which all persons of small means may unite together, and carry on business, and that without endangering anything more than the amount they put in. That law is neglected, because the whole attention is turned towards corporations. Yet the law was a good one. It was amended in 1851, and made still better, so that now men may unite in carrying on business, with all the facilities they would derive from incorporations. Under our present law, business men have the advantages which result from the combination of capital, and of acting with others without endangering anything more than they invest in the concern. Besides, for the largest manufacturing operations, it is evident corporations are not necessary; for in the neighboring State of Rhode Island, where manufacturing industry has been more profitable, in proportion to its extent, even than in Massachusetts, they have, as a general fact, no corporations.

Sufficient capital can always be obtained, without the aid of corporate powers and privileges, for all useful and profitable undertakings.

I have said that I object to the whole experiment. I do not believe that the final result of it will be beneficial. I wish it understood, however, that when I speak of corporations in this connection, I mean those of a business character. Corporations for other purposes—for railroads, banks, and insurance companies, public charities, and the like—are, if not in all cases a matter of necessity, are at least a great public convenience, and do not interfere with the general business and ordinary pursuits of the people of the Commonwealth; but, for all other purposes, I do object to them.

The first reason is, that corporations change the relation of man to wealth. When a man has his property in his own hands, and manages it himself, he is responsible for the manner in which he does it. He does not delegate his power over it to anybody else. But when the management of property is put into the hands of corporations, the many delegate the power of managing it to the few; and that is an important consideration, when we reflect that nearly half of the wealth in this State has passed from the hands of individuals into the hands of incorporated companies. It aggregates power, of course, and necessarily, all the property of the Commonwealth, included in these corporations, must be put into the hands of a very few men, having absolute power over it for the time being. Hence, the agent of a factory, or a corporation of any kind, has absolute control over all persons connected with that corporation. This, I hold, to be one of the bad consequences of incorporated wealth.

Another objection I have to this system is, that it changes the moral responsibility of capital. When a man is managing his own property, he is held morally responsible for the manner in which he conducts his business, and for the manner in which he treats the persons whom he employs. If he is unjust, or cruel, he will feel the rebuke of an indignant public sentiment, under which he will quail. But it is not so in corporations. All this moral responsibility is removed. I will illustrate my meaning in this manner: Suppose one of the employees, a young woman, in one of the factories, should feel that she was injured or wronged, by some of the arrangements of one of the mills, and she should seek redress. Suppose she goes to the overseer of the room and applies to him. What does he say? "I am not responsible; you must look to the superintendent of the mill." And what does the latter say? "I am not responsible for this; you must look to the agent of the factory." Suppose she should venture to go to the agent. What does he say? If he deigns to say anything, he will tell her that "the board of directors are responsible for all this matter." The board! and so the poor girl has, at least, run her head against "a board." "We act," says the agent, "under general rules. These rules are established by the board of directors, and the agent has no responsibility in the case." Then what is her redress? If she goes to the directors, what answer does she get? Why, that they "act for the stockholders, and are bound to consult their interests, and those interests require them to run the factory thirteen or fourteen hours per day. They must act for the interest of the corporation." Suppose, farther, that an application for redress were made to individual stockholders, what would be their reply. Very certainly they would say: "We have no personal responsibility in the matter; we submit the entire management of the factory to our directors and those they employ." This is a fair illustration of the matter, and it clearly shows that the moral responsibility of wealth is destroyed by being aggregated into corporations, of which it is said, with terrible truthfulness, that "they have no souls."

In the next place, corporations destroy the natural relation between capital and labor. The moment we incorporate capital, and refuse to incorporate labor, that moment we change the relative position of the two. And what is the consequence? We give capital greatly the advantage. We never incorporate laborers. Such a thing is unheard of, and such a thing would not be tolerated. And, since we do not do that, it is quite clear that we should not incorporate capital, if we would leave the two parties on an equal footing. Capital and labor are, in all cases, natural copartners in production, and natural competitors for profits. The relation between capital and labor we cannot destroy, but that competition we may interfere with, and we do so if we incorporate capital and do not give an equal advantage to labor.

Again, by this system we reduce the number of freeholders, and that, I maintain, is a great evil. When persons carry on their own business, they will live, generally, in their own houses. When they are employed by corporations, almost universally, they are tenants at will. I submit, that in this Commonwealth, this has become a matter of great importance. Thousands, and tens of thousands, who are now mere tenants, would be freeholders, were it not for corporations. For instance, take one of our manufacturing cities, where the business is carried on by corporations, and what a large proportion of all the dwellings are owned by these great companies, and what a large part of all the inhabitants hold their tenements at the will of a factory agent. On the other hand, by way of contrast, take the city of Worcester; it has not a single corporation there for any industrial purpose, and yet it is the most flourishing city in this Commonwealth, altogether.

Mr. SCHOULER. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Brookfield, if the city of Worcester has not been built up by corporations, and what it would be to-day, if it had not been for railroad corporations?

Mr. WALKER. I have not objected to railroad corporations.

Mr. SCHOULER. The gentleman spoke of corporations.

Mr. WALKER. But I have not objected to railroad companies, banking, or insurance companies. The only point of which I am speaking, and the only thing to which I object is, the establishment of corporations for carrying on the common industrial business of the country. Now, take the city of Worcester, and, as I have said, it is far the most flourishing city in the Commonwealth; and the great cause of their success and prosperity is, that they have mechanics who do business on their own account, and who, when they acquire wealth, buy a piece of land and build a house upon it. They are independent men, and act, as they choose, and vote as they please.

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — WALKER — GRAY.

[July 16th.

On the other hand, take a city whose industry is carried on by corporations, and how different is the position and characteristics of its population. I will make no invidious comparisons, for the facts are well known to all intelligent persons.

Again, Sir, this system has concentrated our manufacturing business, to a wonderful extent, in the cities, and I insist that that is a great evil. I maintain that, if it had not been for this corporation system, our manufactures would not have been concentrated to the extent they have, in cities, but would have been scattered all over the State, wherever there was a waterfall to be put to use; and that would have been much better for the Commonwealth, than the present state of things. One great object of bringing these great corporations together in a large city, is this: In the first place, when one of these cities is to be built, the land is all bought up, and monopolized. One single corporation in this Commonwealth, purchased 1,400 acres of land to start with, and now, if that land is sold at only ten cents a foot—and much of it will be sold for a dollar a foot—it will bring more than six millions of dollars. Now, Sir, all the rise of that land, instead of going to the benefit of the workmen, as it should, goes to build up the property of the corporation. That, I maintain, is a serious objection, and one that does not exist where manufactories grow up naturally under private enterprise.

And, I object, again, that this system necessarily destroys private enterprise, by monopolizing the money and business of the country. Every-body knows, that the moment there is a great pressure in the money market, these corporations can control a great part of all the capital of both city and country, and I have been rejoiced, when passing through Pearl and State Streets, in this city, in a time of pressure in the money market, to find that the business men were beginning to wake up to the fact that they are being crushed under this tremendous system of monopoly.

Ordinary business men cannot command money, when corporations can. For, in the first place, the men who enter into these corporations are men of great capital, and have great personal influence in the money market; and, in the second place, as they can create the influence of great manufacturing and banking corporations, they can and do, readily absorb a great part of all the circulating medium of the State. Business men begin to understand all this, and to see that private enterprise is greatly crippled and impeded by this corporation system. Public sentiment, among that class of men, is becoming adverse to it, and will demand, ere long, its overthrow. They will not, and ought not, to be willing always to compete with these vast aggregations of wealth.

Another objection is, that this system involves, to some extent, the evils of absenteeism, of which we have heard so much in other countries. Is it not, to a wonderful extent, the case that those who own the wealth in the manufacturing towns, do not live in these towns? Are there not millions, and tens of millions—I do not know but that I may say hundreds of millions of property—owned in towns in which the owners do not live. This is certainly the case; and what is the consequence?

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. I wish to inquire if there is any injury resulting to these towns, because persons who do not live there, have invested their money there?

Mr. WALKER. It operates greatly to the injury of these towns, that the profits of capital are all expended out of them, just as it does in Ireland. The great curse in Ireland is, that those who make their money out of the industry of that country, spend it in England, on the continent, or wherever else they please; and consequently Ireland does not improve and prosper, as it should. That is the effect in these towns, they do not have their legitimate growth and development; it is so everywhere. I do not think this is so strong an objection as some that may be urged, but still it is an objection, and it is one that will be felt more, years hence, than it is now. I will remark, Sir, that the effects of our corporate system are not very fully developed, as yet—we are only on the threshold—we have only the poetry of it now, but we shall have the prose—we shall have sad results from this system ultimately.

This system of corporations is nothing more nor less than a moneyed feudalism; it has an effect on our civilization analogous to that which feudalism had in past ages. It concentrates vast masses of wealth, it places immense power in a few hands, and gives to both a permanent existence. Corporations never die. The individual manufacturer dies, his great property is divided. If he has been a bad man, there is a chance for hope that somebody else of a better character will take possession of his wealth, and that it will find investment in various channels of enterprise; but it is not so with corporations. What is sealed up there, is sealed up forever, like an hereditary entail.

But, Sir, time is precious, and I will not extend my remarks. This system will eventually work out its results; it will eventually fail—I have no doubt about it. I hope gentlemen will not feel any unnecessary alarm on account of my prediction, for I do not expect that it will be fulfilled in the present generation. But I am just as certain of it ultimately, as that I am now standing in this hall. The system must eventually break down, because, according to a simple law of political economy, individual enterprise will outstrip corporations. It is more economical, more vigilant, more shrewd. We have, by State legislation, built up very successfully a great system of corporations, and national legislation has fostered their interests, but, the time is coming when these institutions will be brought into a full and fair competition with unrestricted commercial and manufacturing industry, throughout the world, and that competition these corporations cannot stand. They conduct their transactions in such an expensive manner, that it more than counteracts all the advantages of their special privileges.

There is a gentleman on this floor who could bear witness to the truth of this; he knows full well how enormous are the salaries of the various officers of these corporations, and how large a share of all the profits is swallowed up by them. In one case, he has stated that the salaries of a certain corporation in this neighborhood, and that in no wise a peculiar one, are equal, in the aggregate, to one cent per pound on all the cotton spun. The salary charges are immense. Five thousand dollars, perhaps, for the president, a corresponding salary for treasurer, agent, &c., &c., down through a long catalogue of officials; higher salaries than the Commonwealth can, or does afford to pay. These are the reasons why corporations cannot eventually compete with private industry. Their expenses are enormous, and the manner in which their business is conducted, is necessarily wasteful.

Although they are carried with us to the greatest possible perfection, still, even here, they are cumbrous and expensive in their employment of capital, and they will find it out before long, and then the stockholders will sell out to individuals; there will be no property destroyed—there will be no violent revolution—everything will gradually settle down quietly into its legitimate channel, into the hands of private individuals. I will end, as I begun, by saying that it seems to me that we had better make a general law that will provide for the case, as matters now stand in this Commonwealth.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I cannot see any necessity or propriety in inserting either the resolve in its original shape, or as it is proposed to be amended, into the Constitution. Yesterday—and I refer to the decision by the way of illustration, for I have no disposition to reflect upon it, and it would not be in order for me to do so—yesterday, in judging whether the legislature should be prohibited from loaning the credit of the State, the Convention decided that it was certainly a very high power to give to the legislature, being no less than the control of the whole property of every man in the State. But, after all, it should be intrusted to the hands of the agents or servants of the people, and without restrictions; but I will say, Sir, that I was against the restriction proposed yesterday, and I wished that the resolve could have arrived to its third reading, chiefly, though not solely, with the hope that some amendment might be proposed, which should forbid towns to exercise a like control; but that is not exactly to the point here. It is unnecessary for me to say whether I think that the plan of a general framework established by a general law, is the best plan, or not the best plan; it is unnecessary for me, either to take issue with my colleague, or to agree with him as to that matter, because, Sir, I go behind all that. Why, Sir, admitting, if you please, that the plan of granting special acts of incorporation is wrong, and that we should make a general law by which people could come in and make corporations for themselves, why not leave it in the hands of the legislature? The legislature have shown themselves, entitled to the confidence of some gentlemen who have spoken before me, in establishing that system; and why should we not be willing to let things stand as they do? Why should we tie up their hands while the experiment is in process? Now, Sir, as to granting special acts for corporations, we are told that millions of property is in the hands of corporations, and of its effect upon the labor of the community, and the personal relations of men. Whatever results from corporations, results from anything that is a corporation, whether individuals make it themselves, under a general law, or the general court makes it for them, by a special act. I will take

Saturday.]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — GRAY — WHITNEY.

[July 16th.]

occasion here, to say, that I have always acted upon one rule—and I humbly think it is a good one, after much reflection, and some opportunities of observation—and that is, to be very liberal in granting charters of incorporation, but very careful in reserving control over those charters; and that has been the policy of the legislature of late years. The 44th chapter of the Revised Statutes gave the legislature power over all charters. I do not wish to disturb that, for my part; and if gentlemen wish to stereotype it in the Constitution, I do not think that I should have any objection—certainly, none strikes me now. I think more especially should some such provision be made in reference to municipal corporations; for, a little while ago, the charter of the city of Lynn came very near slipping through, without any such effectual provision, and upon a different footing from all the other city charters in the Commonwealth.

I come back, after all, to a repetition of my first reason, that the matter had better be left to the general court. One or two years since, they thought it would be best to pass general acts. The legislature have done this, and they will persevere in it, unless the wants and interests of the people require otherwise. I am by no means prepared to say, that general acts—everything, of course, depends upon what their provisions are—will be the best, the most convenient, and the most proper way of proceeding, in regard to this matter. I have full confidence in the wisdom of the legislature, that they will be quite as good judges as I am. As to the general effect of corporations, all that I have to say is, that if the property of the State is locked up in their hands, the legislature keeps the key, and I presume always will keep it; and I have no objection that it should be so; but, I think that we may safely leave the matter as it stands in the Constitution. We should probably have no greater evils than we have had; and, if any new evils should appear from leaving the legislature its present license, I think the people will do what is necessary to restrict them. If that should be so, and if some future exigency should arise so as to require their action, I would not tie up their hands either way upon the subject irrevocably.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I know, Sir, that the Convention are impatient to take the question. I am fully aware that there is running through this Convention a strong desire upon the part of many members, to limit our discussions, so that we may act, as soon as possible, upon the questions which yet remain to be acted upon by this body; but I desire to say a few words, and I think that I have special claims in this particular case for a few moments of your time, before final action is taken upon this question. I had the honor to be upon the Committee who reported the original resolution, out of which the amendment, now under discussion, has grown, and I regard this subject as one of the most important subjects that can come before this Convention. I do not agree with those gentlemen who say that our system in Massachusetts, hitherto, has been a perfect system, although it has produced some very good results. The gentleman from Boston, on my right, (Mr. Schouler,) and the one before me, (Mr. Gray,) say that the legislature, in granting special acts of incorporation, has been careful to investigate the cases, and to keep the control of these companies. I grant that; but would it have been otherwise under a general law? The gentleman on my right says, that under a general law, any special breach of that general act by a particular corporation, would necessitate a repeal of the general law. If that gentleman had reflected with his usual sagacity and judgment, he has too much good sense not to know better than to have made such an allegation here. The gentleman knows, full well, that the legislature can pass a general remedial or penal law, applicable to corporations as well as to individuals. A general law can be passed, by which, if companies violate their charters in any single particular, either by working more hours in a day than your law provides for, or in any other way,—by any breach of right, justice, or law,—the corporation can be made indictable, and punished, by taking away their charter; or, by punishment of their directors and stockholders, they can be made amenable. If the gentleman had reflected for a moment, he would have seen that his objection was groundless. I would ask gentlemen here, to bring this matter home, and see what we have here in hand. The gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) has argued the general doctrine of corporations. I will agree with him in the main; but that is not the question here, before the Convention. I take it for granted, that the advantages growing out of associations under the form of corporations, are such, that the system is to be continued, to some extent, in this Commonwealth, under one form and mode of making laws, or another; and now, the question is, to what extent it shall be continued, and how? whether by a system of special acts, or by general laws? not whether you will apply all the principles of corporate action, by a general law, to mechanics, and tavern-keepers; but, in what manner shall it be applied, in all cases, where its application is proper? Shall the legislature assume to deal out these acts to a few of our citizens, as special favors, when they belong, according to all the principles of your original Constitution, and according to all the principles of justice, to the whole people of the Commonwealth, as a right? I undertake to say, that gentlemen have not met the issue here. It is not what the general law shall be; but, whether there shall be a general law, open and accessible to every citizen of the Commonwealth alike?—whether it shall be, in the language of the declaration of your Constitution, in article ten, of the Bill of Rights, which says that, “each individual of the society has a right to be protected by it in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property, according to standing laws?” Now, Sir, this is a property question. The question is, whether all the citizens of the Commonwealth shall have the same rights and privileges to associate together for the purpose of acquiring property? And I undertake to say that you violate the principles of equality, and right, and justice, and the declaration of the present Constitution, as much in denying me the right to associate with my fellow, under a general law for the advantages of corporate action, as though in a case where my life, or my liberty, was concerned. You should not deny me the same right of trial which you give to other citizens. I claim, that whatever right you grant to any other man to acquire property, either by a special charter or by a general law, you should grant me a like privilege, and a like opportunity. That, Mr. President, is the question before us.

I took down some of the remarks of the gentleman this morning, with a view to reply to them, and if the Convention will indulge me for a moment, I will briefly refer to them. The gentleman from Boston who first spoke, says that this proposition favors corporations. That may, or may not be so. It depends upon the general law that you may make. If it favors corporations, with proper and suitable restrictions, I am in favor of it; for I take issue with gentlemen who say that corporations are necessarily monopolies. They are only monopolies inasmuch as you make them exclusive. They are monopolies under your system of special charters; but, open them to every citizen, and they cease to be monopolies. A monopoly is to give to a man the control of the manufacture of any particular article, or to give to him exclusively a market for the sale of any particular thing; which privilege you deny to other men. In this exclusive privilege consists the monopoly. Now, if this leads to the increase of corporations, properly constituted and guarded, and so created that they shall not interfere with individual rights, or the rights of towns of this Commonwealth, then I go for the creation of such corporations. Every gentleman is aware, that in the neighboring States, the people are engaged in diversified and prospering manufactures, built up under a self-associating system of general corporation laws, which have greatly promoted the wealth of the citizens of those States, individually, and in contributing to their individual wealth, has contributed to the aggregate wealth of these several States; while in Massachusetts, we have trampled down enterprise, by the delays and fluctuations of our legislation, sometimes denying charters, and sometimes granting them with great liberality, while other States have left their citizens free to incorporate themselves. Look at the State of Connecticut, for example; and, notwithstanding our Lowell, and Salem, and other large manufacturing towns, the fact appears that they manufacture more on the head, in regard to population, than we do, with all our privileged corporations—I believe largely more. Sir, they have gone into every kind of manufacture, from the very smallest pin, and hook and eye, to the fabrics themselves which these little articles are used to fasten. The State of Connecticut is dotted all over with manufactories, which have grown up under the general law of incorporations in that State, which has never worked any evil to anybody. Half a dozen men can make themselves into a corporation there, and go to work any day. But how is it here? If half a dozen men want to go to work to-morrow to manufacture pins and needles, they have to wait until next January, and then they have to come to this House and satisfy the legislature that they have a kind of claim to enter into this sort of business. Sir, who can truly and reasonably say, that the legislature, as a body, are better judges of what individuals can do for their own profit and advantage, than the individuals are themselves? Who would take the opinion of the legislature, in regard to a piece of paper which he wanted to get discounted at a bank? Such a system of law, Sir, is not founded either on equity or common sense. It is good for nothing. I know well enough how charters are obtained here. We all know that our legislative opinion and action is variable on this subject. Some legislatures are in favor of almost all incorporations, and freely grant special charters,

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—WHITNEY.

[July 16th.

while other legislatures withhold acts of incorporation altogether. But, let me go back a moment to the manufacture of needles. If I was in the State of Connecticut, or New York, or Ohio, or in two-thirds of the States of this Union, I could go to the capitalist, if I was a mechanic, and understood how to make these needles, and could associate with him, putting in my hundred dollars, and my skill, and he, perhaps, his thousand dollars, and we could start a manufacturing establishment to-morrow. How is it here? Why, Sir, as I before said, we must wait until January next, and then we must come up here by a lawyer, and go before a committee of the legislature. We must first satisfy them that it is a good enterprise. We must fee a lawyer at a nameless amount—sometimes more, and sometimes less—to present the case before your committee. If we happen to meet with a man desiring a like privilege, for the manufacture of some other article, why we may join him, and drive a bargain together, with some members of the legislature, the friends of one measure joining the friends of the other to insure the passage of both, and possibly by the end of next March, we may get our charter granted. But, Sir, if I was a party concerned, and knew the business, and wanted to make money speedily, I could slip into Connecticut and start a manufactory, and become well established, while other parties were hanging on here in the endeavor to obtain a charter.

Mr. SCHOULER. I would ask the gentleman from Conway, if he is not aware, that we have a general law in the State of Massachusetts, in regard to corporations.

Mr. WHITNEY. Yes, Sir, we have a law, and it is a general law, and the gentleman will find that there are nearly fifty corporations organized under that law; and, if you go into the interior towns of the Commonwealth, you will find that they are doing a successful business under that law. I grant that; but they come here, and ask for special charters, he says, notwithstanding, and for what purpose? Why, in order that they may dodge the wholesome provisions of that law. That law requires that the name of every stockholder in a corporation, shall be entered in the books of the town clerk, where the corporation exists, in order that it may be known whether the corporators are solid men, or men of straw. It is also necessary, that when any transfer of stock is made, such transfer should be entered in a similar manner, in order that the public may not be cheated. And now, Sir, that law is in successful operation, and nearly fifty small manufacturing establishments are in operation under it. Possibly some eight or ten of them, have since incorporated under special charters. A gentleman from Springfield, told me, a day or two ago, and he is a large holder in corporations, and knows pretty well how the thing works. He told me, that while he favored a general law, on the ground that it was better for all, and more equal yet, there were sometimes peculiar advantages in having a special charter. As an instance of this, he mentioned, that being desirous of forming a steam-boat company in Connecticut, instead of organizing it under the general law, he happened to find an old special charter, and had the company organized under it, simply because it was less restrictive, and attended with less trouble, and the charter was more liberal than the general law.

Nevertheless, said he, the general law would have answered all our purposes, and we should have organized under it, had we not found this old special charter.

The main objection I have to these special charters is, that they interfere with private enterprise, whereas, a general law places all upon the same level. There is no fear of getting a general law, that will interfere with private enterprise, half as much as your special laws will do, because, in passing a general law, it is brought to bear upon every member of the legislature. A general law affects the whole community; and, as it is good or bad, so each member must answer to his constituents, according to his vote. But, when a member gives his vote in favor of a special law, which is but of limited application, his constituents probably know nothing about it, and, if they did, they might not care about it, unless they were particularly interested themselves. In such case, a vote costs a member nothing; and, as the gentleman from Taunton said, the other day, every-body knows that there is a predisposition in the human heart to accommodate a neighbor, when a man can do it so easily and cheaply as by giving a vote that will not bring himself into conflict with others. But, in case of a general law, applicable throughout the Commonwealth, and to bear upon all parties and all sections of the Commonwealth equally, it would be matter of general concernment, and men would bring their minds to bear upon it, and hence it would, in all probability, be the best law that could be framed.

The gentleman says, that those parties desiring charters, should come before the legislature and make out a case, before they should obtain one. I take issue with the gentleman there. There is in my town a cutlery establishment, which was founded last year under our general law, and it was formed by mechanics and artisans; men who were at work for a wealthy individual; and they came up here and petitioned to be incorporated in a town on the eastern side of the Connecticut River, but they failed to obtain their charter. Why did they fail? Because, they were poor mechanics, and could not reach those higher sources of influence. They did not obtain their special charter; but, since the general law was enacted, extending the right to individuals to self-incorporate, whether possessed of much or little property, these men came together and put in the little money which they had, and became stockholders in that corporation, and are now doing a good business, manufacturing, so far as I can learn, the best cutlery that is made in the State of Massachusetts. Now, Sir, I undertake to say, that these men should have that right; that you should not grant to the wealthy capitalist a special privilege of corporate action, and deny to the laborer the right to associate with his fellow laborer, under a general law.

Something has been said, in the course of this debate, by gentlemen who spoke when the subject was under consideration the other day, about the danger of arraying corporate wealth against your amended Constitution. I wish to allude to this, in passing, as I thought it possible that it might have a little influence upon some reformers in this Convention. For myself, I do not believe that that intimation is entitled to any weight whatever. I do not think that we sit here legislating under the fear of corporate wealth. I do not believe that we will admit it to ourselves, for a moment. And, if it were true—which I trust it is not—I believe that corporations, managed by sound and judicious men, will prefer a sound and safe general law for the creation of corporations, rather than a system of special enactment. I believe that corporators generally are in favor of it. I do not believe that they will array themselves as a class, against your principle of general law; but even if they should so array themselves, who doubts where the victory would rest? Possibly these corporations may have their influence in this hall; but, let them once array themselves as a class, against the individual rights of the citizens of Massachusetts, and these corporations will soon go to the wall. I say that there is no fear here; corporators may be too strong for your legislatures, they may be strong in this Convention, but they are not yet stronger than the masses of the people; and, farther, I hold that this was one of the main reasons why this Convention was called. We have talked about matters here that are small in importance, when compared with this; and, if you will refer to the document which has been so often referred to—I have not examined it myself until this morning, and I regret that I have not had time to examine it better, and I must confess, also, that I was not aware, until now, that it had taken such decided ground upon this subject. I refer to the report of the committee upon the subject of this Convention, written by the able gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold). I say if gentlemen will refer to this document, which is the report of the joint special committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to whom was referred so much of the governor's message as related to a revision of the Constitution of the State, they will find that this was distinctly put forth as one of the issues before the people, in calling this Convention. I will ask your attention for a moment, to what is herein assigned as one of the reasons for bringing this Convention together:—

"The Committee submit, that the Constitution should provide for general instead of special laws. How far this principle shall be made to apply to specific subjects, will remain, of course, for the Convention to settle; but we have no hesitation in saying, that banks, railroads, manufactures, and insurance companies, may be safely subjected to general laws; and, probably, on more thorough examination, the principle may be extended much farther. But the principle, even to this extent, once settled, and incorporated into the Constitution of the State, will effect an entire change in our legislation. Our laws will then be more simple, plain, and better understood; their benefits will not be confined to a few, or to certain classes; but will be equal in their operations, diffusing their benefits among all alike, whether high or low, rich or poor. A large portion of the time now occupied by each session, in passing and amending special acts, will be saved; thus furnishing, as we have already suggested, a strong reason for limiting the sessions of the legislature to a period much shorter than is now usually occupied.

"This important provision should be incorporated into the Constitution; it should become a part of the organic law of the State, a fundamental principle in the government, that it may be placed beyond the reach of private and personal interests, or party action, or the fluctuating opinions of successive legislatures."

Now, Sir, let me ask if we can take any issue more distinctly than we took this issue there? Is

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—WHITNEY.

[July 16th.]

there any dodging there? Is there any equivocation there? Did we not put this issue into the canvass, when we appealed to the people for a call of the Convention? Why, Sir, we put it everywhere. It was in the Democratic State Address, and in the Free Soil State Address; and, to-day, it is the most popular question in the Commonwealth, in reference to all that we have talked about in regard to this Constitution? Men of no party have ever raised their voices, in a tangible shape, against the great principle that all your laws creating corporations shall be equal laws. No, Sir; they do not meet the principle; they dodge it; they go round it, and come up here, year after year, and evade it, until nearly one-half of the capital of the State is incorporated capital. Now, Sir, in all conscience, let the industry of the men of small means be incorporated also. Let them have like privileges. I do not go for levelling all down to one level, but I go for raising all up to one principle—for placing all upon the same platform. "Right" is what I go for. I do believe that there are advantages occasionally to be gained by incorporations. I do not believe that the time will ever come—as some suppose—when this corporation system will give way entirely. Corporations may sometimes come into conflict with individual capital and enterprise, but, if they are formed under a general law, then the same law is open to all; and the poor man, with his small means, can combine with others, just as the men can do who are worth their millions. A general law, I hold to be democratic, in every sense of the word.

The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) told us the other day, that he had known gentlemen come here, year after year, and make their thousand dollars during the session of the legislature, in lobbying through acts granting special privileges. And the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Giles,)—whose depth of thought, and of research into the great principles upon which our constitutional law is founded, is, to my mind, equal to that of any Democrat, or Free Soiler, or man of any other party in the Convention—told us, yesterday, that there was danger that corporate wealth would become too strong for the Commonwealth. I agree to all that. But how is it to become so? Simply, by confining your corporations to a few men, and thereby give them special advantages to accumulate and swallow up the wealth of the Commonwealth, at the same time that you deny to the poor man the right of self-association for similar objects. Now, a poor man can hardly undertake to get a charter through the legislature. There was a small company of mechanics in my town, who wanted an act of association, to manufacture joiners' tools. They presented their matter to the legislature, and sent an able man before the committee, who made out a case, as the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) would say. The legislative committee reported in favor of it. The bill was a long time discussed in the House of Representatives, but it finally failed of being passed, by one or two votes. The second year they applied again, and, after an expenditure of almost six hundred dollars, the act was passed, by the casting vote of the president, and it became a law. Now, why did these poor men fail, in the first instance? They could not reach the sources of influence in the legislature; they could not go to A, to B, and to C, and say, this is an institution which will favor your particular views, and therefore ought to be chartered. If they could have done that, there would have been no trouble. But they came before the legislature with industry and small means, and endeavored to make out a case for a charter. But such appliances had but little influence the first year, and they failed, though the second year, by unremitting exertions, they succeeded. Well, they obtained the charter, and went to work. They were prospered, until overtaken by a calamity of which they had no control. A fire burnt them out clean, and, unfortunately, they were but slightly insured.

Now, what was the advantage of your general law, in this case? They had not themselves means to rebuild, but there was a general law which allowed these men to seek capital wherever they could find it. Conway being a small town, the capital could not be obtained there. They went over to Greenfield, and showed, to the capitalists of that place the state of their business, the amount of work they had performed, and the profits they had made, and the result was, that those capitalists immediately put into the concern $20,000. The establishment was put into operation there, and they are now doing a flourishing business. What would have been the result, had there been no general law? They would have scattered, or have gone off into Connecticut, and commenced their works there, and Massachusetts would have lost the benefit of their skill and knowledge in that particular branch of business; and would have lost the advantages arising from the industry and capital employed in it.

Now, in this instance, we see an advantage which should be retained under a general law, and who is there that wants to continue the present system, of passing acts of incorporations? The gentleman from Boston says we are liberal in granting charters. We are sometimes. We granted a great number in 1852, amounting, according to some gentlemen, to $14,000,000.

In the general law, we had restricted the formation of companies having a capital of over $200,000. At the time of the passage of that law, the legislature was conservative—and the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) was one of them—and, doubting whether a law that did not limit the amount of capital in each case, could be carried through the legislature, the law was limited as it should not have been; but, remembering the principles laid down by our fathers, that all laws should be equal, they said we will begin to return to an equality in law—from which, by special acts we have departed—by allowing small corporations to be formed first, and we will limit the capital to two hundred thousand dollars. Well, it was probably wisdom so to direct that measure at that time, for it would have failed in the legislature in any other shape.

Now, I desire to put the question to gentlemen in this House, whether, as individual men, forming the organic law of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; whether, as honest and fair minded men, you want to continue in Massachusetts a system by which individuals can make their thousand dollars a year by lobbying through special charters? Whether you wish to turn your legislative halls into a body of men who can and may be influenced to favor the rights of the few, at the expense of the rest? Where is the man who wants to continue this system? I do not know one.

I gathered an idea or two from the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) the other day, though he was speaking upon another subject, which cover the entire question. The gentleman said, "adopt principles of right and justice, and they never will mislead an individual, or a party, of the Commonwealth. You never can have liberty, unless it is based upon principles of equality, and the most sacred exercise of the principle of equality, is in the enactment of laws which shall bear upon, and privilege alike, all citizens."

Now, gentlemen know what a privilege is. It is a peculiar advantage enjoyed by one man, and not enjoyed by all men; and if you grant a special charter, giving to a few individuals special rights and advantages, you are granting special privileges; and, so far as they are special, they are wrong and unjust, and ought to be unconstitutional. I say it is a matter of right, which has come down to us as an inheritance from our fathers, that every citizen in the Commonwealth has a right to equal advantages and privileges, and you have not the right, according to the principles upon which you based your Constitution, to trespass upon individual rights, or to make one man rich by giving him special privileges, and deny riches to another man, by a refusal of the same privileges.

Now, the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) this morning, in saying something upon this subject, asked if we have not done well heretofore? I think we have done well in this Commonwealth, and as a Commonwealth, in spite of the disadvantages growing out of the system of special legislation. But our prosperity has not been owing to that system, but has come in spite of it. We are indebted for it to other things—to our common schools, our industry, our capacity of acquiring wealth, our manufacturing, our ingenuity, our Yankee enterprise, and things like these. The gentleman from Cambridge will not say our prosperity is owing to the granting of special charters. He is too practical a man for that. I contend that we should have had more wealth and enterprise, more diversity of manufactures, more advantages every way, if we had adopted a system of general laws years ago.

This is no experiment in other States. The State of New York, great in all that pertains to business enterprise—unsurpassed, and unparalleled in her business achievements—is worthy of being referred to and copied. She may truly be called the Empire State, and we may well look to her for example. She began in this matter of passing general laws, as far back as 1838, and, in that year, passed a general law in relation to the matter of banking, the most difficult department of all. She continued to increase her number of general laws, one after another, down to 1846, when her new Constitution was formed. In that Constitution a provision was inserted, that no special charter should be granted. And this provision was not rashly adopted. She had had such a system partially in operation for twelve years, and even longer,—but I only go back to the time of the passage of the general banking law,—and the people of that State considered the matter of so much importance, that they incorporated it into their Constitution.

So the people of the great agricultural State of Ohio, after suffering many years from special legislation, and special grants, got together, and called a Convention mainly in reference to that matter. I was in Ohio at the time, and the principal question in the canvass, was that in reference to altering the Constitution with regard to the creation of corporations, and of the right of the legislature to pass special laws for them. The people carried the principle that corporations should be created under general laws, and they adopted the Constitution, embodying that provision, by a large majority.

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — WHITNEY.

[July 16th.

I am yet to hear of, or find a man in any State in this Union, where general laws have been established, who finds fault with such laws, unless it be that man who is wanting special privileges under special law, for himself. That general law of Massachusetts passed in this State, which has been called a "corporation-ridden State"—though I do not believe it true—that law has never been attacked. Her legislature has passed from the hands of one party to the other, but they dare not touch it. The principle is so in accordance with the principle of right and justice, which resides in the breast of every one of our citizens, that no man has dared to rise and attack it, or move to repeal it.

And, in reference to the banking law, which has been referred to, they have not repealed that law. Why have they not done it? Gentlemen say the law is not used. I say it will be used. And I say that the law in relation to banking would have been used, ere this, extensively, had it not been for the idea running through the minds of many, who wanted special privileges, that by waiting, they would be able to obtain from the legislature a special charter, with those special privileges. As it is now, a bank is soon to be put into operation, by some shrewd financiers of the city of Boston, under that law. A man who was formerly a member of the legislature from the city of Boston, and who went for general manufacturing and banking laws,—as upright and intelligent a legislator, in all that pertains to manufacturing and banking, as the city of Boston ever sent to the House of Representatives—now connected with the Merchants' Bank of Boston, said to me, a day or two since, that they were about to organize their immense capital under that law.

Connecticut passed a general banking law, a year ago, and six or eight flourishing banks have been incorporated under it; and they consider the system a good one. It allows men to loan money, who have it to loan, and men who have not got it, should not be allowed to bank upon the mere credit which they can obtain from their promises to pay. No mere bank charter should ever be considered a basis for bank issues, however carefully and fully a case might have been made out before your legislature.

I say the principle should be applied to banking. If you retain your present system of banking, open the business to all, and let all be bankers who choose to be, and then the thing will regulate itself. Serve us all alike. That is what I contend for. I do not mean to say in what particular form you should have your banking laws, but whatever it is, you should have it under general laws. I prefer the system of a deposit, pledged for the redemption of issues, for the safety of the bill holders. I do not, however, attack any system of banking; but, I only wish the law, whatever it is, to be general.

I say, too, that this is no experiment in this State. We have general laws, and they have been framed to meet some of the evils experienced under the system of special laws. It would require the legislature to sit the year out and the year in, if they were required to pass special laws for every religious society, or lyceum, and the like, that is formed in the Commonwealth. But we have general laws for the incorporation of religious societies, libraries, wharf companies, joint stock companies, banking companies, and for many other things. Now, who has ever found any fault with these general laws? We have general laws upon these things, and why not have them upon all others, and allow to individuals the right of self-association, and stop this system of special legislation.

The gentleman from Boston said, that we yesterday said that it was safe to leave to the legislature a thing of as much moment as this is. I take issue with the gentleman. Enactment of a law by the legislature, for loaning the State credit, would be, in its nature, a general law, bearing equally upon all the citizens of Massachusetts; equally upon the constituents of every member of the legislature. It would, possibly, be a general law intended for the benefit of a special corporation. But the grant of a loan is a general law, and is within the principle which I advocate. Well, Sir, is not the experience of other States—is not our own concurrent experience—sufficient to satisfy us of the importance of this principle? Is it not enough to satisfy us that it ought to be incorporated into our Constitution? As I have before said, we may well learn wisdom from the experience of other States, especially when we have so fully proved a system, as we have in relation to this matter. We have to oppose the competition of the great State of New York, our great commercial rival. New York allows all her citizens freely to enter into corporations under general rules and regulations. And why should we not unyoke our own citizens? Why should we not take off the trammels from their necks, and give them a fair opportunity to compete with those of New York? Why should they not have every advantage which general and wise laws can give them? I tell gentlemen that, but for these trammels, our manufactures would have been much farther advanced than now. We should have been much farther advanced in many things. Let us, then, incorporate this provision into our Constitution, as a principle of right and justice, where it never can be shaken and evaded. But upon this point, I have said enough.

In the next place, I think this resolve should be incorporated into the Constitution, for the reason given by the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) that it will save the time of the legislature. All the legislatures of the State of Massachusetts, for many years past, have spent more than half, many of them more than two-thirds their time, in granting special charters to corporations, which might all have been saved by a general statute that would have occupied but a single page upon your statute book.

Here I will take occasion to say, that there is no ground for apprehension upon the part of the members of the Convention that should deter us, or make us hesitate to adopt this resolve, on account of any supposed interference with the right of eminent domain, which has been referred to in the course of this debate. I appeal to the judgment of the legal gentlemen of the Convention, to whose judgment I would certainly defer in these matters, whether you cannot as well provide by general law that the right of eminent domain shall be secured to the citizens, as by special law. You can provide, as they have done in Ohio—although I think the restrictions are unnecessarily severe—that the property of a man shall not be taken for a railroad, until he has been settled with, and until it is paid for. In New York, the railroad companies are authorized to settle with the individuals for their land, if possible; but in case an individual cannot be traded with, they have the right to appeal to the legislature. But I understand that since this law has been in operation in New York, no appeal has been made to the legislature, for the right of way through the lands of any individual. The railroad companies have always managed to compromise with them in some way. So that you not only can protect your citizens in the right of eminent domain, by general laws as well as by special, but you can do it all the better; for, in drawing up a general law, you will be more careful so to frame it as not to infringe upon the right of any individual, half as much as you will be likely to by special law; and this furnishes an additional argument for putting this provision into our Constitution.

I have said that such a provision will promote the business interests of the community generally; but I will not take up the time of the Convention in dwelling longer upon this point, for I do not desire to weary the patience of the Convention.

I pass on, then, to my next argument in favor of this provision, which is, that it will give us uniform laws in reference to corporations. Now, if any gentleman will take the pains to examine our statute books with reference to this matter, he will find a great diversity in these special laws. You will find that privileges are granted to one corporation which are denied to another; and you will find that, when compared with each other, they are very unequal and unjust. In looking over these laws, the other day, I noticed that one corporation in the county of Worcester was granted the right to sell liquor, while another was restricted from selling it about the premises. Now, I do not believe you could get such disagreements in point of privilege, granted or incorporated into any general law. No legislature would think of framing such a law. But, whatever might be the privileges granted, all would be entitled to the same. But some favored corporation will start such dissimilar charters, under special legislation. They will go before the legislature with all the appliances which they well know how to use, and, in some manner, before they give up, they will manage to get what they want. But this system of general laws will give us uniform regulations and privileges, for all corporations to be created in future. They will afford a reference which all persons can, at any time, examine, to ascertain the liability of stockholders, or for any purpose. They will be in the hands of the laborer and the creditor, in one single act, which he can examine at any time, and through which he can ascertain whether the proprietors are liable for the last six months of his service. He may find out the entire provisions of law, relative to the corporation by which he is employed, as he cannot find out now. Under the existing laws, he may go from one corporation to another, through the hundred towns in which they are located, and he will find different provisions of law applying to each of the different companies.

Saturday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—WHITNEY—SCHOULER—FROTHINGHAM—FRENCH.

[July 16th.]

But, Sir, these laws are unequal, not only as regards manufacturing companies, but also as regards insurance companies. I belong to an insurance company which petitioned the last legislature to be allowed to raise a guarantee capital, to guarantee the policies issued by that company. It was only such a privilege as had been given to other companies. Precisely the same as had been granted to an insurance company in Worcester, precisely the same as had been granted to another in Springfield, but it was denied to our company, and for what reason? We are, to-day, raising policies of insurance without guarantee, for that right has not been given us. All we asked was, that the association might raise $100,000, by the payment of stock on the part of individuals, and that we might be allowed to guarantee policies upon the strength of this capital, and we were denied this right. It could not be granted to us by the legislature, and why? Because, possibly—I do not say this was the reason—sundry influential men happened to be placed upon the committee having the subject in charge, who were connected with other insurance companies, and by various appliances upon the part of the agents of other companies which have this privilege, that committee was induced to report against our petition. I say possibly these were the reasons—perhaps others existed, if so, I do not know what they were, as we did not come before the committee at all, supposing that the request, being the same as had been granted to other companies, and, being so reasonable in its nature, would be acceded to without a question being raised; and I was never more surprised in my life, than when the committee reported that it was inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petition, or, to use their form, that the petitioners have leave to withdraw. Now, Sir, I want to know by what right or justice, you give to a company in Worcester, and to another in Springfield, the authority to raise a guarantee capital for their insurance policies, and deny that privilege to me? What have I done here in the good old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to forfeit my rights of citizenship, and to entitle me to less advantages in the acquirement of property, than are accorded to others? I know of no act of mine that ought thus to disfranchise me, nor do I know of any act of yours that should entitle you to privileges above me.

Now, Sir, I have no manner of doubt that the incorporation of this provision into the Constitution, will do away forever this system of injustice and inequality, and that every honest man in Massachusetts will thereafter enjoy equal privileges with every other man in the Commonwealth. I do not believe that when you come to have a system of general laws, you will find any man to rise up and advocate the reestablishment of our existing system of special laws. Never, never.

It will have the effect, as I before remarked, to shorten the length of the sessions of the legislature nearly one-half, and it will destroy the principle of monopoly. That is the chief feature of which complaint is made, and it is one of the principal objections, to my mind, to the continuance of the present system. Privileges are given to certain associations, against the rights of the whole. They are granted to a few, and denied to the rest. Therein consists the idea of monopoly, and nowhere else.

Now, Sir, I wish to say a single word farther upon this point, and I will close. A fear is entertained, in the minds of some gentlemen, that, by the adoption of this provision into your amended Constitution, you will, to a certain extent, render it unpopular among the people, when they come to vote upon its adoption. Now, I verily believe, that you can incorporate no one provision into your Constitution, that will so much aid you in securing the adoption of the whole, as this simple declaration, that hereafter special legislation shall cease. Why, Sir, it has been a cardinal doctrine of one party in the Commonwealth, ever since the days of our boyhood. Ever since I knew anything about politics, this has been a prominent object sought to be attained by one of the parties of the Commonwealth. The gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) in his message in 1839, ably recommended that we should abolish this system of special legislation. Early in our history as a government, such a thing as special privileges was advocated by no one. It has grown upon us by degrees, and I think it is time that it should be stopped. But we never can stop it unless we do it in the Constitution. Your recent history, to which the gentleman from Boston (Mr. Schouler) has alluded, proves that whenever the legislature has enacted a general law, it has worked well. Let us, then, take off restrictions from general enterprise, and cease to be partial in our laws, by adopting this restriction. Let us so amend our organic law, that there shall be no more special legislation; hereafter, whatever enactments you make, let them belong to every man alike, then they cannot be complained of.

[Here the hammer fell, the hour to which the speaker, as chairman of the Committee, was entitled, by the order of the Convention, having expired.]

MR. DENTON, of Chelsea. I think this subject has been amply and fairly discussed, upon both sides. I think it has been discussed with great ability, and I therefore feel it my duty to move the previous question.

MR. SCHOULER, of Boston. I hope the previous question will not be sustained at the present time. If the question has been discussed, it has been all on one side. We have had a speech from the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) half an hour in length. The gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) spoke half an hour. We have had a speech from the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) and an hour's speech from the gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney,) in favor of the adoption of this proposition, while scarcely anything has been said upon the other side. I should like ten minutes to set myself right upon this question. It seems to me, that the question is by no means exhausted. There are many points which have not been touched upon at all. The gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) my colleague from Boston, and myself, have not spoken three quarters of an hour altogether; while the gentlemen upon the other side have spoken two hours and a half. The gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney,) directed nearly his entire speech against the few remarks which I had the honor to make, and I desire ten minutes to say something in reply.

MR. BIRD, of Walpole. I only want to say that I hope the motion for the previous question will not be withdrawn, and that it will be sustained by the Convention. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) has had the floor once, upon this subject.

MR. SCHOULER. I am aware that I have had the floor once, but only for a very few minutes, and the gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney,) has directed his whole argument against the ground which I took. In the usual course of debate, the chairman of a Committee opens the debate upon the subject over which he has had charge, but, in this instance, he has closed the debate.

MR. WHITNEY, of Conway. I would suggest to the gentleman from Chelsea, (Mr. Denton,) who moved the previous question, that he withdraw his motion. I desire to treat the gentleman from Boston with courtesy. I did not finish the remarks I had intended to make before the hammer fell, and I always want the privilege of the last word, when I can have it, but I nevertheless desire that the gentleman from Boston should have an opportunity to reply, if he desires it; and I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Chelsea that he withdraw his motion for the previous question, and move that the question be taken at twenty minutes past 12 o'clock. That will give the gentleman from Boston ten minutes to reply.

MR. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I rose to make a suggestion somewhat similar to that of the gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney.) I have myself occupied not more than fifteen minutes in this discussion, and I should like an opportunity of saying something in reference to what has been said by the gentleman from Boston. I dare say there are many others who would also like to say something. I know, however, that the time of the Convention is precious, and, for one, I would be willing to forego the pleasure of answering the gentleman from Boston. I would, nevertheless, suggest to the gentleman from Chelsea, that the time for taking the question be fixed at half past 12 o'clock. This is a very important subject, and one which has occupied but very little of the time of the Convention. It seems to me but just, that the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) should be allowed time to answer the gentleman from Conway, and I think that to allow a little farther time for the discussion of the subject, would not be objectionable. I will, therefore, venture to suggest that the time for taking the question be fixed at half past 12 o'clock.

MR. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I have been waiting for some time for an opportunity to say a word upon this subject, but I see there are many others who are also waiting to say a word, if the previous question is withdrawn. If our friends are willing to waive their rights, I am willing to waive mine, and let the question be taken now. I hope the previous question will not be withdrawn.

MR. FRENCH, of Berkley. I hope the gentleman from Chelsea will withdraw his call for the previous question. I have not said a word upon this subject, and the Convention very well know that I shall detain them but a short time in what I have to say. If I could have obtained the floor at a proper time, I wanted to say a word in reply to the gentleman on my left, (Mr. Schouler.) But what I wanted to say at the time, I have now

Saturday.]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — BATES — FRENCH — DENTON.

[July 16th.

nearly forgotten, [a laugh,] and I shall therefore be content with still less time than I should then have occupied. If the Convention will give me five minutes, it will be all I ask.

Mr. President: I shall be sorry to get into deep water, but if I do, it will not be the first time I have been off my soundings.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I rise to a question of order. I believe the gentleman is discussing the question, and replying to the member from Boston, (Mr. Schouler).

Mr. FRENCH. I have not come to him yet. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Berkley is replying to the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. FRENCH. This is a question in relation to corporations, or whether we are to have a general or special law as to corporations. What object do associations of persons have in view in being incorporated. They have some object or other—

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. BIGELOW, of Grafton. I hope the previous question will be sustained.

Mr. DENTON, of Chelsea. I wish the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) to understand that it was not my intention to cut him off from replying to the gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney). I listened to his speech with a great deal of pleasure, and I think he went over the whole ground, and I really think that he would not have anything more to say, except in reply to the gentleman from Conway, which would lead to still farther discussion, and therefore I insist upon the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remark, in relation to the suggestion of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) that, with the exception of the mover of the amendment, the floor has been given alternately to the friends and opponents of the resolves.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The question first in order is, upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Oxford, (Mr. De Witt).

Mr. De WITT. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis,) to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following, as a substitute:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that corporations shall not be created by special act when the object of the incorporation shall be attainable under general laws.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Davis's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon ordering the resolve to a second reading, as amended.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree, demanded the yeas and nays upon that question.

They were ordered.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and there were—yeas, 188; nays, 52—as follows:—

YEAS.

Adams, Shubael P. Allen, James B.
Aldrich, P. Emory Alley, John B.

Alvord, D. W.
Andrews, Robert
Austin, George
Baker, Hillel
Ballard, Alvah
Barrett, Marcus
Bates, Moses, Jr.
Bigelow, Edward B.
Bird, Francis W.
Bishop, Henry W.
Booth, William S.
Boutwell, Geo. S.
Boutwell, Sewell
Bradford, William J. A.
Breed, Hiram N.
Bronson, Asa
Brown, Artemas
Brown, Hiram C.
Brownell, Joseph
Bryant, Patrick
Buck, Asahel
Burlingame, Anson
Cady, Henry
Caruthers, William
Case, Isaac
Chandler, Amariah
Chapin, Daniel E.
Childs, Josiah
Churchill, J. McKeen
Clark, Ransom
Clarke, Alpheus B.
Clarke, Stillman
Cleverly, William
Cole, Sumner
Crane, George B.
Cressy, Oliver S.
Crittenden, Simeon
Cushman, Henry W.
Cushman, Thomas
Cutler, Simeon N.
Davis, Ebenezer
Dean, Silas
Denison, Hiram S.
Denton, Augustus
DeWitt, Alexander
Duncan, Samuel
Dunham, Bradish
Durgin, John M.
Eames, Philip
Earle, John M.
Easland, Peter
Edwards, Elisha
Edwards, Samuel
Fay, Sullivan
Fisk, Lyman
Fitch, Ezekiel W.
Foster, Abram
Fowle, Samuel
Freeman, James M.
French, Charles A.
French, Samuel
Frothingham, Rich'd, Jr.
Gale, Luther
Gardner, Johnson
Gates, Elbridge
Giles, Charles G.
Giles, Joel
Gooch, Daniel W.
Gooding, Leonard
Green, Jabez
Griswold, Josiah W.
Griswold, Whiting
Hadley, Samuel P.
Hallett, B. F.
Harmon, Phineas
Haskins, William
Hathaway, Elnathan P.
Hawkes, Stephen E.
Hayden, Isaac
Heath, Ezra 2d.
Hewes, James
Hewes, William H.
Hobart, Aaron
Hobart, Henry
Hobbs, Edwin
Hood, George
Hooper Foster

Howard, Martin
Hoyt, Henry K.
Hunt, Charles E.
Hurlbut, Moses C.
Jacobs, John
Johnson, John
Kingman, Joseph
Knight, Hiram
Knight, Jefferson
Knowlton, J. S. C.
Knowlton, William H.
Knox, Albert
Kuhn, George, H.
Ladd, Gardner P.
Lawrence, Luther
Leland, Alden
Lincoln, Abishai
Littlefield, Tristram
Marble, William P.
Merritt, Simeon
Mixter, Samuel
Morton, Elbridge G.
Morton, Marcus
Morton, William S.
Nayson, Jonathan
Newman, Charles
Nichols, William
Norton, Alfred
Ober, Joseph E.
Orne, Benjamin S.
Osgood, Charles
Paine, Benjamin
Paine, Henry
Parris, Jonathan
Parsons, Samuel C.
Partridge, John
Peabody, Nathaniel
Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
Penniman, John
Perkins, Daniel A.
Perkins, Jesse
Perkins, Noah C.
PHELPS, Charles
Pemroy, Jeremiah
Pool, James M.
Putnam, John A.
Rantoul, Robert
Rawson, Silas
Rice, David
Richards, Luther
Richardson, Daniel
Richardson, Nathan
Rockwood, Joseph M.
Rogers, John
Ross, David, S.
Royce, James C.
Sanderson, Chester
Sherril, John
Sikes, Chester
Simmons, Perez
Simonds, John W.
Smith, Matthew
Souther, John
Sprague, Melzar
Spoonier, Samuel W.
Stacy, Eben H.
Stetson, Caleb
Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Stiles, Gideon
Talbot, Thomas
Thayer, Willard, 2d
Thomas, John W.
Thompson, Charles
Tilton, Horatio W.
Turner, David
Turner, David P.
Tyler, William
Viles, Joel
Wallis, Freeland
Walker, Amasa
Ward, Andrew H.
Warner, Marshal
Waters, Asa H.
Weston, Gershom B.
White, Benjamin
White, George
Whitney, Daniel S.

Whitney, James S.
Wilbur, Daniel
Wilbur, Joseph
Wilson, Henry
Wilson, Willard

Winn, Jonathan B.
Winslow, Levi M.
Wood, Charles C.
Wood, Otis
Wood, William H.

NAYS.

Appleton, William
Aspinwall, William
Atwood, David C.
Barrows, Joseph
Beebe, James M.
Bennett, William, Jr.
Bigelow, Jacob
Bradbury, Ebenezer
Braman, Milton P.
Brewster, Osmyn
Brinley, Francis
Bumpus, Cephas C.
Chapin, Henry
Cogswell, Nathaniel
Copeland, Benjamin F.
Crowninshield, F. B.
Gardner, Henry J.
Gilbert, Wanton C.
Gould, Robert
Hale, Artemas
Hale, Nathan
Heard, Charles
Hersey, Henry
Hindsdale, William
Hubbard, William J.
Hunt, William

Hurlburt, Samuel A.
Jackson, Samuel
Jenkins, John
Jenks, Samuel H.
Kellogg, Giles C.
Kendall, Isaac
Lincoln, Frederic W., Jr.
Livermore, Isaac
Loud, Samuel P.
Miller, Seth, Jr.
Orcutt, Nathan
Paige, James W.
Park, John G.
Read, James
Reed, Sampson
Sargent, John
Schouler, William
Tileston, Edmund P.
Tower, Ephraim
Tyler, John S.
Upham, Charles W.
Walkcott, Samuel B.
Walker, Samuel
Weeks, Cyrus
Wheeler, William F.
Wilson, Milo

ABSENT.

Abbott, Alfred A.
Abbott, Josiah G.
Adams, Benjamin P.
Allen, Charles
Allen, Joel C.
Allen, Parsons
Allis, Josiah
Ayres, Samuel
Ball, George S.
Bancroft, Alpheus
Banks, Nathaniel P., Jr.
Bartlett, Russel
Bartlett, Sidney
Bates, Eliakin A.
Beach, Erasmus D.
Beal, John
Bell, Luther V.
Bennett, Zephaniah
Blagden, George W.
Bliss, Gad O.
Bliss, William C.
Briggs, George N.
Brown, Adolphus F.
Brown, Alpheus R.
Brown, Hammond
Brownell, Frederick
Bullen, Amos H.
Bullock, Rufus
Butler, Benjamin F.
Carter, Timothy W.
Chapin, Chester W.
Choate, Rufus
Clark, Henry
Clark, Salah
Coggin, Jacob
Cole, Lansing J.
Conkey, Ithamar
Cook, Charles E.
Coolidge, Henry F.
Crockett, George W.
Crosby, Leander
Cross, Joseph W.
Crowell, Seth
Cummings, Joseph
Curtis, Wilber
Dana, Richard H., Jr.
Davis, Charles G.
Davis, Isaac
Davis, John
Davis, Robert T.
Davis, Solomon

Daves, Henry L.
Day, Gilman
Dehon, William
Deming, Elijah S.
Doane, James C.
Dorman, Moses
Easton, James, 2d
Eaton, Calvin D.
Eaton, Lilley
Ely, Joseph M.
Ely, Homer
Eustis, William T.
Farwell, A. G.
Fellows, James K.
Fiske, Emery
Foster, Aaron
Fowler, Samuel P.
French, Charles H.
French, Rodney
Gilbert, Washington
Goulding, Dalton
Goulding, Jason
Graves, John W.
Gray, John C.
Greene, William B.
Greenleaf, Simon
Hall, Charles B.
Hammond, A. B.
Hapgood, Lyman W.
Hapgood, Seth
Haskell, George
Hayward, George
Henry, Samuel
Heywood, Levi
Hillard, George S.
Holder, Nathaniel
Hopkinson, Thomas
Houghton, Samuel
Howland, Abraham H.
Huntington, Asahel
Huntington, Charles P.
Huntington, George H.
Hyde, Benjamin D.
Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
James, William
Kellogg, Martin R.
Keyes, Edward L.
Kimball, Joseph
Kinsman, Henry W.
Knight, Joseph
Knowlton, Charles L.

Saturday,]

UNIVERSITY AT CAMBRIDGE, &c.—BOUTWELL—HUBBARD—GARDNER—WILSON—BIRD.

[July 16th.]

Ladd, John S.
 Langdon, Wilber C.
 Lawton, Job G., Jr.
 Little, Otis
 Loomis, E. Justin
 Lord, Otis P.
 Lothrop, Samuel K.
 Lowell, John A.
 Marcy, Laban
 Marvin, Abijah P.
 Marvin, Theophilus R.
 Mason, Charles
 Meader, Reuben
 Monroe, James L.
 Moore, James M.
 Morey, George
 Morss, Joseph B.
 Morton, Marcus, Jr.
 Nash, Hiram
 Noyes, Daniel
 Nute, Andrew T.
 Oliver, Henry K.
 Packer, E. Wing
 Parker, Adolphus G.
 Parker, Joel
 Parker, Samuel D.
 Parsons, Thomas A.
 Payson, Thomas E.
 Peabody, George
 Perkins, Jonathan C.
 Phinney, Silvanus B.
 Pierce, Henry
 Plunkett, William C.
 Powers, Peter
 Preston, Jonathan
 Prince, F. O.
 Putnam, George
 Richardson, Samuel H.
 Ring, Elkanah, Jr.
 Rockwell, Julius
 Sampson, George R.
 Sanderson, Amasa
 Sheldon, Luther
 Sherman, Charles
 Sleeper, John S.
 Stevens, Charles G.
 Stevens, William
 Stevenson, J. Thomas
 Storror, Charles S.
 Strong, Alfred L.
 Stutson, William
 Sumner, Charles
 Sumner, Increase
 Swain, Alanson
 Taber, Isaac C.
 Taft, Arnold
 Taylor, Ralph
 Thayer, Joseph
 Tilton, Abraham
 Train, Charles R.
 Underwood, Orison
 Upton, George B.
 Vinton, George A.
 Wales, Bradford L.
 Wallace, Frederick T.
 Warner, Samuel, Jr.
 Wetmore, Thomas
 Wilder, Joel
 Wilkins, John H.
 Wilkinson, Ezra
 Williams, Henry
 Williams, J. B.
 Wood, Nathaniel
 Woods, Josiah B.
 Wright, Ezekiel

Absent and not voting, 178.

So the resolve was ordered to a second reading.

University at Cambridge.

The PRESIDENT. The next matter in order, is No. 2 of the calendar, being the resolve to amend section 2, chapter 5, of the Constitution, by striking out the words "University at Cambridge." The resolve has been read twice, and the question now is upon the final passage. The resolve is as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the second section of the fifth chapter of the Constitution, by striking out therefrom the words "University at Cambridge."

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I am opposed to the passage of this resolution. If gentlemen will turn to page ninety-seventh of the rules and orders of the Convention, they will find in section 2d, chapter 5th, of the Constitution, the following:—

"It shall be the duty of legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them; especially the University at Cambridge, public schools and grammar schools, in the towns," &c.

If gentlemen will observe the peculiar phraseology of this provision of the Constitution, they will see that it has divided institutions of learning into three classes: the university at Cambridge, public schools, and grammar schools. The proposition reported to us by the Committee is, that the words "University at Cambridge" be stricken out, so that the paragraph shall read: "It shall be the duty of legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this Commonwealth, to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences, and all seminaries of them, especially the public schools and grammar schools in the towns," &c. The effect of this proposition is, to place the university at Cambridge where, as we believe, it ought not to stand, with those institutions of the State that rest upon private foundation, and are not supported by general taxation. I believe the friends of the university, at Cambridge desire to have that institution stand just exactly where, by the Constitution, it has been placed, with the public and grammar schools, preserving to it its original character as a public institution. Therefore, I am in favor of having the Constitution, in this respect, remain just as it is, and am opposed to the resolve, for the reason that it takes the university at Cambridge out of the class of public institutions, and makes it a private institution.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I should like to ask the gentleman for Berlin, why the university at Cambridge should be especially distinguished from the other institutions, in this respect.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The reason for this is, that the university at Cambridge was established by act of the legislature, and endowed with the property of the people of all the Commonwealth, while neither of the other colleges has been so endowed. That is a very good reason why the university at Cambridge should stand with the grammar and public schools of the State, as an institution of the State, resting upon the foundation laid by the State. The other institutions are private institutions, while this is a public one.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Boston. From the discussion which took place yesterday, I suppose it is a mooted question, whether the university at Cambridge is to be regarded as a public institution, over which the State has entire control, or whether it is a private institution, which the legislature cannot touch. It seems to me, it is assuming the question at issue, to assert that it is a public institution, standing upon the same foundation with our public schools, supported at the public expense. It is said, that the provision in relation to this institution was originally so inserted, when the Constitution was framed in 1780, but I suppose the reason for that was, because there was no other college or university in the State. It seems to me, that a similar provision for all the other colleges of the State, should be inserted with as much reason as this. If they all come under the provision in the antecedent clause, then the university at Cambridge will occupy the same position as the other colleges, and will have no right to claim preëminence over them in this respect. I hope the resolve, as reported by the Committee, will be adopted.

Mr. GARDNER, of Boston. This resolve has been reported to the Convention by the unanimous voice of the Committee who had the subject in charge, and we are bound to suppose that they have given it sufficient attention to understand the bearings of the case. We must come to the conclusion that they were unanimous, because there is no Minority Report, or any other Report, but the one emanating from their chairman, recommending that the Convention should make this change. I supposed the object of this Convention was, to create a Constitution for the people of the State which should be adapted to all parts of the State, and uniform in its application to all the individuals and institutions of the State. This exception of Harvard University, as contended for by gentlemen here, acts in one of two ways, either as an obstruction to the interests of the university, and upon that ground I should oppose it, and I trust that the Convention will oppose it also, or else it acts as a benefit, as a special privilege to that university, and upon that ground I should oppose it. This institution is individually signalized in the original Constitution, simply, as I understand it, for the reason just given by my colleague, (Mr. Hubbard,)—and I have given the subject some little attention—that when the Constitution was first established, this was the only institution of the kind in the Commonwealth. We are called upon now, either to place this institution upon a footing with all the other institutions of the Commonwealth, or else give it special privileges. I am in favor of sustaining the Report of the Committee, and am in favor of adopting this resolve, irrespective of the action of the Committee, because I believe it is right, just, and democratic.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. The chairman of the Committee, to whom reference has been made, and who is now absent, moved, the other day, to lay this matter over. Upon that occasion I understood him to say, that he made the motion to see what the Convention would do with the resolution acted upon yesterday. The gentleman from Boston says that the Committee made an unanimous Report, and that we are bound to suppose they had good reasons for making that Report. All we are bound to know about Committees, is this: that they report, and our duty is to examine their reports, and act according to our own views in regard to them. Of course, I would treat the report of any Committee of this Convention with great deference and respect, but we are not, by any means, compelled to follow the advice of those Committees. I agree with the delegate for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) that we ought not to pass this resolution. Harvard College was founded by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the year 1636. The Constitution so declares it, and, by its provisions, we actually pledge ourselves in the legislature to foster and cherish that institution. I regard it as standing altogether different from Amherst and Williams College. All the State did in relation to those institutions was to incorporate them, and it did not found them, as it founded Harvard College. I wish to maintain this in the Constitution as it is, as the university of Massachusetts, and I wish it to maintain that position, now and hereafter. I trust that in the future, that right will be fully and clearly established and vindicated, and therefore I hope the resolution now before us will not be adopted, and that we shall leave that portion of the Constitution precisely as it stands to-day.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. The gentlemen from Boston, have said that this matter in relation to Harvard College was put into the Constitution of 1780, because there was no other college in the State at that time. But, I may inquire, how it happens that it was kept in the Constitution of 1820? I say there was good reason for it. It was not retained by accident; and, admitting that it may have been introduced in the Constitution of 1780 for that reason, which, as a matter of fact, I do not admit, yet it was retained in the Constitution of 1820, and for the reason that the relation between the Commonwealth and Harvard College is entirely different from the relation between it and any other institution in the State. It is not only the relation which exists between a founder and the institution which is founded; but beyond that, there is a peculiar relation, growing out of the fact, that the Commonwealth has had the entire control of the college from 1780 to 1810, without any exception.

From 1636 to 1810, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts had as much control of Harvard College as of anything which it undertook to manage, and the right of the Commonwealth to this control, was never questioned up to 1810. There were collisions frequently between the board of overseers and the corporation; but, without going into the history of the matter fully, I am prepared to stand upon that statement, that up to 1810, the corporation of Harvard College never questioned the right of the Commonwealth to an absolute and entire control of the institution, in every particular. That fact, as a matter of contemporaneous history, is perfectly conclusive, and it establishes a right of the legislature to control that college, which nobody claims that the legislature has over any other institution, or it establishes a relation between that institution and the Commonwealth, which exists between no other institution and the State. The very existence of this special relation under the Constitution, implies that the Commonwealth has a right to control it, and we do not mean, by striking out that clause, to admit that the relation between Harvard College and the Commonwealth, is the same as that between any other institution and the Commonwealth. I have no doubt, that when gentlemen see the bearing of this matter, it will be retained.

In relation to the Report of the Committee, I suppose it is not improper for me to say, that the chairman of the Committee that made this Report, (Mr. Briggs,) was, at the time that he made it—for, being on the Committee on Harvard College, he expressed that opinion to that Committee—in favor, as a matter of personal preference, of dissolving the connection between the Commonwealth and Harvard College. But, gentlemen will remember that he yesterday assented to the resolution adopted by the Convention in relation to Harvard College, thus abandoning the ground he had previously taken, that as a matter of policy, it was better to abandon all connection with the college. The striking out of this phrase, is a part of the policy of severing the connection. The chairman of the Committee may have been in favor of that policy, but we all understood him yesterday, to have changed his opinion upon that matter; and, therefore, we are at liberty now to assume that he would be opposed to striking out this clause. I trust the motion will not prevail.

Mr. GILES, of Boston. The gentleman from Walpole, who has just taken his seat, has alluded to a subject which I suppose he has correctly stated. The chairman of the Committee to which this subject was referred, was also a member of a Committee to which the first section was referred. I cannot speak for that Committee, nor do I know whether any member of that Committee is present; but my impression is, that this Report was made in the expectation that the Committee to which the other subject was referred, would strike out everything relating to Harvard College, and the Report of the Committee to which the first section was referred being adopted, this resolution was expected to fall, as a matter of course. I may be mistaken, but whether it be so or not, I think it is better to let this stand, without going to the mooted question, whether this be a public institution in the sense of the common law, thereby giving the State power over it. I think there is another reason for retaining it, which is this: that this beautiful section, which I so greatly admire, after making it the duty of the legislature to cherish "all seminaries of them," to wit, of science and literature, then specifies such seminaries as the State then had, and such as she always means to have, and always ought to have, to wit: a university, and "public schools, and grammar schools in the towns."

That system of common school education, beginning now, I believe, with the primary school for almost infants, in fact, as well as in law, and terminating in your university, is that which it was designed that the legislature should cherish. I wish it to stand, for that reason, that it may always be known that we have a university, and public schools and grammar schools in towns, as making up a part of the seminaries of learning which we are to cherish in all time to come, tracing back their origin to that short and pithy clause which has been the admiration of the whole world, and deservedly so. I am, therefore, in favor of retaining that section as it stands.

The question was then taken on the final passage of the resolve, and there were, on a division, ayes, 19; noes, 108.

So the resolution was rejected.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Orders of the Day were laid on the table.

Incorporation of New Towns.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the farther consideration of the resolution in relation to the incorporation of new towns.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the rules of the Convention be suspended, in order that that resolution may be considered at the present time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention proceeded to its consideration.

The resolution is as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended, that hereafter no town shall be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I would inquire if we have not already passed upon that question, when we acted upon the resolves relating to the House of Representatives?

Mr. WILSON. I do not so understand it. It may be necessary that the legislature should incorporate a town with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, although that town may not be entitled to a representation in the House of Representatives. It has been necessary, heretofore, and although we have provided that a new town with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants shall not be represented, yet, if a town wishes to be incorporated without the right of representation, and it is for their interest to be incorporated, I see no objection to it. I therefore move, that the farther consideration of the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk. I have only a single word to say, with regard to this question. I am very desirous that the resolution should pass, in some form, and, if it were admissible, I should like to move an amendment that no town should be incorporated hereafter, with less than one thousand inhabitants. If the provision stands as it is, with regard to representation, and no town can be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, it may deprive some towns of privileges which they ought to possess. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Natick will not prevail, and that there will be an opportunity offered to amend the resolution, and that it may then be passed. I think it will deprive certain towns in the Commonwealth of privileges which they ought to possess, and which I can conceive no reason why they should not enjoy. The gentleman from Natick lives in a very flourishing town, which is growing up and becoming wealthy; and, I suppose, he does not care so much for the interests of the smaller towns adjoining, which wish to be incorporated; at least, he is not solicitous that they should be incorporated, and have the right of representation on the floor of the House of Representatives. I know that when the basis of representation was fixed, it was provided that fifteen hundred inhabitants should be required, to entitle a new town to a representative, and I am opposed to that also. I wish, if the gentleman from Natick has no objection—and I can see no reason why he should have any—he would withdraw his motion, that this resolution may be modified.

Mr. BIGELOW, of Grafton. I do not see why, if this motion to postpone the resolution indefinitely prevails, we are not left in a position that we may incorporate a town with any number of inhabitants we please. Why do we need to put this provision in the Constitution? Why shall we say that any town with six hundred inhabitants, shall not be incorporated, if they please? It seems to me it is very proper to postpone this subject indefinitely.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I see that this resolution is somewhat different from the one in relation to the basis of representation, but it does not seem to me to embrace all that it ought to. That provides that no town shall be incorporated, with the right of representation, with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants; but there is no declaration that the town shall not be divided in a manner so as to leave less than fifteen hundred in the old town. So that I do not see, but that with this provision, a town might be divided so as to leave only one thousand, and create a new town with fifteen hundred, which would be evading the object of the provision on the basis of representation. I would suggest to the gentleman from Natick, that he withdraw his motion, and allow the resolution to be amended so as to read: that no town shall be incorporated when, by the division of a town, there are less than fifteen hundred inhabitants left in the town from which the new town shall be taken.

Mr. RANTOUL, of Beverly. It appears to me that this subject had best be left with the legislature. I think we should not impose any restrictions. Circumstances may occur, when it may be necessary to incorporate a town with a less number, and it may be exceedingly desirable to persons that the town shall be incorporated, and it may be for their convenience, and for the public interest, that it should be done. It seems to me there can be no necessity or advantage in imposing such a restriction upon the legislature that they cannot make such laws as are desirable from time to time.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I

Monday,]

NEW TOWNS, &c.—FROTHINGHAM—LELAND—HOOPER—GARDNER—BROWN.

[July 18th.

agree with the gentleman from Beverly, who has just spoken. I hope the resolution will be postponed. It seems to me, it is entirely inexpedient and wrong in principle. If there has been any policy which has distinguished Massachusetts, and made us what we are, it has been the policy of incorporating towns. I should like to know if a community, living on contiguous territory, wishes to enjoy town privileges, and comes up to the legislature,—be it five hundred, or fifteen hundred inhabitants,—and asks the benefits of a town incorporation, what argument can be adduced to show that they should not enjoy those privileges. The question in relation to town representation, is another thing entirely, and ought not to be connected with it; that is, the principle of local self-government is one thing, and the principle of representation, is another, and the latter is always provided for. But, as to the question of the policy and the propriety of incorporating towns, there can be naturally but one answer given to it, and but one true view of it, and that is, to incorporate them whenever good and sufficient reasons can be shown for doing it.

The more towns we have, and the more power is subdivided in Massachusetts, or anywhere else, the sounder will be our republicanism. That is my view of this matter.

It has been the policy of Massachusetts, from the earliest times, to multiply towns; and it has been the object also, of those who have endeavored to restrict Massachusetts, to restrict the incorporation of towns. Long before the Revolution, there was an order sent over here from the British administration, prohibiting our governors from assenting to the incorporation of towns; and we took the ground here, that it was a natural right which the people had, to enjoy self-government, and so, when they could not get at the name of towns, they incorporated themselves under the name of precincts, parishes, or something else, in order to get as much of the value of this self-government as possible.

As long as I am up, I will take occasion to make a few remarks respecting one other point, in relation to the origin of our towns. I have heard it stated by the venerable gentleman before me, (Mr. Morton,)—and some others have said the same thing,—that our towns came from the custom of making forts, and perhaps out of some other institutions, such as the church. Indeed, this is a very common opinion. I am not going into a long speech about this matter, but merely to state a fact or two, or a view that has grown up out of facts in relation to this subject. Let any one go back and trace out how it was that Boston, and Lynn, and Salem, and all the earlier towns, came to be incorporated, came to be towns, not how they came by their territory, but more precisely how they came to have their form of town government. Did they obtain this right from the first charter? did they come by it from a law of the British Parliament? Did they copy the example of England, in relation to towns, and follow on in an old custom, as to electing town officers? No! not at all! They had no warrant for what they did, neither in the charter, the statute, nor usage. When Sir Edmund Andros came over here, and saw the beautiful operation of the towns, their democratic feature, their republicanism, their great popular privileges, he was jealous of the spread of Commonwealth notions, and saw that these towns were nurturing a principle anything but in harmony with the British Constitution. But there was no British law to justify this system,—nothing to justify a town, in the New England sense of the term,—and when selectmen, in resisting his arbitrary laws, pleaded town action, he snapped his fingers at them, and told them there was no such thing as a town in all New England. And Sir Edmund Andros was right. He took his idea of towns from Old England; and there was no comparison at all, as to government, between the towns of New England and the towns of Old England. That is, the governments of the towns of Old England were close corporations, self-elected councils, little oligarchies, without a single valuable popular right. There was no such thing as this in New England. How came we by our town government? This is a short story of the matter: When our people came over here, they acted, at first, in town meeting, all together; they were so many little democracies. But they soon found that this mode of determining town affairs was too inconvenient; it took up too much time; and what did they do next? Their object was to remedy an evil, and to provide for a necessary want. I can point gentlemen to the original constitution of a board of selectmen. The inhabitants of the towns came together, before there was any law of the general court in regard to the matter—years before—and signed an instrument, to the effect that, inasmuch as the trouble of these frequent town meetings was so very great, they would agree to be bound by what seven of their number should do, as though it were done by them. Then followed the election of those officers, and other officers; and this was done in Charlestown, and it was done in other towns, before there was any law to regulate elections. Such was the origin of the towns, and of town government. The people brought with them the great idea of popular sovereignty, and all through it was a struggle to apply this to their condition. They applied it to a town or local form of government, assuming the right to do it, before there was any law or practice to authorize or to justify it. In a few years the general court reorganized the towns, and made laws to regulate their proceedings, and so it has gone on from that time to this, to the immense advantage of the country.

Now, I am in favor of allowing this great idea to be established, viz.: That the people have a right to be incorporated into new towns when the growth of the community and the increase of population and change of interests in certain localities leads individuals to apply for town privileges. I see nothing in the whole system but benefits to the communities concerned, from allowing them to divide, and granting to them the right and privilege of self-government. I have been here upon this floor when large towns and old towns have been divided, when the progress of business and population have created in certain localities large interests,—commercial or manufacturing interests, it may be,—distinct from the ancient agricultural interests, where such new communities claimed the right to manage their own local concerns in their own way; or it has been the other way, that is: the agricultural interest has claimed that it ought not to be taxed to support the commercial interest, as in the case of Somerville and Charlestown. Now, what argument can be brought against such claims? There is no argument; nor is there evil in creating towns for such reasons; and I am in favor of keeping this where it is—that is, of leaving the whole matter with the legislature.

Mr. LELAND, of Holliston. I think this matter ought not to be indefinitely postponed at this time; for I think, with the gentleman from Fall River, that there is a necessity for amending this resolve. Suppose it should pass in its present form, and hereafter a town with twenty-five hundred inhabitants should wish to be divided so as to get additional representation. We do not know what may happen, and it is wise to provide for it. Well, Sir, fifteen hundred of the inhabitants can be set off and incorporated into a new town, and the thousand who are left will also be entitled to their town rights. I think this is something which we ought to provide for, and, therefore, I hope that the resolution will be amended accordingly.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I move to amend this resolve by striking out all after the word "incorporated," and inserting the words "by a division of a town, leaving less than fifteen hundred inhabitants in the town from which the new town shall be taken," so that the resolve, as amended, will read as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that hereafter no town shall be incorporated, by a division of a town, leaving less than fifteen hundred inhabitants in the town from which the new town shall be taken.

I fully agree with the remarks of the gentleman, and see no necessity for putting any barrier in the way of an unlimited incorporation of towns, that is not necessary to guard it in relation to representation; it has already been guarded in one respect, and it seems to me to be necessary that it should also be guarded in the other.

Mr. GARDNER, of Boston. Mr. President: It is the first time that I have made the motion which I now make, in this Convention, and it will probably be the last; but, Sir, I am not in favor of sitting here and doing business in the absence of a legal quorum of this body. I am of the opinion that there is not a quorum now present, and I therefore make the motion that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. SCHOULER. For the purpose of determining whether there is a quorum or not, I ask for a division.

The question being taken, on a division, there were—ayes, 38; noes, 59—no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly, at twenty minutes before two o'clock, the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, July 18, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at nine o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Limitation of Speeches.

Mr. BROWN, of Medway, submitted an order that hereafter all speeches, except those of the chairmen of Committees, be limited to fifteen minutes each.

Monday,]

NEW TOWNS.—SARGENT—EARLE—HOYT—CHURCHILL—HALLETT.

[July 18th.

The order was laid over for consideration to-morrow.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day, the first subject being the resolve on the subject of the

Incorporation of New Towns,

Which is as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that hereafter, no town shall be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants.

To this resolve an amendment had been moved by the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) and Mr. Wilson, of Natick, had moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I am opposed to the amendment, and in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Natick. I believe we are attempting to establish a false principle in the Constitution. I do not believe that the question of the incorporation of new towns can be settled upon mere numbers; it must be settled upon the circumstances which surround each particular case. There may be a case where it would be of the utmost importance that a new town should be incorporated, where there were not more than five or six hundred inhabitants; and in other cases it might neither be proper or just to incorporate a town, although there were more than fifteen hundred. I presume that the object of this amendment is to remedy an evil which it is feared may grow out of our basis of representation. If that be the case, to my mind it affords no argument in favor of adopting another wrong principle, because two wrongs can never make a right. The amendment is proposed for the purpose of preventing the legislature from so dividing a town that the original town shall be deprived of its annual representation. Now, Sir, this matter of dividing towns, or creating new towns, is a mere matter of profit and loss. The legislature have always required, and I believe, always will require, that the petitioners for a new town should make out a clear and undeniable case, that the benefits to be derived from the incorporation of that town were greater than the evils to be inflicted; and whenever such a case is made out, irrespective of numbers, then I hold that the power should be vested in the legislature to grant the prayer of the petitioners. Suppose that a petition comes before the legislature for a division of a town in this Commonwealth in such a manner that the original town will have less than one thousand inhabitants, and will thereby be deprived of a portion of its representation. That is an element, and it is one of great weight for the legislature to consider. It is one of the elements of law, and unless they can show that benefits are to be derived which will more than counterbalance the evils, the legislature will never so disserve a town. I hold, therefore, that the adoption of this resolution, either as it was originally reported, or as it is proposed to be amended, would be ingrafting a false principle in the Constitution; it would be fettering the legislature upon an important subject, and one which, it is altogether safer to leave in their hands, so that each case may be decided upon its real merits, instead of being decided upon mere numbers.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be rejected, and that the motion of the gentleman from Natick will prevail.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I am opposed to the amendment, which is offered, because, it appears to me, that it creates just as great an evil as it attempts to remedy. It proposes to strike out the provision by which no new town shall be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, and to provide that no old town shall be left, by the incorporation of a new one, with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants. It permits, in fact, that a new town may be incorporated with only five hundred inhabitants; but it says, that by so doing, you shall not leave an old town with less than fifteen hundred. Now, Sir, I am opposed to any provision of this kind. I think that these town corporations are intended for the benefit of the inhabitants. They have little to do with territorial arrangements, except so far as they tend to the convenience of the inhabitants for their municipal concerns; and wherever the convenience of the people requires a municipal corporation of this kind, although there may not be more than a thousand or twelve hundred, I see no reason why they should not have it. I am, therefore, opposed to having any provision inserted into the Constitution in relation to this matter. I think that the provision, which has already been agreed to, that no town shall be incorporated, with a right to representation, as such, which had less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, is all that we need to do, and all the restriction that we need to impose. If a population of a thousand, or twelve hundred, suppose they will be better accommodated by a town corporation, without the right to representation, except as connected with the town from which they are to be set off, and choose to take an act of incorporation under such circumstances, I see no reason why they should not have it. They would then be placed in the situation of corporations formerly made, where districts were established, having all the rights of towns except that of representation. I see no reason why that right should not be still given, and therefore I am opposed both to the amendment and to the original proposition, and I hope that neither of them will pass.

Mr. HOYT, of Deerfield. I must confess that the form of the proposition, as proposed to be amended, does not meet my view; but yet I do think that it is important that some provision should be inserted into the Constitution, to regulate the creation of new towns. As was remarked by the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) this subject is intimately connected with the system of representation which this Convention have adopted; but, if I understood him, he seemed to assume that that system was wrong, and that we could not make a provision to secure a thing which was wrong, that would not itself be wrong. But to those who consider that the system of representation is right, of course, his reasoning would not apply. I think that this is a matter which should not be left entirely to the control and direction of the legislature; but, that the towns themselves should have a voice in this matter; and I should like a provision that new towns should not be incorporated without the consent of a majority of the voters of the town from which the territory was to be created. As towns are incorporated for the convenience of the inhabitants, I regard those inhabitants as the best judges of the importance, or the necessity, or propriety, in every case, of making a new town, or of making a very material change in the limits of a town, especially if the system of representation which has been adopted by this Convention, should be ratified by the people.

Mr. EARLE. There is one objection, which has suggested itself to my mind, against having any provision of this kind, and that is this: There are cases—very strong cases sometimes—which require the incorporation of new towns where there may not be this number of inhabitants; and there will be a very great tendency, if a provision of this kind is ingrafted into the Constitution, to include inhabitants who would not choose to go to the new towns, to enlarge the limits, and thereby inflict an injury upon those who are thus taken in. It appears to me that we gain nothing by this proposition. I do not see any advantage in it. I regard the legislature as the proper judge, whether there is a good cause or not, for the incorporation of a town, because they will have all the facts before them; they can better judge whether a town ought to be incorporated, with twelve or thirteen hundred inhabitants, than we, sitting here without any facts before us, possibly can do. I think, therefore, that if we leave the Constitution as it is, we shall do the best thing that we can do.

Mr. CHURCHILL, of Milton. I am certainly in favor of some restriction of this sort, and shall vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett). I think it is essentially necessary that a restriction should be placed upon the creation of additional towns, for this reason: It strikes me, that one of the evils which may grow out of the basis of representation for the lower House, which we shall probably adopt, is a large increase in the size of that body. That evil, every gentleman must see, is liable to be increased by the cutting up of large towns into one, two, or three additional towns, having between one and four thousand inhabitants, which are now entitled to send one representative to the legislature. In that way, your House of Representatives may be, by political parties, and influenced by political motives, increased, year after year, to a size which every one will regret to see. For that reason, I shall vote for some restriction.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I wish to suggest, for the consideration of the Convention, whether the gentleman's amendment ought not to go farther, so as to prevent the possibility of one town dividing itself into two or three towns, and thus multiply its representation? It is proposed, in the basis of representation, that no new town shall be created, with a right of representation, having a population of less than fifteen hundred inhabitants. Now, if this provision should pass, or if there be no limitation in that respect, will not this state of cases arise all over the Commonwealth? For example: Here is a town with two thousand five hundred inhabitants, which is now entitled to send one representative, and, remaining a town, intact and undivided, by no process under the basis of representation could it be entitled to more than one representative, until it had nearly doubled its population. Yet, that town of twenty-five hundred inhabitants, by taking off fifteen hundred, may make a new town, and, in such case, the new town at once acquires the right of representation; because, according to the proposed Constitution, the new town, with fifteen hundred inhabitants, will be entitled to a representative, while you cannot possibly take away the representation from the old town, with one thousand inhabitants; and thus, by this division, such town with twenty-five hundred inhabitants, will obtain two representatives. Now carry this rule to a town having forty-five hundred inhabitants, and, by taking out twice fifteen hundred inhabitants you will enable the town, so divided, to send three representatives instead of two.

Monday,]

NEW TOWNS.—GRAY—WILSON—KINSMAN—EARLE—HOYT—FROTHINGHAM.

[July 18th.]

It seems to me that by such a course you place the House of Representatives somewhat in the position the British Constitution places the increase of the House of Lords, by which the crown, whenever it is desirable to carry any measure in the House of Lords, and the lords being refractory and opposed to it, may create a sufficient number of additional peers, so as to obtain a majority. Even the threat to make new peers, carried the Reform Bill. And, Sir, may not any party in this House that desires to carry a particular measure at a future election, manufacture new towns out of old ones, and go on in this way and send forty or fifty additional representatives? I want therefore to guard against this, by a provision that new towns shall not add to the representation of the old towns, or one similar to that existing in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the jurisdiction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned. I want a provision of some kind here, so far as to say that no new town shall be created within the limits of an existing town so as to increase the representation of the old and new towns, put together—so that if the legislature makes a new town with fifteen hundred inhabitants, out of an old town, leaving one thousand, they shall not do it so as to multiply its particular representation within that territory; because I regard the basis we propose, and which always has prevailed, (and that is the only principle upon which I can stand,) as a representation of communities, in the town or towns, and in that capacity as all copartners entering into an arrangement in regard to their representation in this House; and I do not want any new partner to come in until I know on what terms, and with what capital he is to be admitted. Although there may be cases in which it will be necessary to incorporate new towns for convenience, with fifteen hundred inhabitants or under that number, I am convinced that there ought to be a provision incorporated into the Constitution, determining that these towns, thus divided, should not multiply their representation, because, as we have seen, it would be the easiest thing in the world for any town, with over 2,600 inhabitants, to divide itself into two towns, and have more representatives than its just proportion, and which could not be done by the smaller towns or larger cities. The city of Boston, perhaps, could not do it very conveniently—but, upon the same principle, she might divide her twelve wards into one hundred towns, of fifteen hundred inhabitants each, and thus multiply her representation indefinitely. I wish to guard against any such objection to the proposed basis.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I do not think that we can adopt this restriction without injustice to the people of the Commonwealth. The gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) will not suspect me of being very much in favor of a large House of Representatives, or of thinking that the House the Convention has already provided for, is not large enough; but I do think that to insert a provision preventing towns from being formed for fear of having too large a House, is inflicting upon them an evil which ought to be guarded against in some other way—that is by some provision as to representation. I do not hold—and I suppose that no gentleman holds—that the sole purpose of the creation of towns is, that they may be represented as towns in the legislature. I had supposed that the greater part of the benefits which result from town government, result, so to speak, from what may be called their operation downwards from the people of the town, and not from their operation upwards in this House of the legislature. In this, I believe, is the greater part of the benefits which accrue to the towns from their particular organization as such. It is enough, I think, to say that many benefits result from the operations of these town governments in their internal structure, and I agree with the gentleman from Worcester, that we may deprive them of great advantages, and inflict upon them many positive evils by a provision of this kind. I think the whole matter can be safely left where it has always been—in the hands of the legislature.

Mr. HALLETT. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. HALLETT. Then I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:—

"But the incorporation of any new town shall not thereby increase the whole number of representatives."

Mr. EARLE. I wish to hear the amendment read as it is proposed to be amended.

It was accordingly read, as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended, that no town hereafter shall be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, but the incorporation of any new town shall not thereby increase the whole number of representatives.

Mr. WILSON, of Shelburne. It seems to me that such a provision as that involved in the amendment of the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) will amount almost to an entire prohibition in regard to the formation of any new towns. As I understand the matter, it would, in some instances, operate very hardly. Let me suppose a case. Suppose, for instance, that just upon the border of any town having fifteen hundred inhabitants, some manufacturing establishment shall be originated, forming a nucleus for a new population. Suppose, farther, that the manufacture flourishes, and the people gather together in that vicinity in sufficient numbers to warrant them—taking a very small portion from the old town—in applying for a town organization, their convenience and prosperity being thereby greatly promoted. Will anybody say that it shall be refused? On what grounds? It may be all very right and proper, but I must confess that I do not see it so. To say that there shall be no new corporation granted unless the population of the town from which the new one is to be taken amounts to fifteen hundred, I think is unreasonable, and that no such provision should be adopted. I think it would be unsatisfactory to the people. There are large sections of the country and various interests which are anxious to have new towns; and, with such a provision as this in your Constitution, I think they will be very likely to vote against it, when the question of adoption or rejection comes to be tried.

Mr. KINSMAN, of Newburyport. The proposition of the gentleman for Wilbraham, is one which I cannot but regard as unequal and unjust, and it will be found, that if we once commence this course of injustice, it will follow throughout. It appears to me that nothing can be more unjust than the proposition now before the Convention. I have, in my mind's eye, a town about ten miles in length and three in breadth, a portion of which is largely engaged in manufacturing, and there is very little doubt that it is soon destined to be a city. Now such being the case—this establishment being in the centre of the town—neither extremity will have population sufficient to make a town of fifteen hundred inhabitants, and consequently, after the city is set off, neither of them will have a town organization. What then is to become of these extremities? The farming part of that town do not want to pay for gas, and other matters appertaining to a city; they do not want to pay for that class of schools from which they receive no benefit. These appear to me to be reasons why the matter had better be left to the legislature to arrange, as circumstances from time to time may require. I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. It will be recollected that we have already adopted a provision, that towns shall not be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants with the right of representation, and that is also naturally a provision against the incorporation of any town which shall leave another town with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants. It appears to me that that is going quite as far as we ought to go in regard to the restriction. The case which has been stated by the gentleman from Newburyport, is much in point, showing that cases of great hardship may arise, by any provision of a kind like that which it is now proposed to insert. From my own observation, I know that there would be many similar cases.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question next recurring on the amendment offered to the Report of the Committee, by the gentleman from Fall River, it was decided in the negative, and the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) that the farther consideration of this subject be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOYT, of Deerfield. Before the question is taken on that motion, I wish to offer an amendment. It is as follows:—

Strike out all after the word "incorporated," and insert "without the consent of the town or towns, from which the territory shall be taken."

So as to make the proposition read as follows:

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended, that hereafter no town shall be incorporated without the consent of the town or towns, from which the territory shall be taken.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I do not know that it is necessary to say a word about

Monday,]

NEW TOWNS, &c.—SCHOULER—HOYT—UPTON—BRADBURY—LIVERMORE.

[July 18th.]

the amendment. I am strongly opposed to the principle that no new towns shall be incorporated unless the old ones consent to it. Why, Mr. President, the strongest reasons for the incorporation of new towns, are often the very reasons which the old towns allege against it. The reason is, that the new town has grown up with an interest about it which is distinct and separate from the interest of the old town, and, in view of those interests, it comes to the legislature, and asks as a right, that this new collection of people shall enjoy town privileges—that is to say, that they shall not be taxed for things which they do not use. You can find a great many instances, in the history of even a few years past, of this kind. Take the instance of the town of Charlestown and Somerville, in which we of Charlestown were much opposed to being divided, and nevertheless there was in Charlestown a commercial interest, and in Somerville an agricultural interest, and it was not right, upon any principle of justice, that the people of Charlestown should tax the agricultural interest of Somerville for those things which the commercial interest wished to enjoy, but which the agricultural interest stood in no need of. But I will not enlarge upon this point. It must strike every one that the principle is radically unjust, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "town or towns," and insert the word "legislature."

The PRESIDENT stated, that if the amendment was adopted, the resolve would stand as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that hereafter no town shall be incorporated without the consent of the legislature, from which the territory shall be taken." [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS, of Lowell, moved the previous question.

Mr. SCHOULER withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HOYT, of Deerfield. I am not in the habit of troubling the Convention, and I ask their indulgence a single moment.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw my call for the previous question.

Mr. HOYT, of Deerfield. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) I would say that I have no doubt there may be cases of injustice under this provision,—instances in which the old town will object to setting off the new town, in cases where it is perfectly proper that the new town should be set off. All agree that the multiplication of new towns is an evil; and that it may affect the system of representation which this Convention has adopted, any one may see with half an eye. But neither will the legislature, if it is left to them, always do justice in every case. The real evil is the multiplication of small towns, and there must be some limit upon it. I do not believe that the inhabitants of the towns themselves will always judge rightly and justly; but if it is true, as has been said and reiterated, again and again, in this Convention, that the people will decide more correctly and justly, in regard to matters concerning themselves, than any other body can, then the people, who are more directly interested in this particular question, will be likely to decide justly upon questions of this nature. I do not believe, if there should arise a case of this nature, which should operate with great injustice upon a particular body, that the people will sanction it. I do not believe that the people will be actuated by such motives as will lead them to the commission of such injustice. I hope the Convention will adopt the amendment—no, I do not hope that, for I think the sense of the Convention is not in favor of it—but I wish they would adopt it.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. I propose to make but one single remark upon this proposition. I think that the suggestion of the gentleman for Wilbraham is worthy of consideration, and entitled to weight before this Convention. There are eighty-five towns in the Commonwealth now entitled to one representative, and if the Convention propose to leave the basis of representation as it is now, and to make no modification in the Constitution, restricting the incorporation of towns, at the very next session of the legislature, after the next census shall have been taken in 1855, you will have eighty-five more representatives from those towns than you now have. A state of things which will allow this, ought not to exist; but it is not for me, as one of the minority of this Convention, to point out how the evil should be remedied. Yet I suggest that after your basis is changed, under the census of 1855, these eighty-five towns may be divided, and there will come up here, from these towns, eighty-five representatives more than they are now entitled to send. I state this in order to bring the attention of the Convention to the consideration of its effect.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Deerfield, (Mr. Hoyt,) and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the motion of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) that the consideration of the subject be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. I understand, then, if this subject is indefinitely postponed, it will be in the power of the legislature to increase the number of the towns in the Commonwealth at pleasure, and that every town, according to the present basis of representation, that shall hereafter be created, having one thousand inhabitants, will have the right of constant representation.

Mr. EARLE. I would remark that we have already restricted that right to towns having fifteen hundred inhabitants.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. Then every town which shall be created, and having fifteen hundred inhabitants, will be entitled to constant representation.

If I understand the basis which the House has established, in 1860, every town, whatever may be its present rights, which shall not contain fifty-five hundred inhabitants, will have but one representative; and in 1870, every town in the Commonwealth not possessing eighty-three hundred inhabitants, will have but one representative. As I understand it, the town of Nantucket is now entitled to three representatives, and by the rate of increase in the basis, which we have adopted, she will have but two representatives in 1860, and but one in 1870. There are towns in the Commonwealth that will have about 16,000 inhabitants in 1870. Such is the town which you represent, Mr. President, and the adjoining town which I have the honor to represent, and they will be entitled then to two representatives, whereas they now have two representatives upon four thousand of population.

That being the basis established by a majority of this House, it affects very materially the question before this Convention, at the present time; and to postpone, indefinitely, action upon it, is equivalent to a rejection of it, and will leave it in the power of the legislature to increase this difficulty, and to increase the disproportion which now exists.

Another thing, it most manifestly increases the political motives which have ever existed for the creation of new towns. There is a political motive, every-body knows,—and parties here have been charged with being governed by such considerations,—for the increase of the number of towns, and so far as political considerations have had any weight heretofore, they have been increased by the decision of this Convention, most manifestly.

I think the consideration of the question ought not to be indefinitely postponed, but that some action should be had in reference to it. An indefinite postponement is equivalent to a rejection of all action.

The question was then taken upon the motion submitted by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes, 133; noes, 46.

So the subject was indefinitely postponed.

Payment of Officers of the Convention.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge, from the Committee on the Pay Roll, submitted the following Report:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 18, 1853.

The Committee on the Pay Roll, who were instructed by an order, adopted on the 27th of June last, to report "a resolve for the payment of the chaplain and other officers of the Convention," have duly considered the subject, and report the accompanying resolve.

For the Committee,

ISAAC LIVERMORE, Chairman.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the treasury of the Commonwealth, to the several persons whose names are borne on the accompanying list, for each and every day's service, as follows: to the two secretaries, ten dollars each; to the chaplain, three dollars; to the messenger, five dollars; to the two assistant messengers, three dollars each; to the door-keeper and three assistant door-keepers, three dollars each; to the postmaster three dollars; to the four pages, two dollars each; and the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the council, is hereby requested to draw his warrant on the treasurer for the same, on an order of this Convention.

List of officers embraced in the above resolve:

William S. Robinson, James T. Robinson, Secretaries; Warren Burton, Chaplain; Benjamin Stevens, Messenger; Issachar Fuller, Tilson Fuller, Assistant Messengers; Alexis Poole, Door-keeper; David Murphy, William M. Wise, John A. Sargent, Assistant Door-keepers; William Sayward, Postmaster; Joseph P. Dexter, Jr., Charles A. Murphy, James N. Tolman, Jr., Thaddeus Page, Pages.

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY, &c. — HALLETT — BUTLER — WHEELER — STEVENSON.

[July 18th.

Negligence of Railroad Corporations.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham, from the Committee appointed to consider the subject, made the following Report :—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 18, 1853.

The Committee to whom was referred the order relating to remedies to the representatives of persons killed by the negligence or misconduct of railroad corporations, have considered the same, and report, that there should be added to the eleventh article of the Bill of Rights, the following clause :—

Where death is caused through negligence or misconduct, by means of railroads, steamboats, or public conveyances for hire, the same remedies shall be open in a suit at law, as for like injuries to the person resulting in disability and not in death.

B. F. HALLETT, Chairman.

The Report was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

The Late Member for Concord.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Pay Roll, make up the per diem of the late delegate from Concord, including the entire session.

Judiciary.

The next subject on the Orders of the Day, being the resolves in relation to the Judiciary, on motion by Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, said resolves were laid upon the table for the present, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole, on the subject of Elections by Plurality.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Hillard, of Boston, in the chair, and proceeded to consider the resolves on the subject of Elections by Plurality and Majority.

They were read, as follows :—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that a majority of all the votes given shall be necessary to the election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general, of the Commonwealth, until otherwise provided by law; but no such law providing that the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, attorney-general, and representatives to the general court, or either of them, shall be elected by plurality, instead of a majority of votes given in, shall take effect until one year after its passage; and, if at any time after the enactment of any such law, and the same shall have taken effect, such law shall be repealed, such repeal shall not become a law until one year after the passage of the repealing act; and in default of any such law, if at any election of either of the above-named officers, except the representatives to the general court, no person shall have a majority of the votes given, the House of Representatives shall, by a majority of viva voce votes, elect two out of three persons who had the highest, if so many shall have been voted for, and return the persons so elected to the Senate, from which the Senate shall, by viva voce vote, elect one who shall be governor.

4. Resolved, That in the election of all city or town officers, such rule of election shall govern as the legislature may by law prescribe.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I wish to make a farther amendment to the first resolve, which amendment, I take it, will pass without comment, and then I will explain the views of the Committee, in reporting the resolves they have. It will be observed, that in copying the resolves, an error has crept in. The resolve provides now, that in case of the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the Commonwealth, there shall be no election for want of a majority vote, then the House of Representatives shall send up to the Senate, two out of the three persons who have the highest number of votes, if so many shall have been voted for, and then the Senate, shall, by viva voce vote, elect one who shall be governor; and there it stops. To make the resolve perfect, I propose to add to the end of the resolve the words, "or other officers to be thus elected."

Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln. I should like to inquire of somebody, who knows better than I do, whether this Convention has not passed a resolution, that in case of a failure of an election of governor, he shall be chosen by the Senate and House of Representatives assembled in one House. If so, I cannot conceive of any necessity of this provision.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the gentleman will allow this amendment to pass, the whole matter will be then open to discussion. My amendment is simply designed to perfect the resolve, and make it such as it was intended to be. It corrects verbal errors and grammatical inaccuracies which have crept in.

The question was taken upon Mr. Butler's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I propose another amendment, which is to change the word, "which," where it last occurs in the first resolve, into the word "whom." The error is a grammatical one. The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee which reported these resolves, have stated briefly, in the report accompanying the resolves, the reasons which induced them to come to the conclusion to which they arrived. They believed that all those officers who are elected by general ticket, and who represent the whole people of the Commonwealth, either in the executive or other department of the Commonwealth, should be elected by a majority of the people—if it were possible to get such a vote. If it is not possible, that then a course as near that as can be, should be adopted, to wit: that the House should select, from a very limited number, which in practice, must be those who have very nearly an equal number of votes, two out of three of those, and send their names to the Senate. The Convention having put the Senate upon the basis of population, the Senate shall then, by a viva voce vote, select one of those persons to be governor, &c. They will then, in fact be elected by the representatives of the whole people, under a full sense of their responsibility.

[The copy for the remainder of Mr. Butler's speech was handed to the author for revision, and was not returned in season to be inserted in its proper place.]

Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln. Some minutes ago, I called the attention of the Convention to the fact that they had already passed a resolve directing that the governor should be elected by joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives. I find in your official report that on May 9th, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution as to provide that in case of a failure in the election of governor by the people, he shall be elected by the Senate and House of Representatives, by joint ballot.

Now, I am not able to see the propriety or expediency of adopting this resolve, providing that the governor shall be elected in the manner laid down in the first resolution reported by the Committee, when the Convention have already settled the question, so far as the governor is concerned, by a previous resolution.

My only object was to call the attention of the Convention to the fact. If gentlemen will take pains to look at the official report, they will find that this resolution passed on the 9th of May.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Boston. It is true, as has been stated by the chairman of the select Committee, (Mr. Butler,) that the question, whether the plurality or the majority rule shall determine the result in our elections, has already occupied a great deal of the time of this Convention, and has been somewhat elaborately discussed; and it may be presumption in me to suppose that any suggestions which I could make, would be the source of any additional light upon it. Still, having been, by the indulgence of the President, a member of the Committee to which this matter was referred, after that discussion; having participated in the deliberations of that Committee, and not being able to give my assent to the conclusions to which they have come, I feel it my duty to ask the indulgence of the Committee, while I briefly state the reasons for my dissent.

It certainly, Mr. Chairman, would be unnecessary, in an assembly like this, convened for the purposes for which we are convened, to ask gentlemen not to allow their opinions to be warped, or their votes to be affected here, in any manner, by the light of the last election returns, or by the glimmer of what they may anticipate as the next. Still, it is not to be denied by any one, that, from the very fact that the subject which we are treating of, viz.: that of the election of the officers of the government, is one upon which party organizations are but too apt to expend their efforts. There is danger that we may find ourselves asking ourselves—although we might blush to ask another the question—what effect this or that rule would have upon the party with which we are associated? That is a danger against which every fair and high-minded gentleman is bound to arm himself. It is a danger, which, if not heeded, will mislead us in the very pursuit which it prompts; for parties are evanescent, while the rule, which we shall establish, is intended to be permanent.

If we will appreciate that danger, and arm ourselves against it, avoid it, or crush it, the Convention will not assent to the Report of this Committee as it stands. I supposed the purpose was to recommit this matter, after discussion, to see if some middle ground could not be found in reference to a matter, about which there was so much difference of opinion; although I cannot understand how it can be made to appear that, if the plurality rule be in derogation of the principles of democracy, when applied to one office, it can be shown to be consistent with the principles of democracy when applied to another office. Still, the Committee have undertaken to meet that difficulty, and have recommended a complex system of different rules for different offices; and the question with us is, is it wise to establish different rules for different cases. The other question that comes after that, if it should be answered in the affirmative, is, have the Committee made a proper application of these different rules to the different cases in this Report. It is proposed here, that a majority shall be insisted upon in the cases of all officers who are to be voted for by the whole people; in the case of county officers, and officers voted for in districts, that they shall be elected by plurality, and in the case of representatives, and town or city officers, that a majority shall be required on the first ballot, and that a plurality shall be sufficient on the second ballot. The first question that is to be answered by our vote in regard to this Report, is, is it wise to make a complex system? Is there any reason why the rule should not be the same in the one case, as in the other? And if we come to the conclusion that there are reasons for making this difference, still, the chairman of the Committee is bound to answer the other question, whether he has made a proper application of the rule in this Report. I should give a negative answer to both of these propositions. In regard to the question, whether it is wise to establish a complex system here in Massachusetts, I would beg gentlemen to remember that the whole argument which was advanced here in Committee when the subject was before us upon a previous occasion, against the establishment of the plurality system, was, that it was in derogation of the principles of democracy, and in violation of the principle that the majority should rule. Changes were rung upon that proposition, until it appeared as if it would drown every suggestion of convenience and expediency. The convenience of the people must not be consulted by this body, for the reason that that principle must not be invaded. I would ask the chairman of the Committee; I would ask all the other members of the majority of the Committee, and all those who are influenced by the arguments which they present, whether, when they are constituting a legislature to consist of three branches, each having a negative upon the other two, it is not just as wrong to violate the asserted principle in regard to one of them, as it would be in regard to another of them, or to all of them? If it be a principle, what has become of it? Where has it gone? It is not here in this Report. How is it, that the principles of democracy are violated, when one of these three branches is filled by the votes of a plurality of the electors, and not violated when the other two branches of the same department of the government are filled by precisely the same means? How is it, that the asserted principle is not violated when the senators and representatives, who must enact or repeal, as the case may be, each law, before the governor will have the power to assent to or to veto it, are elected by a plurality, but is violated, when the branch possessing only a partial negative upon the other two, is elected in the same way?

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — STEVENSON.

[July 18th.

I appeal to gentlemen, to know, upon the argument which has been presented here, over and over again, and the only argument which has been urged against the establishment of the plurality system here in Massachusetts, whether this Report is not based, either upon an utter repudiation of that argument, or else upon a willingness to sacrifice the asserted principle to what is deemed to be the present condition of parties. Anti-democratic to elect a governor by a plurality of the votes of the people? Why not, then, anti-democratic to elect senators and representatives in the same way! Anti-republican to elect a secretary or treasurer of your Commonwealth by a plurality of votes cast? Why not, then, anti-republican to elect your selectmen, overseers of the poor, mayor and aldermen, in the same way! I cannot understand this.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, that we elect both the secretary, treasurer, and chairman of the board of selectmen, by a majority.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is just exactly what I said. I say that the gentleman puts forward the proposition that it is contrary to the principles of republicanism and democracy, that the treasurer and secretary of the Commonwealth should be elected by a plurality of the people, and therefore insists upon requiring a majority; and yet, in the same paper, emanating from the same source, he proposes that your senators and representatives, your town officers, your city officers, your selectmen, mayor and aldermen, shall be elected by a vote of the plurality. I desire to know whether the time has arrived when it is unnecessary that senators, representatives, and town officers shall have their elections determined upon the principles of democracy or of republicanism, so long, only, as the governor of the Commonwealth has his election either determined upon those principles, or by an appeal to another tribunal, and that tribunal another branch of the government. I believe there are real and serious objections, which will present themselves to gentlemen here, against adopting this complex system, other than the fact, that it is in violation of the principle which has been asserted here, in regard to all the other officers, excepting state officers. We have not a case here, where we can make a partial experiment by applying the rule to some officers, with the intention of making it general, if we find it works well and gives satisfaction to the people. If we were a legislature, with annual sessions, that would be a course which we might adopt, and perhaps it would be a wise one. I hope that we shall not adopt a complex system here, but, that we shall establish the same rule for all the officers whose election we deem to be important. If it is to be determined otherwise, and we are bent upon an arrangement by which some officers are to have their elections determined by one rule, and other officers by another, I ask the chairman of the Committee to answer the question, whether he has made a proper application of these different rules? Granting, then, that you may make a difference in different cases, is it wise, still to insist upon a majority in relation to those officers who are to be voted for by the whole people, and to consent to the plurality, in cases where the constituency is smaller? What are the considerations which ought to determine the offices concerning which you should insist upon one or the other rule? Shall it depend upon the number of persons who constitute the constituency? Shall it depend upon the importance of the office to be filled? Shall it depend upon the degree of inconvenience and expense attending repeated trials? Shall it depend upon the opportunities which the electors may be supposed to have, of knowing each others' views, and so of reconciling differences of opinion as to candidates? Or are they to be determined upon by lot, and the result to be called a compromise? I submit, if any one of these considerations ought to weigh, that they have been utterly disregarded by the Committee to whom this matter was referred, and from whom this Report comes. If these considerations ought to have any influence, and if you are determined to insist on a majority in some cases, and to be satisfied with a plurality in other cases, I submit, that it is the duty of this Committee to shift this Report, end for end, and to make your governor, and the other officers, for whom the whole people are to vote, eligible by a plurality, and to insist still, upon a majority in your local elections and smaller constituencies. If we are going to make a difference, let us be able to give a reason for it which cannot be traced by any lines to party considerations. If we desire to make a difference, let us be able to give such reasons as the Convention ought to give when it makes propositions concerning the Constitution. Of all the officers who should be elected by a plurality, those who are to be voted for by the whole people, on a general ticket, are the ones. There is a palpable distinction, which might have been drawn in that direction; and he who should have drawn it, might have been moved by some regard for the will of the people. That distinction might have been justified, on the ground that it admitted the plurality in those cases in which repeated trials could not be had; and insisted upon a majority in those cases in which repeated trials could be had; thus leaving the result, in both cases, in the power of the people. This is a desirable object; and, therefore, I say, change this Report, end for end. It is exactly wrong, now. The right and left boots are put each upon the wrong foot. Do not gentlemen see, that while they are crying out that they desire to give the election of officers to the people, they are consenting to a scheme here which will take these elections out of their hands, and give them to the legislature? In every conceivable case where it will, in practice, make any difference whether the Constitution shall provide a majority rule or a plurality rule, do not gentlemen see, that the majority rule is nothing but a requirement of that which cannot be insisted on?

Take your governor, for instance. The largeness of the constituency—the greater inconvenience and expense of repeated trials to the people—the necessity that the office should be filled—the lesser opportunities, which the electors have, of comparing opinions, and reconciling differences of opinion as to candidates, all point to the same conclusion; and yet the proposition of the Committee is to leave these officers to be elected by a majority only, after they have abandoned the whole principle upon which they oppose plurality. These evils are so obvious in regard to general elections by the people, as the matter now stands, that in cases of general elections, where the whole people are to vote, nobody proposes repeated trials; and so, holding on to a majority rule, we are driven to a greater evil than them all, and that is, to an appeal from the people to a single branch of the government; and that is called democracy! I do not desire to appeal from the people to a branch of the government, and he is a queer democrat who does. I do not desire to run the risk of seeing, at a future day, high offices of the government offset, one against another, and traded for. I do not desire to see the judgment of the governor of this Commonwealth hampered, when any bill is presented to him, by the fact, that it has received the assent and favor of those to whom he is indebted for his place. I do not desire to see the appointing power obtained, perhaps, by previous promises as to the exercise of it in individual cases. I do desire to see the highest officer of your government holding his commission from the people, in the best form in which it can be given, and not from any other branch of the government. The more independent you shall make such officers of your government, the better will the government be administered. I do not understand how it is, that gentlemen who think it would be anti-republican and anti-democratic to permit the governor to be elected by a plurality of the votes cast, are quite willing to transfer all power from the people to a body, a majority of which shall have been elected by a minority of the people, and to confer upon them the power to elect as governor that individual, who, perhaps, received less than a plurality of the votes at the last election. I think it was the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) whom I do not now see in his seat, who said, that the only question involved was, "Where shall the sovereignty reside?" Be it so. Those who ask you to establish a system of elections by plurality, propose that it shall reside in the people, and in the people alone; while those who insist upon a majority, and make no provision for repeated trials, propose that it shall reside in the people conditionally, up to a certain point, and then that it shall be transferred from the people to the legislature. That, I understand, to be the difference between the two in regard to the question, where the sovereignty is to reside. I may be excused for referring to the remarks of the gentleman from North Brookfield, in his absence, because his is the only argument, which I was fortunate enough to hear on that side of the question. That gentleman told us that the establishment of the plurality system here, in the election of officers under a general ticket, would "debar the people from the right of deciding by a majority." That single proposition, stated and considered, will expose the fallacy which runs through, and is the only life-blood of the whole of this argument. Debar the people from the right of deciding by a majority. Try it, and establish your plurality system; and does not the right remain then, just as much as it exists now? Let the majority vote for any candidate whom they desire to elect, and will he not be elected, although you may have ten thousand plurality systems? How can the gentleman argue that you debar the people from a right, when you leave in their hands, intact, the power to exercise that right, in every conceivable case. Gentlemen have all along spoken as if the proposition were to give to the minority power over an existing majority. Gentlemen have argued this question, just as if the proposition were that the lesser number of votes should prevail over the greater number of votes. And there is the whole difficulty in this matter. Now, using the words plurality, majority, and minority, in the sense in which they are generally received, a minority and a majority can exist in the same body at the same time; and the majority ought to govern, and the majority will govern. But a majority and a plurality cannot be at the same time. If a majority exist, it is an enhanced plurality; and therefore, whenever, under the proposed change, a plurality shall prevail, it will be because no majority exists.

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—STEVENSON.

[July 18th.

And therefore, whenever you shall establish this rule, and it shall prevail at an election, there will be no invasion of the principle that the majority should rule. Shall not a majority rule? Yes, Sir. But the difficulty is, that gentlemen, when they are discussing this, and when they say that we propose to give to a plurality the power over a majority, are comparing things, both of which cannot exist, at the same time, in the same body. One is an enhancement of the other, and they cannot both be there at the same time, to be put in opposition, one to the other. Shall not the majority rule? Yes, certainly, when a majority exists. But the great American principle I take to be this, when properly stated: the majority shall have the power to rule. And, Sir, the establishment of the plurality system does no violence to that principle; for it leaves the power to rule still with the majority, as certainly as it is there now.

The gentlemen who insist upon a majority at an election, ought to remember that they have no power of compelling the existence of a majority. They seem to forget that political rights are individual concerns; that political powers are individual rights, the whole value of which depends upon their effect upon the individual himself; the security of his person, the promotion of his happiness, the protection of his property—these are the purposes of government itself. The great difficulty comes from the inconsistency between individual freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise, and the existence of power anywhere to compel a majority; the existence of power anywhere to compel more than half of those who vote for candidates, to vote for one candidate. Now, Sir, a duty is to be performed, an office is to be filled, an officer is to be elected; you hold on to the majority rule with no provision for repeated trials, on the part of the people; and as long as you leave uninvaded the individual's right of exercising the elective franchise, you have no power to compel the existence of a majority, and therefore you have got to do one of two things: You must either consent that the duty shall remain unperformed, and the office shall not be filled, or you must provide some other mode of electing an officer in this Commonwealth than by the votes of the people. Some other mode, if you insist upon a majority to elect an officer, than by the votes of the people, you must provide. And the question,—and the whole question is, in that contingency, a majority failing to exist—which mode is the preferable one, an appeal from the people to the legislature, or to leave the power still in the hands of the people, to be exerted by means of the plurality of the votes which shall be cast at one time? and that is the whole of it. The question here is not whether you prefer that your governor should be chosen by a plurality or by a majority; but whether, a majority not existing, you prefer that he should be elected by a plurality of the people, or by the legislature? I prefer the former, because it will make it absolutely certain that the election of governor and all general officers of the State, shall be as nearly in accordance with the public will, as the condition of things will permit, consistently with the right in each individual to cast his vote as he himself may see fit, independently of the government, or of any party. Whereas, if you adopt the Report of the Committee as it stands, cases will arise, as cases already have arisen, where, through the instrumentality of mere party arrangements, he who received the lesser number of votes from the people, is put into the executive chair to the exclusion of him who received the greater number of the votes of the people.

The basis of representation which has been almost agreed upon by this Convention, furnishes a new reason why it is our duty to give to the people of Massachusetts an opportunity of saying whether or not they will insist upon holding in their own hands, without giving it up to a legislature, the election of him who shall fill the executive chair. The main, and the real objection to that basis, which we have agreed upon, is the inequality of influence over the legislation of the State, which is to reside in different citizens in different parts of this Commonwealth. That inequality is acknowledged. But we are told that we must submit to it, because town lines must not be disregarded in Massachusetts. Such a reason as that cannot be given why the same inequality of the power, held by different men in different parts of Massachusetts, should exist in relation to him who shall fill the executive chair. But, if you adopt this Report of the Committee, you carry that same injustice into the council-chamber, without the same palliation, in all cases, where your constitutional provision will operate at all. You give to an assembly, established upon an unequal basis, the power of choosing the governor, whose concurrence with them (and it ought to be an independent concurrence) is essential to their own exercise of power.

You make the same unequal division of political power, in regard to the executive, without a reason for it, which you make in regard to the House of Representatives, with a reason for it, which reason alone affords any justification of it. But, it is said that in regard to governor, we must preserve the principle that the majority shall rule. Look at it, and see what kind of a preservation of that principle is proposed here by the Committee. You are to appeal from the people to a tribunal, the majority of the members of which, are the representatives of an acknowledged minority of the people. Farther than this, your provision compels that tribunal to make its selection from persons who have just failed to secure to themselves a majority of the votes of the people; and this is called preserving the majority principle!

The first resolve embodies the Committee's mode of electing governor, and other officers in accordance with this majority principle, as it is called. See how. The people vote once. There are three candidates—one has half of the votes, one a third of the votes, and one a sixth of the votes. One of the three must be governor; but, inasmuch as the majority principle must be preserved, he, whom half of the people desire, must be no nearer to the chair than he whom one-sixth of the people desire; there the people's power ends. In its exercise, one-sixth of the votes have had exactly the same force and effect as one-half of the votes. Then the selection of two out of the three is given to the representatives of one-third of the people, themselves elected by a plurality of their own constituents; and then, as a finishing touch in the process of preserving the principle that the majority of the people should elect the governor of the Commonwealth, the Senate, a body, of which no one member may have been chosen by a majority, is to determine the election. And so, with no single agency to which a majority has given its assent, the governor is to be elected in accordance with the rule, that the majority alone shall have the power to decide who he shall be! Lucus a non lucendo! It is nothing more nor less than this: It is putting it into the power of the House of Representatives to substitute, not a plurality rule for a majority rule, but a minority rule for a plurality rule, and that is the whole of it. The whole power conferred upon the House of Representatives, their choice being limited to three persons, is this, and nothing more than this: to determine that he who shall have received the highest number of the votes of the people, shall not be governor, but that he who shall have a lesser number of those votes shall be governor.

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—STEVENSON—DAVIS.

[July 18th.

I know it is said, that those who favor the plurality rule in elections, and opposed the basis which has been agreed upon, on the ground that it put power into the hands of a minority of the people, expose themselves to a charge of inconsistency. But it is not so. There are clear distinctions between the two; as palpable as those between midnight and noonday. In the two things to be acted on, viz.: the election of officers, or the constitution of the body which shall enact the laws, the citizen occupies very different positions; answers, by his vote, very different questions; exercises, by that vote, very different powers. In the first, the election of officers, he votes for whom he chooses—the Constitution knows no candidates—the question which is propounded to him, and which he answers by his vote, is not, “shall or shall not A B fill the office?” but the question is, “who shall fill the office?” The power, which he exercises, is not necessarily exerted, either in aid of, or in direct opposition to, the power exercised at the same time by each other voter; but it may operate as a mere disturbing force, absolutely impeding, and perhaps disarming the power of all others. So that a factious spirit, indulged in by a few, tends to preventing the many from being represented in the government under which they live. I, for one, desire to take out of the hands of the few, this power over the many. But, in the enactment of laws, the questions propounded, and which are to be answered by votes, admit of no response, excepting an absolutely affirmative, or an absolutely negative, one. Shall this law be enacted—yes or no? Shall this law be repealed—yes or no? So that the power which each exercises by his vote, must, (unlike votes at an election,) necessarily be exerted, either in the same direction with, or in direct opposition to, the power exerted at the same time by each other vote, and cannot be made to operate as a mere disturbing force.

I am willing that, at each election, a plurality should elect the officer; I am unwilling to confer upon a minority of the people, the power of making the laws, in opposition to the will of a majority of the people; and some gentlemen think that to be an inconsistency. To reach that conclusion, they must leap a chasm broader than logic can build a bridge for. When you provide that a plurality may elect, do you thereby provide that a majority shall not elect? Will not a majority elect, wherever a majority shall see fit to elect? Do you confer upon the minority the power to govern the majority? Do you take power from the majority of your people, and confer it upon a minority of your people? Far from it and otherwise. You leave the power with the majority, as certainly as it is there now, and you take from the minority the power of preventing elections.

Now, Sir, how is it with the basis for the House of Representatives? Ask yourself the same questions concerning the two, and see if you will not be constrained to give exactly opposite answers. Do you provide that the majority shall not have the power to govern? By the basis, yes. By the plurality, no.

Do you confer upon different citizens, different degrees of political power? By the basis, yes. By the plurality, no. Do you give to each man's vote an equal weight, in the ballot-box? By the plurality, yes. By the basis, no.

I cannot think that he who votes for one proposition, and against another proposition to which such adverse answers can be truly given to the same questions, need feel much embarrassed by any whispers of inconsistency. In the one you take power from the majority, and confer it upon the minority; therefore I oppose it. In the other you do no such thing, and so I assent to it.

What is the exact measure of power which each citizen ought to possess, either in an election, or in deciding what the laws shall be, under which he is to live? Exactly that which each other citizen possesses. No more and no less. He who asks for more, is no democrat, though he may have worn the word threadbare by the use of it with his tongue. He who will consent to less, is not fit for a republican, however much he may congratulate himself that he lives under no other form of government. Each citizen's proper measure of power is exactly that which each other citizen possesses. What is the instrumentality through which that power is to be exercised? The vote. The individual's power by the individual's vote. And, in determining the mode in which that power shall be exerted, if we determine that each vote cast shall carry with it the same force, which each other vote carries with it, we shall determine justly. If otherwise, we shall determine unjustly. Let us listen to the clear voice of justice; that most god-like capability of man; that central light of the moral universe; that sun, which all the other virtues revolve around, and are illumined by—whose central force is necessary to keep each other virtue from wandering into the orbit of its kindred vice.

No system can be just which will not square with this rule, equal power in each vote. Now, when you change to a plurality, do you invade this rule? Does it not leave each individual's power exactly equal to each other individual's power? Each vote, the silent expression of the will of him who casts it, tends with exactly equal force to the accomplishment of his wishes; carries with it exactly the same weight, not varying by the pressure of a single particle of impalpable dust; while in the other case, the basis of representation is an absolute negation of the same rule. It fails to recognize the existence of individual power, looking only to the power of associations; constructing foundations so varying, that the few, standing on one, may defy the many, standing on another; putting into different men's hands different instrumentalities; calling each a vote, but endowing different votes with different degrees of power. That is injustice. Because whatever of excess it confers upon one citizen, it takes from another, and men in Massachusetts cease to be equal.

[The time allowed by the rule adopted by the Convention, having expired, Mr. Stevenson did not finish his argument.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I rise to make an inquiry whether the resolves, as reported by the Committee, are all under consideration, or whether only the first is now before the Committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that they are all under consideration, so far as to allow of general debate upon them.

Mr. DAVIS. If it is in order, I will move to amend the third resolution by striking out all after the word “election,” in the third line.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolve will then read as follows:—

Resolved, That in the election of representatives to the general court, a majority of all the votes given in, shall be necessary to an election.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not propose to argue, at any length, the amendment I have proposed, or to give the reasons why I advocate it; but it seems to me, that in one remark, at least, of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Stevenson,) I can agree with him, and that is with regard to the town elections. I differ from him in believing that we should, as far as possible, retain the doctrine, and, as I maintain it, the principle of the majority system. If I have understood correctly the position of many gentlemen on this floor, who are in favor of town representation, I understood them to base their arguments in favor of town representation, to a very great extent, and almost solely, upon the ground that it was necessary in order to preserve these small democracies and municipalities intact. It was said that they were the only pure democracies in the world. I have only to say, that I, for one, am in favor of keeping these democracies pure in the small towns; and I therefore propose this amendment. It seems to me; that if we are to retain the majority system anywhere, we should do it in these small towns, these “pure democracies,” as they are termed, and then we shall, to that extent, preserve, and teach, the principles upon which a popular government is founded.

There is another reason why we should not make the election of a representative to the general court final, upon a second trial, and why we should preserve the majority system, so far as that election is concerned; and that is, that in the smaller towns the people are better able, from their knowledge of their neighbors, and of the candidate who is selected, to agree upon some one, after one or two trials have been had. There does not, in this case, seem to be the necessity for the plurality rule, which may exist in other cases; and the Committee, in giving the reasons for their Report, expressly declare, that there is not the same necessity for preserving the plurality system, in the election of a representative, that there is in the election of officers from a more extended territory. Since this Report was made by the

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — EDWARDS — FROTHINGHAM — SCHOULER.

[July 18th.]

Committee, the Convention have decided upon a system of town representation; and, therefore, there is not that same necessity for adopting the plurality system, with regard to the election of representatives, that their might have been if the district system had been adopted. If the members of the Committee will turn to the second page of the Report of the Committee who offered this series of resolutions, they will find, that when the Committee speak of the election of representatives in towns, by plurality, they are obliged to resort to an entirely different reason from that which they give in the case of the election of other officers. They say:—

“To prevent a too frequent recurrence of elections, and the necessity of trials on subsequent days, when bodies as large as counties and districts fail to elect, for all county and district officers, a plurality rule is provided. From a desire that the government may be in fact, what it is in theory, a government of a majority, and to give an opportunity for the exercise of the ‘sober second thought,’ by the electors, that rule is proposed upon the first ballot, in the election of representatives to the general court.”

And here they bring in a new reason:—

“Still, that differences of political or other opinions may not operate, either to hinder a full representation, or to protract town meetings to such extent as to subject them to extraneous influences, a plurality is permitted to elect on the second ballot.”

Gentlemen will find, that when an election of an officer who is to represent a large extent of territory is proposed, the reason for resorting to a plurality is, that it is not easy to meet for a second election; and then, when they come to the election of those who are to represent a smaller territory, they give another reason; and I suggest, that I think that the other reason is not entitled to very much weight, for a majority may always elect, upon a second trial, if they desire to prevent a failure of representation.

MR. EDWARDS, of Southampton. Having been placed on the first Committee to which this subject was originally referred, I have given it some attention. I do not mean to speak long on the subject, for I would not make a long speech if I could. But as I felt this to be a somewhat important subject, when the proposition for calling a Convention was first agitated, and having turned my attention to it, I wish to say, that for many years I have been in favor of the plurality system in all our elections. I was in favor of it in the Committee of which the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) is chairman, and eleven out of thirteen members of that Committee appeared to be decidedly in favor of the plurality system. I have seen in the elections in our towns and counties, great evils resulting from the majority principle. It has caused our town meetings to be subjects of ridicule, so frequently have they been called.

It seems that a large proportion of this Convention are not ready to adopt the plurality system in its fullest extent; and therefore, in this age of compromises, a compromise has been presented, and, in the language of the gentleman from Boston, upon another subject, I am ready and willing to take the best project presented, if it is not fully up to my views. Why did we, in past years, adopt the plurality system in the second trial for an election of members of congress?

Because the people did not appear to be ready to adopt it upon the first trial. We have, heretofore, in many districts, been called upon from three to nineteen times to elect members of congress. The people of Massachusetts are slow to adopt any innovation; and that may be a credit to them; we do not like to give up our town representation; we do not like to come at once to the adoption of the plurality system in elections. We are attached to these principles, which have been long established and acted upon. I am entirely opposed to the amendment which is proposed. I wish to elect our representatives on the first day that we meet. It is, in many towns, extremely difficult to elect at all, and an unequal representation has consequently been the order of the day in Massachusetts.

I should regret, extremely, to be unable to elect a representative on the second ballot, as is proposed by the Committee; if the majority principle is to be the guide in the first ballot, the plurality system should be in the second. For my own part, I am ready to take it upon the first ballot; but as it seems that we must compromise the matter, I am willing to vote for the proposition of the Committee. Those who are conversant with the management of town affairs, and the election of town officers, &c., know that three or four days is often required for the election of a board of selectmen; this has been the case in many of the small towns, and they have been wishing, for a long time, that the plurality principle could be introduced into these elections. I do not regard this matter as affecting party. When I came here, it was not with the idea of doing anything for the benefit of any particular party, and to acquire any party advantage whatever; and, to my surprise, I found myself surrounded by friends of the plurality principle, whom I did not expect to find on that side. For years past, in the legislature, I have sustained the plurality principle by my vote; and I now found myself surrounded by new friends. I do not stop to inquire what is to be the effect of this on party; I do not look to the present good of Massachusetts merely. I have arrived at that age when I desire the permanent good of the Commonwealth, and not the present success of any party. I desire that those who are to follow me, should have as good a Constitution as we can possibly provide for them. I do not expect or desire anything for myself, but I want to present to the people as perfect a system as we can, upon this, as well as all other subjects that come before us. For these reasons, I shall vote against the amendment to the third resolution, and hope that it will not be adopted.

MR. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman opposite will not prevail, for I desire that we should, at least, retain the plurality principle for our representatives. For one, Sir, I shall go for it, and for as much of it as I can get; and for the reason that has been urged so often, and so elaborately, and so well, upon this floor. I concur almost entirely in what has been said by the gentleman who last spoke; and I will say, that the particular reason why I wish the amendment not to prevail is, that the evil of the majority principle, or the inconvenience of it—for I will not say that it is a bad principle in theory—has been most sensibly felt in the city which I have, in part, the honor to represent here. For the last ten years, we have hardly been able to get our representation upon the floor of the legislature. I think there has been but once, in the whole round of ten years, when we have had a full delegation. That is the way in which the majority principle has worked in Charlestown; and this being the case, I appeal to the gentleman who offered the last amendment, whether it is not reasonable to expect that the people of that city, are strongly in favor of the plurality principle, in order to secure what all parties want, and what they all ought to strive for—a representation of that city upon the floor of the legislature. Sir, it is this evil of non-representation which lies at the bottom of the whole matter; it goes deeper than all party considerations. When you take a representative away from the legislature, you deprive the people whom he represents of their legitimate voice; and a system which works so as to deprive a city or a town, for so large a portion of their time, of their full voice in the legislature, is not the best system that we can obtain. I believe that when you go over the history of our legislature for the last ten, fifteen, or twenty years, you will find that this evil of non-representation has prevailed, to a greater or less extent, over the whole of the Commonwealth. Therefore, in advocating the plurality principle for the city of Charlestown, I advocate it for every town, and for every city in the Commonwealth. While I am up, and not wishing to go into a speech upon this matter, I will venture to make a suggestion which occurs to me in relation to the wording of the resolution, and ask the chairman of the Committee whether it would not be well to alter the phraseology, so that the towns, if they chose it, could elect their representatives on the first ballot, by the plurality principle, instead of waiting until the second. Of course, as relates to the cities, it will make no difference; but this suggestion is made in accordance with the idea of a friend near me, that it may be more convenient for the towns, and more desirable, to have the resolution worded in that way. I do not, myself, propose any amendment to carry out that object; but I will conclude by expressing my hope that the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Plymouth, will not prevail.

MR. SCHOULER moved to amend the first resolution by striking out all after the word “resolved,” and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following:—

That it is expedient to provide, in the Constitution, that in the election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the Commonwealth, the person having the largest number of votes shall be deemed and taken to be elected.

THE CHAIRMAN. The Chair can receive and announce the amendment; but there is an amendment to the third resolution now pending before the Committee.

MR. SCHOULER. As this is an amendment to the first resolution, I suppose it will be first in order. I do not intend to occupy any time in discussing this amendment, but taking the Report of the Committee now under consideration, and the Report of the Committee in relation to the calling of this Convention, it seems to me that there is a tremendous clashing between them. I will read the seventh reason assigned for the calling of this Convention, which will be better than anything that I could say upon the subject. That is as follows:—

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — HALLETT.

[July 18th.

"7. The present cumbersome, formal mode of organizing the government, we submit, should be abolished. Eight or ten days are now usually occupied in this organization, which is nothing less than an annual waste of six or eight thousand dollars of the people's money. The election of secretary of the Commonwealth, treasurer and receiver-general, auditor of accounts, and executive councillors, by the people, with an application of the plurality principle to these officers, as well as to the governor, lieutenant-governor, and state senators, would do much to remedy this evil. These changes, with a few other slight modifications of the Constitution, in the same direction, especially the establishment of a board of men to count the votes, declare the result, and notify the persons elected, would enable the legislature to organize the government, and be ready to proceed with the business of the session, in two, or, at the longest, in three days. This change alone, would, in the course of ten years, nearly, or quite defray the whole expense of the Convention."

Now, Sir, if we adopt the Report of the Committee, now under consideration, we shall be leaving this present cumbersome, formal, and expensive mode, exactly where it stands in the Constitution. — It seems to me, Sir, as was said by my colleague, this morning, that those officers who are made elective, and for whom the whole people of the Commonwealth are called upon to vote, should be elected by pluralities, so as to do away with all this trouble. If we elect them by majorities, we shall be keeping up this formal and cumbersome mode, which, as this document tells us, is a waste of some six or eight thousand dollars of the people's money, annually.

Mr. HALLETT. I understand, that there are two propositions now before the Committee: one is to adopt an amendment to the first resolution, by applying the plurality rule to it; and the other, is to amend the third resolution, so as to require a majority to elect the representatives from the towns. I understand, that these two amendments are now pending. I propose to say a very few words, in order that I may stand consistently upon the record. When that question was under discussion, by this body, on a former occasion, I took the opportunity to express my opinion, that the majority principle was the only true rule—that I knew of no other sound, republican rule—but that, if it was a question of expediency, we might submit to the people the question upon the plurality and the majority, so that they could have an opportunity to decide upon this question, and that the plurality principle might be applied to certain officers, while we should require a majority, as applicable to other officers; and I went so far as to say—and I stand upon the same position now—that it is an exception to the principle that keeps the government in the hands of the majority. Nevertheless, I should be willing to submit some proposition to the people, in order that they might pass upon this question of plurality. But, Sir, as regards the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Plymouth, I feel bound to say, that that is the last fortress of the majority principle which I am willing to surrender. While I do not propose to make a point of issue, in regard to the other portion of the Report—taking the majority principle, in certain cases, and the plurality rule, in other cases—I want to present to this Committee the single consideration, that we ought not, in our Constitution, make any change in the present mode of electing representatives. The legislature has no power in the Constitution to touch it. The Constitution, Sir, says nothing about it. For two hundred years, in this Commonwealth, we have never heard in its history, that a representative in general court, was ever chosen by less than a majority of the community voting for him. There has not been a word put into any Constitution about it. It was not put in by the framers of the Constitution, in 1780; it was not put in by the amendments of 1820, and the legislature have never acted upon it. Now I should greatly prefer one of two things: either to leave it out of our amendments to the Constitution altogether, by striking out the whole of that provision which relates to representatives, or give authority to the legislature to pass a plurality law, if the towns want it, or else to amend it, so as to require a majority, by the terms of the Constitution. I am content to go so far as to leave the subject to the legislature; but I am not content to go so far as to say, as a fundamental law of this Commonwealth, unchangeable, except in the mode of changing the fundamental law, that the towns of this Commonwealth may elect representatives by minorities. That is precisely the same thing; for to say that they may elect by the plurality system, is to say that a minority may elect. I go upon principle, in regard to this matter. I want the towns to reflect, whether we can take this step, and hereafter preserve our principles, in regard to town representation. If there is any principle in town representation, it is this: that towns are distinct communities in the Commonwealth, which communities are entitled to representation—not merely, that individuals as parts of the whole population, are entitled to representation—but that town communities are entitled to be represented, through the individuals who compose these respective communities. That is the only principle upon which I can act, in advocating town representation; and there I can stand. Now, if you give to these communities the right to be represented in one branch of the general court, is it safe to say, that these communities may be represented here by a minority? I have great doubts upon this matter, because, then it comes to this point: you may put your House of Representatives in the hands, in the first place, of a minority of the whole people, by the mode of a representation of communities, instead of that based upon the aggregate population; and then, you go one step farther, and put these communities into the hands of a minority of the communities, so that it is a minority of a minority that will elect your representatives, for a term of years, until the Constitution is changed, and control this branch of the legislature. It is true—and therefore our town representation principle is sound—that the House of Representatives, so apportioned, does not control the government, and if you preserve the other departments of the government in the hands of a majority, that may so far balance it, and the government will be only of a majority. But, I think that we should preserve, at least, the great principle in regard to the election of representatives, that they should be chosen by a majority, and nothing less. That renders this portion of the Report of the Committee especially important, as a matter of principle.

Now, as it regards the question of expediency in town representation, if I am right in this principle of government, that we must have a majority in government to be republican, the practicability of electing by majorities is very different in town elections from what it is in elections at large. In the first place, the towns may continue to try to elect representatives, and they may be allowed to try as they did under the old law. At all events, they continue to have trials for the election of representatives. But, Sir, a town has a right to be represented, or not represented, as it pleases. That is an ancient town right; and I hold that if the people cannot agree as to a representation by a majority, it is just as much a vote determining not be represented, as if it were placed upon the record not to send. But herein you propose that a town, by the operation of the plurality, in effect, shall be represented, whether it will or not. I very much question if that is not introducing a principle more restrictive of town rights than if we limited their representation, because you allow a minority to compel a town to be represented, when a majority of the people of that town are opposed to being represented by the person who is chosen. A few voters will go into the town meeting, who get there first, and vote to send, or begin to ballot, when three-fourths of the voters will not be represented in the general vote, or in the choice. So a minority may dissolve the meeting. You may, nevertheless, call a meeting by the selectmen, at the proper period in November, and then have an election, by a minority vote; and if you have four or five parties in the field, a plurality, consisting of a minority of one-fourth, may elect a representative and send him to the general court, against the majority who vote, and against the corporate will of the town, not to be represented. I do not wish to place the towns in that attitude. If I were going to vote in this matter merely as a politician, so as to cull a plurality party out of all the three parties in the Commonwealth, I would go for this; and it is a strong temptation to do so, because I confess I want to get rid of that third party. I believe that they will do much better for themselves and for their country, by being fused into the other two parties, according to their individualities, than by undertaking any longer to keep house themselves as a party; and I will say, that those who carry this plurality doctrine out, in the choice of all officers, must not blame us who opposed it, if we hold the knife which they have whetted, to their throats. But I stand here, upon the general principle, that I consider these communities of towns as the elements of House Representation, and being the elements of that representation, I cannot consistently vote for sending their representatives here by a minority. I hope, therefore, as it was only my purpose to set myself right on this question, that this amendment, as regards the third resolve, will be adopted, so that it will read, "that in the election of representatives to the general court, a majority of all the votes given in shall be necessary for an election," and if that does not prevail, then, at least, let the amendment which has been suggested, be adopted. You ought to have an election by plurality at the first trial, at all events, otherwise you say that those who are to elect your representatives shall be men who can afford to ride to the polls, and not those who have to walk, and cannot well lose a day's work; for that is all the difference, a difference between men of property in the villages, and a sparse population of farmers and laborers, scattered in the rural sections. Almost every man can and will go to the polls on the first day, when a trial is to be made; but the laboring man cannot afford to lose his dollar each day, for four or five times, unless it should happen to be on some great and exciting occasion. If you will have a plurality, therefore, in town representation, let it apply to the first, and not to the second trial. My judgment is that you had better not put this provision in at all, but keep the majority as it now stands, and leave it to the legislature to decide whether the towns want the plurality rule, and if they really do, let them have it.

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY, &c. — FOSTER — STETSON — HALLETT.

[July 18th.

Mr. FOSTER, of Charlemont. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Plymouth. My constituents have been unrepresented for the last two years because they could not agree upon the man to be sent, and when I was at home the other day I told them that I should still sustain the majority principle on the subject, and they consented still to be without representation; for they considered the majority principle a safe one. I told them that there was a special reason why I should support this principle, and that is: that we are likely to have a large House of Representatives and I would be very willing to have the House thinned out a little by these very failures to elect, and that that was one of the strong motives why I am so much in favor of the majority system.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I do not intend to detain the Convention. When I hear my friend oppose what I consider a democratic principle, and a democratic rule, I am induced to address the Convention. I believe, Sir, that the majority principle, as it now exists in the State, is, in fact, a rule by which the very smallest minority rules the majority. That is the fact; and I think that some provision should be made in the Constitution by which this may be overcome, or set aside, in some way or other; and I know of no way unless we adopt what is called the plurality system. I believe that the system of plurality is the most just and equal to the majority of all parties, and that the rule itself, nine times out of ten, results in giving a fair majority of the people in favor of such candidates as are brought forward for election. And is it not a fact that under the majority rule, you find the little party will govern in almost all cases? Where there are two parties, the Whig and the Democratic,—or the Free Democratic and the Democratic,—where the two parties are nearly balanced, and we say that the majority shall rule, one or the other of these parties are bound to coalesce if they wish to choose. And what is the result? By a coalition one party will succeed; but if each party stands upon his own right, independently of the others, no person can be chosen. Now that is the rule. I hope the Convention will adopt the Report of the Committee. I am willing to go farther, and think the plurality rule should go as far as it can be made to go; that we should elect all officers under the State government by a plurality vote. That is the true doctrine, and I can well conceive why my friend for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) is so loath to concede that even a majority should rule; because I do not know but he is one of the fathers of the two-thirds rule, contending that two-thirds of a party should be brought to bear upon a single object, or else no one can be chosen.

Now the two-thirds rule is one of the most destructive inventions that ever existed; and I would appeal to gentlemen, whether that rule does not throw out all the men who are the most deserving of office? I say, that by this iron rule, the most valuable men are thrown aside. I can conceive no other reason why my friend is so loath to adopt the Report of the Committee, except that he wants that iron rule to continue. Now, I am sorry to say, we had some long speeches made, on a former occasion, upon the subject; that those who have always supported the democratic principles, have come out and said, here upon this floor—and I believe my friend on the right is among the number—that the plurality principle tends to destroy the very foundation of the government.

Sir, I am sometimes called radical; but if this plurality rule is a radical measure, then I am a radical. I do not believe but that the principle itself produces the effect which we all desire; that it develops the true principles of the majority. I will venture to say, Sir, that two-thirds of all the legal voters in the State of Massachusetts are among the working classes. One of the principles of democracy, I believe, is to relieve the masses from the oppressions of wealth; and I contend that the majority rule, as it operates under present circumstances, is one of an oppressive character. The men upon whom the burdens of taxation fall most heavily, are the working men—men who are often compelled to meet, from time to time, and from day to day, at the polls to vote, or relinquish their right of being represented. And I would appeal to every member of the Convention if he does not know, in every election, after the first or second day, who are the parties who do not appear at the polls? Is it not the laboring classes, the rank and file of the party? The consequence is, that we cannot get even a fair plurality of the voters of the towns when an election takes place. Persons are thus voted into office by a very small number of voters. I have myself been voted into the House of Representatives, on a majority vote, by a less number than would have constituted a plurality vote on the first day of election. And why is it that we suffer this thing to remain on the statute book, year after year, without bringing the matter forward, and putting it to the people what they desire; that is what the laboring classes want, that we should adopt this plurality question. Sir, during the sittings of this Convention, I have not seen a Democrat among my constituency, or among any other, who does not believe that the people desire, and want this principle of plurality adopted. They desire it for the best of all reasons in the world—that they may relieve themselves from the oppressive burden which this majority rule inflicts upon them.

I contend, Sir, that this principle is one of Democratic birth; that it has received the support of Democrats in all the States of the Union, and that it has been advocated in an address to the people of the Commonwealth. But enough has been said upon that point. The people know it; they understand it; and they expect to have the question put to them upon this plurality mode of election. They ask for it; and, I believe, that in the present state of parties, as that principle has operated, it has developed itself in the best possible manner. It entirely does away with that oppressive burden which is thrown upon the working classes. It is right and just that we should adopt it; and therefore I am in favor of the Report of the Committee being sustained, as far as it goes. I admit that it does not go far enough for me; but I shall sustain the Report of the Committee.

On motion by Mr. CRESSY, of Hamilton, the Committee rose, and, the President having resumed the chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Reports from a Committee.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham, presented the following Reports from the Committee on the Bill of Rights, which were referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 18, 1853.

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on so much of the Constitution as is contained in the Preamble and Bill of Rights, report that the second Article of the Bill of Rights ought to be so altered as to change the words "for his religious profession or sentiments," to the words "for his profession or sentiments concerning religion."

So that it will read, if so amended: "And no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained in his person, liberty, or estate, for worshipping God in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience, or for his profession or sentiments concerning religion."

B. F. HALLETT.
ANSON BURLINGAME.
CHARLES SUMNER.
HENRY WILLIAMS.
GEO. S. HILLARD.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 18, 1853.

The undersigned, a minority of the same Committee, also report.

To strike out from the 28th Article of the Bill of Rights the words "but by the authority of the legislature."

So it will read, if amended: "No person can, in any case, be subjected to law-martial, or to any penalties or pains by virtue of that law, except those employed in the army or navy, and except the militia in actual service."

B. F. HALLETT.
L. MARCY.
H. WILLIAMS.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 18, 1853.

The undersigned, a minority of the same Committee, also report.

That there should be added to the 15th Article of the Bill of Rights the following clause:—

In all trials for criminal offences, the jury, after having received the instruction of the court, shall have the right, in their verdict of guilty or not guilty, to determine the law and the facts of the case.

Monday,] CLOSE OF DEBATE, &c.—FROTHINGHAM—EARLE—WILSON—BRADBURY—WOOD—LADD. [July 18th.

B. F. HALLETT.
ANSON BURLINGAME.
CHARLES SUMNER.
L. MARCY.
CHARLES ALLEN.
H. WILLIAMS.

On motion by Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater, the Convention adjourned, until three o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

Specie Payments.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown, from the Committee on the subject of Banking, submitted the following Report, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 18, 1853.

The Committee on the subject of Banking, to whom was referred an order, to consider the expediency of providing that the legislature shall have no power to authorize, or pass any law sanctioning the suspension of specie payments by any corporations issuing bank notes, have considered the same, and report, that it is inexpedient to take any action on this subject.

RICHARD FROTHINGHAM, JR., Chairman.

Final Adjournment.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, from the Committee on the subject of the Final Adjournment of the Convention, reported, that in the opinion of the Committee, the Convention may finish up its business, and adjourn on Saturday, the twenty-third instant.

The Report was laid upon the table.

The Pay Roll.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, submitted the following order, which lies over for consideration to-morrow:—

Ordered, That the Committee on the Pay Roll be instructed to make up the same, including the day of adjournment, and that no member receive pay except for the days of actual attendance.

Limitation of Debate.

Mr. ADAMS, of Lowell. I move now, Mr. President, that debate in Committee of the Whole, upon the subject of Elections by Plurality, cease in one hour after the Committee shall again resume the consideration of the same.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. It will be remembered, by the Convention, that this subject has been under consideration heretofore, in the Committee of the Whole, and that we found ourselves, at the close of that discussion, with some eight or nine entirely new and distinct questions to settle, after the hour had arrived at which debate had been ordered to be closed, by an imperative vote of the Convention. There is little time now allowed, very little, and there are a number of questions before the Committee of the Whole, and they may be varied, by new motions constantly offered; and I submit, whether it is proper or fair, to the members of the Convention, to put it in the power of a member of the Committee of the Whole, to bring a member to a vote upon a question instantan, without any opportunity for discussion?

The proceedings in this Convention, in this respect, have been very unlike the usual deliberative proceedings in this capitol, and I have heard members of different views unite in condemning them. Under a procedure similar to that now recommended by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Adams,) the basis of the House, which had been for many days under discussion, and had been deliberately modified, was at once, without debate, essentially transformed, on a motion which, for want of time, could be neither discussed nor examined.

And I am fully of opinion that, exclusive of those who had had the privilege of previous examination, there was not one man in ten that knew the effect of the proposition to which I refer, of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Abbott,) which constitutes the vital part of the adopted basis of the House of Representatives.

I will say no more, because I have spoken three or four times upon this subject, but I have been brought to vote upon propositions entirely new to me, and upon which, not one word of explanation was allowed, pro or con. On the previous occasion, after having consumed a great deal of time in the discussion of the general question of plurality, we were brought to vote instantan upon eight or nine distinct issues; and now I submit, whether it is right to place ourselves in a position where we cannot fairly and fully understand the questions which may be presented? I submit, as the Convention has full control over the Committee of the Whole, whether it would not be better for the Convention to instruct the Committee of the Whole to report at a certain time, so that the right to submit new propositions, and the right to debate, may be coextensive?

Mr. WOOD, of Fitchburg. This Convention has already been in session a month longer than it was expected to be, and this subject now under discussion; has heretofore had one full discussion, and at the time it was recommitted, it was said, as an objection to its recommitment, that we should have to go over the whole matter, de novo, its origin, its history, and all, at as great length as at first. But we were assured by many members of the Convention that it should not be so, for as most of us understood all the bearings and all the suggestions in relation to the matter, though we should not precisely approve of the Report of the Committee, we could proceed to vote without much discussion; indeed, without there being any necessity for much discussion. I was surprised, under these circumstances, to see, this forenoon, with what ardor certain gentlemen made an attack upon the Report of the Committee, and to see them proceed to argue it as a new question before us. If this course is to be pursued, I seriously ask, when are we to get through? The question has been asked by our constituents many times, and as often we have been compelled to say we do not know, and cannot tell; that many of our debates are spun out to an unreasonable length, and that things which were fairly understood by all of us, have been talked about over and over again, until we were disgusted by them. Now, the question is, whether we shall go on talking over these matters, or whether we will come to a decision upon them, and thus be able to meet our constituents with honest faces?

It seems to me that it is about time, that now, the latter part of July, we should seriously think about adjournment, and that we should expedite business by working seriously, and talking less. Here is a fit subject for us to begin upon; and will we keep talking about the matter? The gentleman from Newton, (Mr. Bradbury,) thinks that we are unable to understand the matter, as though we were fools. It is not so. I am somewhat surprised to see how well the members of this Convention understand subjects brought before them—most of them much better than I do. Without saying anything more—because I wish to exemplify my theory by practice—I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Adams,) by striking out the word "one," and inserting in lieu thereof, the word "three," so as to provide that the question shall be taken in three hours after the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the subject.

The question was taken on the latter amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY. I now move to strike out "one," and substitute "two."

The question was taken on the latter motion, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the original motion of Mr. Adams—

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, moved to strike out the word "one," and substitute "three-quarters of an hour."

Mr. ADAMS accepted the amendment.

The question was then taken, on the motion offered by Mr. Adams, as modified, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes, 107; noes, 73.

So the motion was agreed to.

Elections by Plurality.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Milford. I move that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, upon the unfinished business of the morning, to wit: the subject of Elections by Plurality.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Hillard, of Boston, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be first, upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) and then upon the motion of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) heretofore inserted.

Mr. LADD, of Cambridge. I confess that I do not fully understand the object sought to be accomplished by the third resolve, to which the amendment of the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) applies, nor have the Committee which reported them, thrown much light upon the subject. I find that it is reported here, that, upon the first trial for the election of representatives, the majority principle shall obtain. But if no one shall obtain a majority, then that the candidate having the highest number of votes upon a second, or any subsequent ballot, shall be declared elected. I can very well understand what the majority rule itself is, and the force of the arguments which are brought to sustain it and show why it should be applied. I can very well

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—LADD—MOREY—GRISWOLD.

[July 18th.]

understand what the plurality system is, and can appreciate the force of the arguments which are advanced in support of that rule. But when it is proposed, that a majority of all the votes cast, shall be required upon the first balloting, to elect a member of the legislature, and a plurality only of votes cast upon a second, or any subsequent ballot, it seems to me that, in the first place, an unnecessary amount of machinery is introduced, to accomplish precisely the same purpose. If there is an election upon the first balloting, the majority rule prevails. If there is a plurality only of votes, why precisely the same thing is accomplished as is proposed to be accomplished by a plurality upon the second balloting. It appears to me that, as the first trial is ordinarily held, and will be held, when a choice of officers for the Commonwealth is to be made, that there will, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, be a much fuller expression of public opinion, than there will be upon the second trial; and I should like to be informed of the object to be accomplished by this resolve, that there shall be an election by a plurality vote upon a second trial. I can see no purpose to be accomplished. I suppose, in point of fact, that in the large towns of the Commonwealth, if there should be no choice upon the first balloting, there would be none at all, except by an adjournment to the next day, or to some subsequent day. Undoubtedly in the small towns, where it is customary to ballot more than once upon the same day, a result might be obtained. But I do not see how anything is to be accomplished, by any reasoning which has been presented to this Convention, and it can only give force to other considerations which are not worthy of being presented as arguments before this Convention. I can see how it gives an opportunity of success to the minority of the electors on the second trial, and, by an arrangement, or some other mode, to defeat the will of the majority; but for all practical purposes, it seems to me, that the second provision is useless, and I think we ought to adhere to the majority principle in the election of representatives, or to the plurality system; and, at the proper period, I shall offer the following amendment:—

Resolved, That in all elections of representatives to the general court, the person having the highest number of votes shall be elected.

Mr. MOREY, of Boston. The question now under consideration, is one of the most important that has been brought before the Convention. It is one in which the people feel a deep interest, probably a deeper interest than in any other that has been discussed here. This matter came before the Committee of the Whole some weeks ago, and was then discussed at much length, but it was found that there was nearly an equal division of sentiment upon the subject, and it was deemed of so much importance, that it was referred to a new Special Committee. That Committee had the matter under consideration some four or five weeks before they made their Report. During this whole interval, the policy of adopting the plurality principle must have been discussed in private circles, and I am sure many members have bestowed upon it much attention. It certainly has been expected that when this Report should be called up, there would be a full discussion upon it, and that we should obtain the views of many gentlemen, enlarged and matured by conversations, not only with their associates here, but with other persons, in various parts of the Commonwealth. But when this Report came in order, and members rose to express their opinions, they found themselves embarrassed, and liable to be cut off in the midst of their speeches, by a miserable half-hour rule, and now they are put under the restriction of an order just adopted, declaring that all discussion upon this great subject shall cease in the Committee of the Whole, in three-quarters of an hour. It may be said that the question will come up again in the Convention; but when it does, a similar summary process may be adopted, and an end be put to all discussion. I do not complain of this on my own account. I have no desire to express my views in relation to the plurality principle, for I happen to belong to that class of old fogies who have preferred that a majority should be required in our elections. I have at all times, heretofore, been opposed to the plurality rule. Under present circumstances, however, I feel constrained to vote in favor of framing an amendment, establishing this rule, and of sending it out to the people for their consideration and action; and my reasons are mainly founded on the history of this Convention, to which I will now call the attention of the Committee. In the legislature of 1851, the senator from Franklin, (Mr. Griswold,) now the delegate for Erving, brought forward a proposition to alter the Constitution in relation to the system of representation in the House. He introduced two or three resolves, drawn up in proper form, for the purpose of accomplishing this object. These resolves passed the Senate, but failed to obtain the requisite number of votes in the House. Afterwards, an attempt was made to district the cities and large towns, and a bill, designed to effect that object, was carried through the Senate and was sent to the House, where it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which the gentleman who is at the present time attorney-general of the United States, was chairman. It was understood that he was of opinion that the legislature had no constitutional power to enact such a law, and the bill was not, I believe, ever reported to the House, but died in the hands of the Committee.

The next movement of the indefatigable and persevering senator from Franklin, was to offer an order for calling a convention to revise the Constitution, and a bill was, in due time, reported by a committee of which he was chairman, providing that the question whether such a Convention should be held, should be submitted to the people.

The committee, however, made no formal written report, and of course did not set forth their reasons for this measure; but as the movement grew out of a failure to alter the Constitution, touching the basis of representation in the House, it was understood that the great object of the Convention was to effect an important change of that basis. It went before the people with this aspect, and the result was, that the measure failed by about five thousand majority against it, many of the small towns even voting against it. At the next session of the legislature, the project was revived. The senator from Franklin, determined, if possible, to accomplish his favorite scheme, again brought forward a proposition for calling a Convention. On his motion, a large committee of both branches was appointed, of which he was placed at the head.

The sagacious chairman was satisfied, from the result of the former trial, that in order to insure success the next time, a formal and direct appeal must be made to the people, by presenting to them some more powerful reasons for calling a Convention than such as related to the system of representation in the House. It fortunately so happened for the chairman, that a strong feeling had grown up throughout the Commonwealth, in favor of the plurality principle in our elections. Several congressional districts had, for a long time, been unrepresented. In the fourth district fourteen trials had taken place without securing an election. A majority of the Senate had rarely been elected for a long period, and sometimes not even a quorum. There had been no election of governor and lieutenant-governor for a series of years. From these causes, a strong and general desire had arisen for the establishment of the plurality rule. The subject had been much discussed everywhere—in newspapers, at conventions, and other public meetings.

Under these circumstances, the Franklin senator resolved to avail himself of this manifest popular feeling, and drew up an elaborate report, setting forth the reasons for holding a Convention, amongst which the necessity and expediency of adopting the plurality rule, were strongly and pointedly set forth. That report, after stating that the proposed new system would save expense, and prevent much party animosity, which is now engendered by repeated trials, proceeded to say: "That the practical operation of our Constitution for the last ten years, has been, in very many instances, to place in the most important offices in the State, men who have received, not a majority, but only a plurality of the popular vote. Indeed, this result seems to be fast becoming the general rule, and not the exception. And, in some instances, these offices have been filled by men who have received not even a plurality of the popular vote."

The report goes on to state what officers should especially be elected by a plurality, as follows: "The election of secretary of the Commonwealth, treasurer and receiver-general, auditor of accounts, and executive councillors, by the people, with an application of the plurality principle to these officers, as well as to the governor, lieutenant-governor, and state senators, would do much to remedy this evil."

Thus the report specifies what officers the plurality principle should be applied to; and what are they? Why, the very ones who it is now proposed must have a majority to secure their election; that is the proposition now before us, is just the reverse of what was recommended by the legislative committee.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MOREY. For a moment.

Mr. GRISWOLD. As this subject has been so often alluded to, in justice to the other members of the committee who signed that report, I desire to make a single remark, for I think they have been somewhat misapprehended in relation to this subject. For myself, I care little about the matter, for I believe my sentiments upon the subject of plurality are well enough understood; I should prefer that these officers should be elected by plurality, if I could get it, but it is evident

Monday,

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—MOREY.

[July 18th.]

that is not the feeling of the Convention. But, Sir, if this seventh section of the report is quoted, it should be done in connection with the sixth. I will read the beginning of that article.

Mr. MOREY. I can hardly afford to lose my time for the gentleman to read from his report.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Just a line or two.

Mr. MOREY. I will read the whole two sections, if the gentleman desires it. Here they are:

"6. In the sixth place, we recommend the adoption of the plurality system, in more of our elections. To what extent the Constitution should be revised on this subject, and how far the system shall be carried, will of course remain for the Convention to settle. Nor do we now express any opinion as to which would be the most expedient, if the system is to be adopted, to apply it to the first, or only to the second, or some subsequent election. But the time and money which is now expended, and the party animosity which is engendered, by the numerous and unsuccessful attempts to elect the various state, county, and town or city officers, have become grounds of repeated and loud complaints in all portions of the Commonwealth. This part of the Constitution should undergo a thorough revision; it should be done not rashly, but with great care and deliberation. We are aware that the majority principle has long been considered the conservative element of our Constitution; and many sound and well-balanced minds may take alarm at a proposition of this kind; but we think that a moment's reflection will satisfy the most fastidious, that their fears are groundless. The practical operation of our Constitution, for the last ten years, has been in very many instances, to place in the most important offices in the State, men who have received, not a majority, but only a plurality, of the popular vote. Indeed, this result seems to be fast becoming the general rule, and not the exception. And in some instances, these offices have been filled by men who have received not even a plurality of the popular vote.

"No one has a right to complain of these results, so long as the Constitution remains as it is; and we only allude to them, for the purpose of showing that the Constitution itself, in its practical operation, has partially destroyed a principle, which by many has long been considered essential to the stability and perpetuity of our government. This subject was thoroughly discussed, in all its bearings, in the popular branch of the legislature, during the sessions of 1849, and 1850, and although the most disastrous results were then predicted, should the plurality principle to any extent become a law, yet we believe that the act of last session, providing for the election of members of congress by plurality on the second trial, is not only a just, and safe, but very popular law.

"7. The present cumbersome, formal mode of organizing the government, we submit, should be abolished. Eight or ten days are now usually occupied in this organization, which is nothing less than an annual waste of six or eight thousand dollars of the people's money. The election of secretary of the Commonwealth, treasurer and receiver-general, auditor of accounts, and executive councillors, by the people, with an application of the plurality principle to these officers, as well as to the governor, lieutenant-governor, and state senators, would do much to remedy this evil. These changes, with a few other slight modifications of the Constitution in the same direction, especially the establishment of a board of men to count the votes, declare the result, and notify the persons elected, would enable the legislature to organize the government, and be ready to proceed with the business of the session, in two, or at the longest, in three days. This change alone, would, in the course of ten years, nearly or quite defray the whole expense of the Convention."

Now, Sir, if the gentleman had desired to use language more strong and specific, he could not have done it. That document was regarded as an able and elaborate report, as it is. It was praised and quoted from in all the newspapers, except the Whig newspapers, and I believe in some of them. It certainly was extolled, not only in all the Democratic newspapers, but in most of the Free Soil journals. Several thousand extra copies were ordered to be printed by the Senate, and I think an extra number was ordered in the House. It was regarded by the friends and advocates of the Convention as the great campaign document, and it was so advertised in the newspapers. It was reprinted, and a multitude of copies sent broadcast over the Commonwealth. I heard of it in every direction. It was thrown into every house, put into every man's hands, and was read everywhere.

And what was more, some of the gentlemen who signed the document, being the most popular orators of their parties, went forth and took the stump in favor of the Convention. By looking into the Commonwealth, and other newspapers of that date, you will find appointments for these gentlemen to speak, in different portions of the State, for almost every day in the week, for many weeks prior to the time of voting upon this subject. Well, Sir, when they thus went forth, they surely supported the calling of a Convention, and, I presume they used the same arguments as were employed in the report which they signed.

Being anxious to learn how things were going on, I made inquiries of some gentlemen, belonging to the party with which I was associated, who had been out and addressed the people with reference to the approaching election, and occasionally with regard to the Convention. When I asked what the prospect was, as to the Convention, the reply was, that the plurality doctrine was carrying all before it; that many of the Whigs were coming out in favor of it, and that the other parties were to a man, advocates for it.

In consequence of this state of things, the Whig speakers pretty much gave up the idea of interposing any obstacle in the way of calling of the Convention. They seemed inclined to let the thing take its course. This was acquiesced in, inasmuch as many of those speakers were in favor of the plurality doctrine, and that doctrine was put forth with so much prominence and effect by its particular advocates.

Under these circumstances, it was not for me, old foggy or not, to stand out against this feeling, which was prevailing amongst the people, especially when it appeared that so many of the party with which I was acting, were disposed to support this principle. My colleague, (Mr. Schouler,) was, and had for a long time, been earnestly in favor of the plurality. All the speeches that were made during the campaign by advocates of the Convention, contained more or less arguments in favor of the plurality principle; and I undertook to say that it was the expectation of securing this reform, more than anything else, that carried the proposition for a Convention with the people. I am very confident that if the people had not supposed they were sure of having the plurality system adopted, there would have been a decided majority against a Convention.* If the reformers in this body, who took the field last autumn, and addressed the people on this subject, had have then made the same speeches which we have heard from them here, against the plurality rule, the whole project of a Convention would have been defeated by an overwhelming vote. You had tried it once before with reference to the basis of representation in the House, and the scheme signally failed.

Yet, these very gentlemen, who put forth the reasons I have stated, for calling a Convention, and who induced the people to act upon them, now virtually say to the people: "We have got the Convention out of you, but as to this plurality system, you shall not have it. We not only will not give it to you, but we will not so much as frame an article of amendment, submitting the question to you. We will not allow you to pass upon the subject."

Now, Sir, notwithstanding the fact that I have heretofore been opposed to the introduction of this principle, yet, for one, have too much regard, too much respect for the people, to take the course which is pursued by members of this Convention in relation to this matter. I think these gentlemen indicate the most utter contempt for the people by withholding this proposition from them. I therefore say, that I am in favor of framing an article of amendment, establishing the principle, such as is contained in the proposition of my colleague, (Mr. Schouler,) making those officers eligible by a plurality, who are specified in the report and programme of the Convention, drawn up by the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold).

I would send out such a proposition, and let the people decide upon it for themselves. Not to do as much as this, is, as I said before, treating the people with perfect contempt. It will be not much better than obtaining goods by false pretences. It will be perpetrating a fraud upon the people. They were called upon particularly to vote for a Convention, in order that the plurality principle might be fully established in our elections, and now, when they have called the Convention, they are to be denied the privilege of voting upon this measure, to secure which, this Convention was advocated and called. Sir, I repeat it. I shall vote in favor of submitting this question to the people. I regard the members of the Convention as more pointedly, specifically, and emphatically instructed upon this subject than upon any other; and I think that by incorporating with the amendments, to be submitted to the people, an article containing this provision, we shall more directly and certainly carry out their wishes, than by any other proposition we can adopt.

The low murmur of dissatisfaction with this fraudulent suppression of the very amendment which the people have expected, and most of all desired, has already reached us from the hills and valleys of Massachusetts. Ere long, we shall see the leaders of the majority in this Convention begin to quake and tremble; and I venture to predict, that before the close of the session, some one of these Constitution-menders will be directed to bring forward propositions to amend and qualify certain important resolutions which have been adopted, and to insert a shred here and a patch there, in order to relieve, if possible, the most obvious defects of their work, and to avert, or moderate, in some degree, the censure of their constituents. I warn gentlemen not to flatter themselves with the hope of escaping the indignation of the people by any miserable apology, or even half-way substitute, for the adoption of a plain, distinct, and extensive plurality system. I say, let this principle be introduced in the election not only of senators, executive councillors, county and district officers, but of governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, treasurer, auditor and attorney-general, and on the second trial, if not on the first, of representatives to the general court. Let this whole subject be submitted at once, directly to the people, and to the people alone. Nothing else can, will, or ought to satisfy them.

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—GOOCH.

[July 18th.]

Mr. GOOCH, of Melrose. Mr. Chairman: I never knew exactly what an old fogey was, until I came into the Convention this afternoon. But if we may take the definition of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Morey,) he is a man who thinks one way, and votes another. The gentleman says he believes in the majority principle, and yet, intends to vote to submit to the people a proposition in favor of the plurality principle; and he claims to be an old fogey.

Now, Sir, the gentleman has very different ideas of our duty as members of this Convention, from those which I entertain, if he thinks that by such a course of conduct we shall discharge that duty. I believe we were sent here to recommend to the people such alterations in the Constitution as we believe should be made, and no others. I believe the people have a right to expect that every man here will act conscientiously; that when he votes he will vote his honest sentiments, without regard to what other people think, and without regard to what other people may do. It seems to me that every man who fails to vote and act in this manner, fails to discharge his duty.

Now, Sir, in relation to the resolves before us, I am sorry, as well as surprised, to see them reported in the form in which they appear before us, coming, as they do, from the Select Committee upon this subject. When this subject was before us, upon a former occasion, I recollect a certain distinction was made, or proposed to be made, with regard to the election of certain officers by a majority, and certain others by plurality. If I recollect rightly, the proposition was introduced by the gentleman from Worcester. It was, in substance, that the law-making power should be elected by a majority, and that the other ministerial officers should be elected by a plurality. I thought then, that there was good reason for the distinction, and I think so still. I, for one, am perfectly willing to live in a Commonwealth, and to abide by the laws which are enacted by a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, and I am willing to yield my private judgment to no other authority. And should I be called upon to yield my private judgment, to yield my property, my liberty, or my life, under the authority of the laws of this Commonwealth, I desire that the laws which make this requisition upon me should be the laws of the majority of the people of the Commonwealth, and not the laws of a minority. That is my doctrine, and I had always supposed that to be the doctrine of the people of Massachusetts.

I care not what documents certain gentlemen have sent out to the people, to influence them in calling this Convention. Those documents are worth just as much as the opinions and sentiments of those gentlemen expressed in any other way, and no more. They have their weight as the opinions of those individuals, and no other. But I do not care how many men may have recommended, or sent out this document recommending the establishment of the plurality principle; it has no weight with me, except so far as the opinions of those men who signed this document are concerned, and so far as the reasons it contains are entitled to weight; nothing farther. I have been a little surprised, that such arguments and such influence, as have been used by the gentleman from Boston, should have been brought in here, and pressed upon gentlemen as if they were binding upon them. Sir, I know nothing about any such document as the gentleman has referred to, and I care nothing about it. I care not which party put forth this document; it can have no influence upon my vote. And I believe it will have no influence upon the vote of any honest man in this Convention.

I said I was surprised to see these resolutions reported in the shape in which they now come before us, because I did believe the Committee would recognize the distinction made by the gentleman from Worcester, viz.: that the law-making power of the Commonwealth should be chosen by a majority, and that the mere ministerial officers should be chosen by plurality. I supposed the Committee might be willing to sacrifice this much of the true principle, for the sake of convenience and accommodation—for the sake of saving time, expense, and trouble. But I did not believe they would go farther than that. But what have we before us, in these resolves?

In the first place, the governor is to be elected by a majority of the people, provided he obtains a majority upon the first trial, and if not, he is not to be elected by the people at all; but he is to be elected by the agents of the people. He is to be elected by those whom the people have delegated, or whom they may delegate, for that purpose, in case of a non-election by a majority of the people. Well, Sir, I suppose the reasons for that provision are these: I suppose they intended to provide, in the first place, that the governor should be elected by a majority of the people, but that, in case no one received a majority of the votes of the people, the majority principle should still be maintained, and that he should be elected by the House of Representatives and by the Senate, who were also elected by a majority of the people; and this provision of the first resolution I should like, if the other resolutions provide for the election of the House and Senate by a majority. Well, Sir, what do those resolutions do? What do they provide? They provide that the governor shall not be elected by the people at all, unless he is elected by a majority at their first trial. And then they provide that your House of Representatives shall be elected by a plurality, or that a portion of its members may be elected by a plurality, and your Senate by a plurality, and that your governor shall be elected by your Senate and House of Representatives. You thus strike out the majority principle from your law-making power, from beginning to end. Now, Sir, although I have always been opposed to the plurality principle as applied to the law-making power; yet, rather than vote for these resolutions as they stand, I will vote for the plurality principle, carried out to its full extent.

We provide, if we adopt these resolutions, that every department of the government may be chosen by plurality, without a single feature of the majority principle entering into the system, from beginning to end, and yet refuse to say that a plurality of the people shall elect. As I said in the outset, I care not for the majority principle, except so far as the law-making power of the Commonwealth is concerned. I would like to see the offices mentioned in the first resolution stricken out altogether, except the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor, and a provision made, that, in all elections of senators and members of the House of Representatives, a majority of votes shall be necessary, in all cases, to constitute an election. Then, if we fail to elect our governor by the people, we have a House of Representatives and Senate elected by a majority of the people, and they elect a governor. Then, what do we establish? If we cannot elect our governor directly by our votes, we provide that those persons whom we have elected by a majority of the votes of the people to represent us in the legislature, shall elect our governor for us. If there is an election by a majority of the people, the matter is settled; but if there is no election by a majority of the people, then the people have said that they could not agree upon the election of a governor. And in such a case, what do we do? As we cannot meet again, and decide this question for ourselves, we pass it over to our agents, elected by a majority of the people, and let them settle this matter for us. And, if our agents cannot secure for us our first choice, they can take our second choice. That is the advantage we gain from this system. But, certain gentlemen assert, that by the adoption of such a system, certain towns must go unrepresented. Why must they go unrepresented? Simply, because they do not desire to be represented; because they had rather not be represented at all, than be misrepresented. I grant you, that non-representation is an evil; but it is not so great an evil as misrepresentation. I say, if my town cannot have a man to represent it, who can represent a majority of its citizens, then no man has any right to represent it. If my town wishes to be represented in the legislature, then the wishes of a majority of its citizens should be represented, and not the wishes of a minority. The evil of non-representation is one which the town can cure, and will cure, just as soon as it is for its interest to do so. The very moment it is for the interest of the town to have a representation upon the floor of the House of Representatives, then it will have such representation. There is nothing in the way. They have nothing to do but select and vote for a man, and send him here. If, in some instances, certain towns do not send a representative, it is because the condition and sentiments of the people of these towns are such, that they cannot find men who will truly and properly represent them here. The House of Representatives, by the plan proposed, is to be larger hereafter than it has been in times past, but we have never known the time when there has not been on the floor of the House a sufficiently large number of representatives to transact the business of the Commonwealth. I think an instance can scarcely be found, when any town has suffered one iota from the evil of non-representation. I hope that the resolution, as it now stands, will not be adopted by the Committee. Gentlemen ask me how we will fill vacancies in the Senate. I would provide for a second election, in the case of the non-election of senators; and I would see to it, that a man should be sent who would truly represent the majority of the district, or else send no man at all.

Monday.]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—BUTLER—HATHAWAY—WALKER—SCHOULER.

[July 18th.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. In the few minutes given me I will endeavor to say a word upon a given subject, not proposing to enter upon an argument of this question, for the time for argument has passed. I wish to say a word about that immortal "document" upon this subject of plurality, which has now been read five times. It was a very good argument, and it did its office well, which was, to beat the old fogies, as their chief admits; but I do not see why it could not have been suffered to rest in peace. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) read it; then the gentleman from Brookline (Mr. Aspinwall) threw it at the head of the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis,) then, the gentleman from Worcester not being here, I read another portion of it; then the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) read it again, and when another gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Morey,) so happily edified the Committee by quoting from the same able document, I was inclined to say, et tu Brute. I should like to ask the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Morey,) if he could make up his mind to elect a Whig representative "who is worth his weight in gold" to the gentleman, by plurality, without trying to get a majority? Would he wish to elect even "a Hunker Democrat seventy-five years old?" Would he not, after all, rather have a majority? I was very much surprised to find that the gentleman from Melrose was going against the Report because there was nothing of the majority principle in it. I am surprised that my younger friend from Melrose, (Mr. Gooch,) should say that rather than have this, he would have the plurality all through. There is some of the majority principle in this Report. This proposition, as I said upon a former occasion, is a compromise, or an agreement to go upon one side as far as we could towards a plurality system, and at the same time to save the majority rule as far as we could upon the other. We endeavored to bring this matter to a close, and labored as earnestly as we could to present a system which should have little complexity, and which should meet the opinions of all. Whatever we may do, I do not see how we are to be accused of endeavoring to get the votes of the people by false pretences, because that document said originally that this plurality question was to be settled in such a way as the Convention thought best. That is what we are doing to-day. I say to gentlemen who make such strong objection to the adoption of this system, if they will have the kindness to take my place and go into the committee-room along with the other gentlemen who compose the Committee that presented this plan, and make a better system, one that will better bring together all these various views, I shall be most happy to vote for their report; but until they can do that, I must stand by the Report which I have presented. I have no particular pride of opinion about it. The only wish I have is, that the matter may be settled, and that, too, without delay.

The hour at which it was ordered that debate should cease, in Committee of the Whole, on the subject of elections by plurality, having arrived, the Committee proceeded to vote upon the pending question, being the motion of the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) to amend the third resolve, relative to the election of representatives, so as to provide that they shall, in all cases, be elected by a majority instead of on second trial by plurality. A count being demanded, there were—ayes, 70; noes, 164.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Cambridge, to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:—

That in all elections of representatives to the general court, the person having the highest number of votes shall be elected.

The question was taken, and it was, upon a division—ayes, 82; noes, 163—decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:—

That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that in all elections for governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the Commonwealth, the person having the highest number of votes shall be deemed and taken to be elected.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Boston, proposed to amend the pending amendment by inserting after the words "lieutenant-governor" the word "councillors."

Mr. SCHOULER accepted the amendment, as a modification of his own.

Mr. GRAY. I will take the liberty of suggesting to my colleague, that councillors are provided for in the next resolve.

Mr. HUBBARD. My object was to have two chances to secure this provision.

The question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) as modified, and, upon a division—ayes, 85; noes, 156—it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HATHAWAY moved to strike out all after the words "general court," and to insert the following: "All county, district, city, and town officers, shall be elected as shall by law be provided." That, Mr. Hathaway remarked, will leave the matter, so far as the election of these officers is concerned, precisely as it now stands under the present Constitution.

The amendment did not prevail.

Mr. CHURCHILL, of Milton, proposed to amend the last resolve by striking out the word "legislature," and inserting the words "governor, by and with the advice and consent of the council."

The amendment did not prevail.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the Committee rejected the amendment offered by the gentleman from Plymouth.

Mr. DENTON, of Chelsea. I confess, Sir, that I did not quite understand the amendment of the gentleman from Plymouth. The gentleman from Plymouth, in his explanation, did not satisfy me that it would include—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that debate is not in order.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS, of Lowell, moved that the Committee rise, and report the resolves to the Convention, with the amendments proposed by the Committee, with a recommendation that they be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported the resolves and amendments, with a recommendation that they do pass.

The question being on concurring in the amendments proposed by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. It is a very unpleasant task to undertake to oppose what has been settled in Committee of the Whole. We have voted to report these resolves to the Convention, but I cannot allow the question to be taken without saying that I hope—that is, that I desire—that the Report of the Committee will not be accepted. The third resolve provides that the representatives—

The PRESIDENT. With the leave of the gentleman, the Chair would suggest that the first question is on concurring in the amendments reported by the Committee, which are merely verbal.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, were concurred in.

Mr. SCHOULER moved the adoption of the amendment which he had proposed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I intend to take up but very little time in the discussion of this question, although it is one upon which I have bestowed a great deal of thought, and one in which I feel a great deal of interest. It appears to me, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Fitchburgh, (Mr. Wood,) that this matter has not been discussed at that length which its merits deserve. We did have, in the early part of the session, a proposition about plurality in elections. The gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) the chairman of the Committee upon that subject, made a Report, which was, as I understand, the unanimous Report of the Committee, in favor of adopting the plurality system in our elections. That question was discussed in Committee of the Whole, but the vote was so close that one moment we would carry it one way, by one or two votes, and the next moment a reconsideration would be moved, and then it would go the other way. When the whole matter was reported to the Convention, before we could get to a vote upon it here, and before we could call the yeas and nays, to see what was the true state of feeling of the members of the Convention in regard to the subject, it was taken from our hands and sent to one of the committee-rooms. We have got another proposition, reported by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and what is it? It gives up the whole principle contended for by gentlemen who oppose the plurality system. I do not like to go into matters outside of the particular subject now before us; but no one can look at that resolution, and who knows the history of this Commonwealth, and fail to see, that there is something behind all this thing, which is not explained in the Report. What is the proposition? It was stated by the gentleman from Melrose, (Mr. Gooch,) that we should elect our Senate and House of Representatives by a plurality, but should not elect any of the general officers by

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — SCHOULER — WALKER.

[July 18th.]

that rule, and that they must be elected by a majority. What is the effect of it? It is to throw the election of all these officers into the legislature, where there would be finesse and caucusing employed, and there would be this man to be weighed against the other, this office against the other, and then comes the matter into the legislature, and they are to vote upon it. How are these officers to be elected? By men who are chosen by a plurality vote. You will not allow the people to decide it in the first place; you get the election into the State House, where the legislature are to decide it for them. I think there is no sense in this. The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) speaks about this proposition being a compromise; but it is the most singular compromise that I ever heard of in my life. It does not compromise anything but principle, and it does compromise the principle of the majority, and gives no satisfaction whatever to those who are in favor of the plurality system. I should like to have an explanation of this compromise—where it begins, and where it ends. It leaves all the difficulty with which we have so often found fault, precisely where we found it, and it leaves us in this predicament: that we cannot organize the legislature for seven, eight, or ten days, after coming together, at an expense of seven or eight thousand dollars every year. I ask the members of this Convention, whether seven or eight thousand dollars a year are not worth saving? and we can save it by saying that the people shall decide, instead of leaving it to a plurality legislature to decide. I think this matter deserves some consideration.

If we are to elect at all by plurality, I go for electing everything by plurality. We may elect by a majority, if we have a mind so to do, but what advantage are we to gain by it? Where are we to make any reform here, by which we are to save one single cent of the people's money? History shows in the progress of commonwealths and nations, that corruption does creep in, and it seems to me, that this is a plan for the corruption of officers, or rather for the corruption of those who hold office. This is an entering wedge which will bring about such a state of things. We may just as well have no election by the people, and give the legislature the right of electing in the first instance, instead of going through this mere sham, and having a vote taken which amounts to nothing. As long as this majority principle for the general officers is kept up, just so long there will be no election by the people. In the state of parties of this Commonwealth, as they now exist, there will be no election by the people so long as the majority principle is retained in the Constitution; but when you take that out of the Constitution, then, in my judgment, there will be elections by the majority of the people. It does seem to me—I do not make the charge, but I cannot dismiss it from my mind—that this proposition is presented for the very purpose of getting the election of these officers into the legislature, where the offices might be sold and doled out, and where men could make bargains in regard to them. I say that the people demand no such thing, but quite a different thing. It may be denied, but it appears upon the face of the proposition. If I stood upon the other side of the House, where I could address the eastern gallery, which seems to vote down all these propositions, I might, perhaps, be able to effect more than I now shall do. I recollect a few years ago, in this House, that there was a gentleman from one of the western towns, who, although he had the right in his case, always had the majority against him. He stood right here, and when they took the vote, he carried the fifth and sixth divisions unanimously, while the other side of the House went against him. He thought he would change his position, so he went to the other side of the House, spoke there once, and then spoke in the centre of the House, so that when they came to take the question the next time, he carried his point by the unanimous vote of the whole House. [Laughter.] I do not say that we want to send missionaries into either side of the House, but it seems to me, when the gentleman from Lowell speaks of this proposition being a compromise, that it is time we should require some missionaries to look into it and see whether it is a compromise or not.

But, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention. I suppose it is all settled; and I feel, and I have no doubt the minority feel all the time, that there are certain measures which are put in here, that, however much argument may be presented on the one side, or the other, we are always voted down. Perhaps it is on account of strength, and perhaps it is on account of caucusing. But, I stand here on the Report made by the majority of the legislature last year, calling this Convention; I stand here as a humble advocate of the plurality system; and it was my hope, that this Convention, when it came together, would put that principle into the Constitution, or at least, that they would take the majority principle out of the Constitution, and leave the legislature to decide as the wishes of the people should direct. As it is now, we get nothing. We violate the principle of the gentleman from North Brookfield, and others who have advocated the majority principle; and those who have advocated the plurality principle, get nothing. While we asked bread, we got a stone. It amounts to the same thing; it may be a brick. [Laughter.] But, as the gentleman from Lowell may want a little time to explain this compromise, I will conclude, by asking for the yeas and nays, so that those who have stood up for principle against expediency, and contended for the right all along, may stand on the imperishable record, as having sustained the plurality system.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. On a previous occasion, I have given my views with regard to the general principle in relation to the plurality system, and I gave my views as entirely adverse to that principle, believing it to be wrong, and consequently that it could only be productive of evil. When I saw the Report of this Committee, I looked at it with great interest; and, supposing it was a compromise, I was disposed to do everything I could, consistently, to meet the exigency of the case. But, when I saw that the third resolution provided that representatives should be chosen by plurality after the first trial, I was obliged to dissent from it entirely. It seems to me there is no sound policy in this Report. Our towns are democracies. They meet together, and they may try several times in a day, for the election of a representative; they may even have forty trials, perhaps, between the time when the meeting is called to elect representatives, and the meeting of the legislature. So that there seems to be no excuse that the power to elect by a majority shall not be preserved to the towns. Shall we take it away? The idea of making one trial by majority, and then, if an election is not made, to allow a plurality to elect, I discard altogether. There is no statesmanship and no principle in the thing. If we are to have the plurality principle at all, let us have it at once. Then the question will be met promptly. By the present proposition, the several parties would have to put up their respective candidates, which some party would have at last, to withdraw; and hence, if we adopt a plurality system at all, I would much rather apply it in the first place than in the second.

Sir, since I last spoke on this subject, I have met a very intelligent gentleman from the State of Ohio, who has resided there many years, and he asked me the question, what we were going to do with regard to the plurality principle in this Commonwealth. I told him that it was proposed to adopt it. He says: "Do not take that course, if you do you will have the same results that we have had, namely: a general demoralization in political action." That is the consequence with us, and we deplore it. In all our elections we find it difficult to get a good man to stand as a candidate. For the moment we put up a good man, there are a half a dozen other men put up, some of whom are of disreputable character," and, to use his own phrase, "the meanest scamp is the most likely to be successful. Hence, intelligent and respectable men are not willing to be put up, for the greater number of men you have as candidates, the less is the chance of the election of a good man." Such is the operation of the system everywhere.

I saw, also, a few days since, a gentleman from Alabama, who expressed great anxiety about our abandoning the majority principle. "If you do it," said he, "you will rue the day; you will cause a general demoralization in politics, as has been the case in Alabama. We are always troubled to get the first and best men to stand for any office, for the reason that when they have to run against many men, of indifferent character—and they know, that as a general rule, the man of the most indifferent character is quite as likely to be elected as any other—they feel that it is a disgrace to stand, and they will not do it. That is the general result."

As to the election of officers in large cities, there may be some reason for adopting this rule, but when you come to towns, there is no excuse for it at all. It must be merely on the ground that we are unwilling to take the trouble. But there is no difficulty in that; the towns have only to repeat their trials as long as they choose. It has been said, and cannot be repeated too often, that this is the great question of misrepresentation, or non-representation, and there is a great choice between them; for it is much better not to be represented than to be misrepresented.

We are about to provide a Constitution, which will give a House of some four hundred members, and that will be an objection against our Constitution; and if we adopt this plurality system, it is certain that that House will consist of nearly the full number; and that will make an additional argument against the adoption of our Constitution. On the other hand, if we provide that a majority shall elect, then it will happen that many towns will choose not to be misrepresented,

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—WALKER—LORD.

[July 18th.

and they will adhere to their candidates and their principles, and will not be represented in the House. What will be the consequence? The House will be reduced, perhaps, some fifty or a hundred members. Now, I maintain, that it is vastly more desirable to have such a result, than to adopt the plurality rule and have the House filled every year; because the people will not be any more represented under the plurality rule than under the majority rule, even if many towns are not represented.

Then there is another consideration with regard to the basis of representation. By the plan which we have adopted, if I understand it, eighteen thousand less than one-third of the population of the State, may choose a majority of seven in the House of Representatives. Now, shall we reduce that constituency still more by adopting the plurality system? We know that if the plurality system is adopted, it is more than probable that one-quarter of the population of the Commonwealth will choose a majority of the House of Representatives. I would like to know if it is right, if it is desirable; I would like to know if gentlemen suppose that it will be agreeable to the people of Massachusetts. I do not believe it will. Hence, it will be a strong argument against the adoption of the Constitution.

Sir, if you could have the majority principle retained, with regard to members of the legislature, I would not make any opposition to this Report. I do not say I would be content with it, for I would not be content with anything that I do not think right; but I would submit to it.

If it be in order, before taking my seat, I would move to strike out from the third resolution all after the word "election," in the third line. I do not wish to detain the Convention by farther remarks, having discussed the plurality principle at length on a previous occasion.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order at this time, as an amendment is pending to the first resolve.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. If I understand the argument of the gentleman from North Brookfield, it is this: That in consequence of what he has heard from a gentleman from Ohio, and from another gentleman from Alabama, if the plurality system is adopted, the same result will follow here that has followed there. In Ohio, the meanest rascals get chosen; and in Alabama the most indifferent people. Now, if I had such a judgment of the people of Massachusetts, that there were more of them who would vote for the meanest rascals that could be thought of, than would vote for a good man, I would try some method to curtail their power; and I am not surprised that the gentleman from North Brookfield wants to do so. He cannot trust these people, because more of them will be willing to vote for the meanest rascal, than for a good man. But, differing from him, I believe the people are capable of self-government, capable of selecting good men, and that they will not pick out the meanest rascals. I believe that they will not be demoralized; that the adoption of the plurality rule will not cause a general demoralization; but that those men will be chosen whom the most of the people are in favor of. I am quite as unwilling to say that the people will select the most indifferent persons, as to say they will select the meanest rascals. I do not think they will take either course. I am rather inclined to adopt the opinion of the gentleman who now represents Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) that the adoption of the plurality system will destroy the third party, and having destroyed the third party, and made but two parties, I do not exactly understand how a person will be elected without a majority. When you get down to two parties, as the plurality principle brings it down, it is simply a process for concentrating the public mind upon an individual. Whoever supposed that the public mind uniformly fell upon the particular person who was to be elected to the office? We know, Sir, that in the primary meetings, where a candidate is to be selected, there is generally a great diversity of opinion; and that diversity of opinion is reconciled, and one person is selected and agreed upon. The same thing happens in all parties, and the number of candidates gets reduced, out of which the people are to select. It is not the selection of an individual by a majority of the people, because we know that a majority of the people are in favor, individually, of a particular individual; but because, by the political economy and political arrangement, there has been a concentration upon certain members who represent certain interests; and out of those numbers, one is to be selected. The plurality principle simply reduces the number of candidates, so that the public will be obliged to select one of two, instead of selecting from three or four; and generally speaking,—I put it as a matter of historical fact,—where the plurality rule prevails, there the candidate is elected by a majority of voters.

As a general proposition, that is true. I think there was an exception or two, perhaps, in the case of an election of representatives to congress, but they were merely exceptions. Take the country through, and you will find that where the plurality system prevails, no men get into office so frequently without receiving a majority of votes, as they do in Massachusetts where the majority rule has prevailed. Then why talk about this being an abandonment of the majority principle? It is one of the instrumentalities by which the majority principle can be concentrated upon an individual. It is developing, and bringing out, and enforcing, the majority principle. Gentlemen say here, with a flaunt, that we have got into new company. Well, I want to know if, because men have become convinced that they are wrong, and have joined them, they must desert their old ground. We have had gentlemen get up here and say, this plurality system was always a good democratic doctrine, and we were always in favor of it. Do not these gentlemen know that democracy is progressive, and that among other things, they have compelled us, poor Whigs, to abandon some of our views as obsolete ideas? And I am sorry, that so soon as the Whigs are obliged to change their condition, that there is another party that whips around and feels it glory enough if they can be in opposition to these poor Whigs. I have not heard any reason given by those gentlemen who have all along advocated the plurality system, why they should change now. When we all seem to be coming to agree that it is the true ground, all at once some gentlemen say, because we have got new allies, we will, therefore, abandon our old notions. That seems to be all the argument there is.

Now, Sir, I desire to express only a very few words upon this subject, having already developed the principal thoughts which I rose to suggest, that the people of this Commonwealth will be gratified at the device of such an instrumentality as shall concentrate the votes upon the smallest number of candidates. There is not a voter in this Commonwealth, who cannot see clear through this proposition.

We may involve it in diplomacy here, if we will, but every voter in the Commonwealth will see and understand what these six large offices are put into the legislature for. There is no gentleman in this House who cannot tell what it is done for. I am a little at a loss to understand, I confess, how we are to manage this matter. There is a little inconvenience about the manner of choosing our governor. We have already almost unanimously voted, that we would choose him by joint ballot, and here we say that we will choose him by a concurrent vote. Sometime ago—so long ago that we have, perhaps, almost forgotten it—some time in month before last, the Convention determined, that, whenever the people did not choose a governor, he should be chosen by the legislature on joint ballot; and now we are to have it done by concurrent vote. I have no objection to the two propositions; I am willing to have them both put there; but, Sir, I desire to have those gentlemen who charge me with not confiding in the people, and who themselves do confide in the people, I desire to have them explain to me how it is that, under this system, the people cannot be deprived of their choice. For example, in this matter of governor, we change from four to three; one man has eighty thousand votes, another has seventy thousand, and another fifteen thousand, and there is no election. Now a majority of your House of Representatives are chosen by one-third part of the people, and you pretend that your governor is a representative of the whole people. Well, Sir, this majority of the House of Representatives, thus chosen by one-third part of the people, can exclude the individual who had eighty thousand votes, and send up to the Senate the one with seventy thousand, and the one who had fifteen thousand. This is giving the governor to the people, and taking the House of Representatives from the towns—doing it with a vengeance! I remember to have heard the argument in favor of the distribution of power, that, inasmuch as the people have the governor, the towns ought to have the House; but one-third of the people of these towns voting thus, through a majority of the House, say that the man who has eighty thousand votes, shall not be governor, no matter even if the Senate, who do represent the people, want him. The popular majority may send to the Senate a majority in favor of the individual who has eighty thousand votes; but the towns send to the House a majority who are in favor of the individual who has only fifteen thousand votes; and of these three candidates, the House sends up to the Senate the seventy thousand man and the fifteen thousand man, to let them take their pick between them. I say, therefore, upon this hypothesis, you have no popular representation in the governor, you have no popular branch in the government. Your House is from towns—your Senate is from districts, chosen by pluralities; and, as gentlemen say here, pluralities are the same as minorities. Here the governor is forced upon the Senate, by the House chosen by the towns; and yet you say that there are two branches that represent the people, while the

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—LORD—FRENCH.

[July 18th.]

House represents the towns. Sir, the poor people, in this arrangement, fail of having any representation anywhere, except as it comes from the Senate. In this respect, as relates to the Senate, I address my remarks to those gentlemen who say that a plurality does not represent the people. I am of the opinion that a plurality does represent the people; and therefore, the argument relating to the Senate has no force in my mind, but it has and must have force with those gentlemen who say that the Senate is a representative of a minority.

If, Sir, it is desirable to establish any rule as a constitutional rule, it appears to me that the principle that the rule should be uniform, is so obvious to every mind, that it gains no force from argument or reasoning. We propose to say here, that certain officers shall be chosen by a majority, and certain other officers by a plurality. Has any gentleman told why that line is drawn in that way? I have heard no reason given for it—I can see the reason for it—every-body can see the reason; but has anybody avowed that reason? Has any gentleman told us why it is that the line should be drawn as it is drawn? why the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the Commonwealth, should be chosen by majorities, and all other officers by a plurality? Now, if we were about to make a rule on the subject, and have some officers elected by a majority and others by a plurality, what rule would seem reasonable and proper? I believe that the universal opinion would be in favor of a rule of this kind: that, in proportion as it is difficult to obtain a second expression of opinion from the same constituency, just in such proportion is the necessity for the adoption of the plurality principle. I would like to hear anybody undertake to controvert that proposition. I agree with the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker), that it is not half so important for the town of Hull, which can vote forty times, and perhaps four hundred times a day—I am inclined to think that they could vote four hundred times between sunrise and sunset; but if they could not, Nahant could—it is not half so important for these little towns to choose their representatives by the plurality system, as it is that all the people of the Commonwealth should have a chance to choose their governor by the plurality system. The difficulty is nothing, in comparison—the inconvenience is nothing, in comparison; as the gentleman from Boston said this morning, the whole Report is in inverted order, and ought to be reversed or shifted end for end. I am glad that I had the concurrence of the gentleman from North Brookfield in that respect; the thing is exactly reversed, for in those constituencies which cannot be called together twice, you insist upon applying the majority principle; but in those constituencies which can be called together twice, without any considerable difficulty, you allow the election to take place by the plurality principle. Why is this so? It is nothing in the name of State officers, because one is a State and the others are local officers. I repeat, Sir, that there is no individual in this assembly who does not see why it is so, and yet there is no gentleman in this assembly who will tell why it is so. Every-body knows what it is for, and yet nobody will tell us what it is for. The gentleman from Lowell, who reported this resolution, knows why the Committee made these officers at large, through the State, to be elected by majorities, in preference to local officers, and yet I do not hear anybody say why. There is a reason, Sir, and it is a reason that has no force whatever with me in making fundamental law. We know something about what the popular will is—those of us who are willing to confide in the people—and we know that the popular mind has been for years demanding that the legislature should so alter the law that a plurality should elect. And we know, too, that the legislature has gone a great ways, almost to the very verge of constitutional right, in altering the law upon this subject; and they have never made a single advance on this subject, which the people have not approved. They have made representatives to congress eligible by plurality on the second ballot; and has the first man in the Commonwealth sent up a petition to the legislature to change that law since? Not one. The people of the Commonwealth approved of it. I do not know a single individual who, this day, would wish to alter it. I say, also, that the majority principle has never been adopted by any people, or acted upon by any people, where the counter proposition received a respectable advocacy, for a single moment; or where the plurality principle has been carried into practice in a single election.

Are we then desirous of finding out what is the popular will? I do not care how much gentlemen charge me with change, or how much they charge those with whom I am accustomed to act, with change. The party that called this Convention, called it upon the open and avowed ground, that the plurality principle ought to be adopted—that we ought not to spend a week here in the organization of the government, and in managing and bargaining how the offices should be distributed. It was—I do not say the known—but it was the avowed object of those who called this Convention, to prevent that great evil of the organization of the government being delayed a whole week. I have heard it said, here or somewhere, that where there has been an abuse, that has lasted for fifteen or twenty years, and some particular individuals have got the benefit of that abuse, it will not do to stop it until every-body else has had a hand in it, and has had a chance to profit by it in the same manner; and then you can let the abuse be reformed. Well, Sir, here you have got a real abuse; but it seems that we must not touch it, until every-body has had the advantage of it. Here is a real evil; every-body knows and feels it to be an evil, that the organization of this government, where there is a distraction of sentiment in the public mind, must be delayed a week at the beginning of every year. It is an evil that has been acknowledged, and those gentlemen who reported in favor of calling this Convention, reported that it would be enough to pay all the expense of this Convention, if we could save the extraordinary spectacle, and the extraordinary cost of the non-organization of this government for an entire week every year. What has changed the minds of gentlemen upon this subject? If ever I was in favor of the majority principle—and, I cannot remember that I ever was—if I ever was in favor of that principle, these very delays, and difficulties, and abuses, have long ago disabused my mind of the idea that a majority was necessary. They say that a majority should rule; but who rules under the majority principle? Does a majority rule? No, Sir; never.

A little band, a factious minority, rule, and always have ruled. How came that most excellent presiding officer, and much lamented man, to occupy the chair which you now occupy in this House, in that political year when the House was so divided, that the candidate of one party received just exactly as many votes as the candidate of another, and a certain individual of my own county, received one vote, and one vote only? The other two great parties gave exactly an equal number, and that gentleman received one vote only; but he held that one vote until enough to make a majority came to him; and the majority ruled, did they? I say it is always so; there is a fallacy in this mode of argument that a majority should rule. It is putting it into the power of a small portion of the people, to defeat the whole great bulk of the people; that is the operation of the majority system. Thus a very small proportion of the voters of this Commonwealth, can throw these six offices, as articles of merchandise, into the House of Representatives. I want to keep them out of it. I do not believe in that philosophy at all, which we have heard here so many times, that the gentleman who receives the smallest number of the votes of the people, if he shall get a majority of the votes of the House, and of the Senate, will thus be a majority governor. That is the sublimation of political mathematics, which goes beyond my comprehension. A man who gets less than one-third part of the votes, somehow or other, comes up here, and goes, as they say, into a most unequal House—they always say it has been very unequal—which unequal House has filled up the Senate full. We have a House not representing the people at all; and the man who receives less than one-third part of the votes is passed from the House to the Senate, and is made, by some hoccus pocus which I never could exactly understand, a majority governor. I have heard it assumed here a great many times, that such a gentleman as that, is in reality elected by a majority of the people.

I cannot understand that. I think that if the majority of the people very particularly want a man, they will be very apt to vote for him. Now and then you may get a few voters, here and there, who will vote contrary to their own notions of what is right,—of course it is not to be wondered at that some few among the people should do so, when we find the same thing done by gentlemen in this Convention,—and others, again, vote as they are told to vote; but the great majority of the people vote as they please, with perfect independence; and when we introduce such a system as to bring the people to vote in such a manner as to get a majority vote upon any question, then we shall best advance the interests of our constituents, and promote that public good which we were sent here to accomplish. Anything to concentrate, as I said in the beginning—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I have always been in favor of the majority system, and I cannot, now, very well make up my mind to give it up. I have an amendment, which I desire to offer to the third resolution, which, I think, will make it stand a little better. It is this: after the word "ballot" insert the following:—

But in case of the failure of election on such ballot, then at a subsequent meeting, called for that purpose, the person having the highest number of votes shall be deemed and declared to be elected.

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—WILSON—BRADBURY.

[July 18th.

The whole resolution, if thus amended, will then read—

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order at this time, but the gentleman from Berkley will, no doubt, have an opportunity of offering his amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, if my amendment is not in order, I suppose it is not in order to make any remarks.

The PRESIDENT. The whole question is open to debate on the first resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is rather too late to go into a general discussion upon this question. Some weeks ago this subject was discussed with great ability for several days, and a vote was taken in the largest Committee of the Whole that we have yet had; we had a larger vote than we have had upon any question which has been taken during the session. The judgment of the Convention was: that for governor, lieutenant-governor, and the other State officers, a majority should be required; that for members of the House of Representatives, and town officers, a majority should be required. The judgment of the Convention then was: that for senators, and county and district officers, a plurality only should be required to elect.

Mr. SCHOULER. I wish to correct the gentleman. There has been no vote taken in the Convention upon this question.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Boston is, I think, hypercritical. There was a vote taken in Committee of the Whole, which I apprehend is pretty much the same thing; and I say that a larger number of members were present, and voted on these questions, than have been present on any contested point during this session. I believe that the vote stood 187 to 188. The question was then recommitted to a Committee; and I understood that at that time it was generally conceded, that the judgment of the Committee was to stand as the judgment of the Convention, for the reasons which were then given.

Now, Sir, I am in favor of a majority, out and out. I adhere to that principle. I would accede, however, to the plurality system in the election of district and county officers, and senators, for they must be elected by the people. I would consent that it should stand as reported by the Committee; but, in regard to the election of representatives and town officers, I am opposed altogether to the Report of the Committee. I do not believe that it is expedient for the Committee to place a provision in the Constitution authorizing our town officers to be chosen by a plurality. I doubt very much whether the people themselves wish or desire it.

The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Morey,) the old political war-chief of the Whig party of the State, came out to-day, and pressed upon us the necessity of going for the plurality system, although he says that he is in favor of a majority system. They put it on the ground that the address put forth by the gentleman for Erving, and other gentlemen of the legislature, in 1852, represented this plurality system as one great object to be achieved by the proposed Convention. Now, Sir, it is common for gentlemen, in advocating questions here, to say that the people are on their side. I take it, that we do not know what the judgment of the people is upon this question. I can say that through the canvass of last year, the political friends who acted with me did not advocate the plurality system. The press which supported the political organization with which I act, did not advocate the plurality system in supporting the call for the Convention. On the contrary, the thirty-six thousand men who gave their votes for this Convention, in November last, were generally opposed to the plurality system, and are so to this day. I know the Democratic party generally goes for the plurality system. Some of them advocated it then, and many do so now. They, however, are here to speak for themselves. But as to the Whig party, all that we know of their opinions is, that they went into their State conventions, and denounced the Convention as an untried and hazardous experiment; got up at an expense of $250,000, to break down the Constitution of the Commonwealth, and to change those great principles which had constituted the glory and strength of the State; that we were about to strike at the independence of the judiciary, and at everything which was great and glorious in our past history. And more, Sir. My friend from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) who advocates the plurality system, was one of the gentlemen who signed the minority report denying the constitutionality of this Convention, although I will do him the justice to say, that, off the floor of the House of Representatives at the time, he said he did not concur in that doctrine.

Now, in relation to this matter, I hope that this Convention, if it is to take any portion of this plurality doctrine, is to apply it where it is absolutely necessary to apply it, and nowhere else; that we are to stand by the majority system where we can get along well with that system. It would be difficult to send back a State officer to the people for reelection, and therefore, we provide another mode of election. We provide for the election of county and district officers, and senators, by the plurality system. But, Sir, the people of the towns can elect their town officers and representatives; and if necessary to do so, they can meet from day to day in order to do it. If there be any necessity for their having representatives here, they can govern themselves by that necessity.

If I had my wish, I would like to strike out the third resolution, altogether, and substitute the following in place of it:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to provide that in all elections of representatives to the general court, when no election is effected at the first trial, the meeting shall be adjourned from time to time until the meeting of the legislature for which the said representatives are to be chosen: provided, that no one adjournment shall be for a longer term than six days.

When it is in order, I propose to move that as a substitute for the third resolution, and to strike out the fourth resolution, altogether.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. I do not propose, Mr. President, to trespass upon the time of the Convention, at any length. I have not done so in regard to any of the great questions which have been agitated before it; but I wish to say a word or two upon one point. The gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) has, in part, anticipated what I intended to say. Gentlemen who have looked through the whole history of this question, will readily perceive what I mean, and the point which I wish them to consider.

The Report of the Committee on the basis for the House of Representatives was presented to this Convention, and defended by the chairman of the Committee, upon the principle of checks and balances, expressly and emphatically, basing his comments on a text from DeTocqueville, in which he proves that majorities are dangerous—that they might prove to be tyrannies, and therefore, he contended for municipal representation in order that they might be a check—upon what? Why, Sir, upon popular representation. So he then argued; and those who followed him have so argued throughout this whole debate, in favor of the representation of municipalities, because they say they want a check upon the masses in the cities, and the Convention has justified the arrangement on the ground of checks and balances. Yes, Sir, it has been said over and over again, that because the governor and Senate were chosen by the people directly, and on the municipal principle, that therefore you were justified in departing from that principle in regard to elections for the lower House. Sir, when was this argument presented? It was after you had discussed the question whether the supreme executive and the highest officers of the State should be chosen by a plurality or a majority, and had taken it away from before the Convention with a balance vote. And what is done in this Report? In case of the failure of the people to elect a governor, you have what you suppose to be a remedial process in the House of Representatives, and yet you have defended the basis of that House on the ground of a system of checks and balances. Sir, to have been consistent with the argument which has been taken as a groundwork of the basis of the House of Representatives, you should have given to the Senate jurisdiction in case of the failure to elect on the part of the people. Then you might have said that the House of Representatives must be submitted to, because it was an offset to the popular principle implied in the other two departments of the government.

If the Convention will allow me for a few moments, I will quote what was said upon this floor in defence of the town representation principle. The gentleman for Erving, in his remarks on this subject, read the following passage from DeTocqueville:—

“Unlimited power is in itself a bad and dangerous thing; human beings are not competent to exercise it with discretion, and God alone can be omnipotent, because His wisdom and His justice are always equal to His power. But no power upon earth is so worthy of honor for itself, or of reverential obedience to the rights which it represents, that I would consent to admit its uncontrolled, and all-predominant authority. When I see that the right, and the means of absolute command are conferred upon a people or upon a king, upon an aristocracy or a democracy, a monarchy or a republic, I recognize the germ of tyranny, and I journey onward to a land of more hopeful institutions.”

That is the text. Now we have the comment of the chairman of the Committee, which has been carried out and amplified in a number of lectures since. He proceeds:—

“This great writer, who seems to have reflected profoundly upon the workings of our institutions, says, that it is not safe to put power into the hands of an uncontrolled majority, in the sense in which it would be if the district system prevails. You must have a system of checks for this great majority of numbers. And this brings me to my last reason in favor of this system, which is the doctrine of checks and balances."

Monday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY, &c. — BRADBURY — HALLETT — HALE.

[July 18th.

What is the proposition here? Why, we propose to elect the governor and council in single districts, directly by the people. We propose also to elect the Senate by the people, in single senatorial districts; and then we propose to elect the House of Representatives by towns, varying the system so far as towns are concerned, by basing it, to a certain extent, upon population; and these features, taken together, will, I apprehend, make the most perfect system of checks and balances that you can have. The people will be represented in the Senate of Massachusetts, and no measure can be passed or defeated in that body, which a majority of the people either dislike or approve. They will be potential in that branch of the legislature, and as they elect the governor directly, he will also represent the whole people. There is the security for the people of the Commonwealth. Then, if you base your House of Representatives upon towns, mixing with it the population basis, so far as it is practicable, you will have, in one representative from each town, a check upon centralization, and also a check upon the other branches of the government, so that it will be on the whole a very safe and practicable system of government.

Sir, this has been the doctrine, in various forms, advanced in this House, for the defence of the right of town corporate representation, and as justifying a departure from the popular principle.

And now we have here, a proposition before us, which is almost certain to transfer, in a majority of cases, the election of governor somewhere else. And what has been done? What was required to be done, in good faith, after this declaration of doctrine? What was the duty of a majority of this Convention, after holding forth this doctrine? Was it to send the election of governor to the House of Representatives in the first instance? No, Sir. In consistency with their principles, as declared here solemnly and repeatedly, it was their duty to place the remedy where the people would exert that remedy. But what are the facts? Why, we have, in the basis of the House of Representatives, as wide a departure from the numerical principle, as the one prepared and defended by the chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Griswold,) when his remarks were made, from which I have already quoted. We have a basis which gives, in the beginning, now, a majority of the House of Representatives to one-third of the people of Massachusetts. You have established, by adopting the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell thirty minutes before you were stopped from saying a word upon the subject, a principle which qualifies and moulds the basis of the House of Representatives—which moulds, and shapes, and transforms it more than any man in this Convention could tell, in the time allowed him, unless he is a mathematician beyond any precedent we have ever had. There are gentlemen who probably did know it, but I say to those who had not examined it, that no man can tell what effect the proposition will produce. What will it produce? It does not alter the House for the first ten years, but it allows one-third of the people to hold a majority in the House of Representatives. In 1860, according to the ratio used in the pamphlet prepared by the ex-secretary of state, the member from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) and which is a perfectly safe ratio to use—(I wish to say that here, because it has been often said that the future is all an uncertainty, but I do not so consider it, for Massachusetts is an exception to the general rule that ratios of increase diminish after a state reaches a certain number of inhabitants. Her ratio is an ascending one, and, therefore, the report to which I have alluded is perfectly safe upon which to base our calculations)—in 1860, I say, the growing towns will have more than their specified number, by these tables, because their increase will be by an increasing ratio. The rule is, that after a state has grown to a certain degree, its farther increase is by a descending ratio; but Massachusetts is an exception to that rule. If that conclusion is right, one-third part of the people of Massachusetts will make the governor, if the people fail to elect him now. In 1860, one-quarter part of the people of the Commonwealth will make the governor, if the people fail to elect him. In 1870, one-fifth part of the people will make him, if the people fail of an election.

Well, Sir, we had an implied, if not an express pledge, in the arguments of those who prepared this basis, that there should be, in good faith, a system of checks and balances; but instead of that, we have a system proposed which throws away the rightful expectations of all, and throws into the House of Representatives the power to make a governor when the people fail to elect him.

Mr. OLIVER, of Lawrence. I move that the Orders of the Day be laid upon the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. HALLETT. There is a subject upon the calendar which, I think, may be disposed of this evening. It stands in the list of unfinished business, and is document number seventy-five of the Convention, relating to the subject of Amendments to the Constitution. I move that the Convention resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon that subject.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Wood, of Fitchburg, in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the matter referred to.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question which was pending at the time the Convention was last in Committee of the Whole upon the same subject, to be the motion of the gentleman from Bridgewater, (Mr. Hale,) to strike out the second resolve, which is as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient farther to provide in the Constitution, that, whenever the legislature shall fail to submit to the people, at the periods designated in the foregoing resolve, the question of calling a Convention for the purposes indicated therein, the qualified voters in State elections, in the several cities and towns, may, at the next general election thereafter, and upon notice of such failure by the Secretary of the Commonwealth, whose duty it shall be to issue such notice, proceed to vote upon said question as though it had been propounded by the legislature; and if, upon a return to the governor and council, of the vote so given, it shall appear that a majority have voted in favor of the proposition, the governor shall forthwith issue his proclamation, calling upon the voters of said cities and towns, at meetings legally warned for that purpose, to elect delegates to such Convention; the time and place for holding its session, being expressed therein.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham, proposed to amend, by inserting the following as a substitute for all the resolves:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution, that a Convention to revise or amend this Constitution may be called and held in the following manner: At the general election which shall be in the year eighteen hundred and seventy three, and in each twentieth year thereafter, the qualified voters in State elections shall give in their votes, to be received, counted, returned and declared, in the same manner as by law is provided in the choice of general officers at such election, upon the question: "Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution in conformity to the provisions of the Act of 1852, chapter 188, relating to the calling a Convention of Delegates of the people for the purpose of revising the Constitution?" and if it shall appear, by the returns made, that a majority of the qualified voters throughout the State, who shall assemble and vote thereon, are in favor of such revision, the same shall be deemed and taken to be the will of the people of the Commonwealth, that a Convention should meet accordingly; and thereupon delegates shall be chosen on the first Monday of March next succeeding, and such delegates shall meet in Convention in the State House on the first Wednesday of May succeeding, in the same manner and with the same authority as is provided in the second, third, and fourth sections of said Act.

The general court shall have power and authority in any year other than the year above specified, to submit to the people the same proposition, to be voted on in the same manner, at the next ensuing general election; and if it shall appear by the returns made, that a majority of the qualified voters throughout the State, who shall assemble and vote thereon, are in favor of such revision, the same shall be deemed and taken to be the will of the people of the Commonwealth, that a Convention should meet accordingly; and thereupon the same proceedings, with the same powers and authority, shall be had, as is provided in the foregoing clause of this Constitution.

The foregoing provisions, shall in no wise restrain or impair the reserved right of the people, in their sovereign capacity, at all times, to reform, alter, or totally change their Constitution and frame of government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Bridgewater, (Mr. Hale,) has precedence of the amendment of the gentleman from Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) and that the latter amendment will be in order after the question shall have been taken upon the first motion to strike out the second section of the resolves.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. The object I desired to accomplish, when I made the motion to strike out the second resolve, was explained at the time. The motion made by the gentleman for Wilbraham seems to be an entire new proposition, and one which seems to me to require very grave consideration before it shall be adopted by this Convention. By simply hearing it read, it appears to me, that there are provisions there

Monday,]

AMENDMENTS. — HALE — HALLETT.

[July 18th.

which we should be very cautious about adopting, and therefore, as the amendment proposed by the gentleman for Wilbraham has not been printed, and as the members of the Committee have had no time or opportunity to examine its details, I would suggest that the Committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, in order that the proposition of the gentleman for Wilbraham may, in the meantime, be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that if the gentleman from Bridgewater should withdraw my motion, until I know something more about the amendment of the gentleman for Wilbraham, and my object is to give the gentleman time to have his amendment printed.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. I do not wish to withdraw my motion, until I know something more about the amendment of the gentleman for Wilbraham, and my object is to give the gentleman time to have his amendment printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman to move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again?

Mr. HALE. I made that motion.

Mr. HALLETT. I think there is no difficulty in the Committee's understanding this proposition now. My proposition does not essentially vary the import of the Report of the Committee as contained in the second resolve. It is only intended to carry out the intention of that Report, as I think, more definitely and distinctly. I hope, therefore, as the gentleman from Bridgewater desires it, that the question will be taken upon his motion, and then we can proceed to the discussion of this amendment, and we have time to explain and understand it; and if I can have time for a brief explanation, there is no necessity for having it printed.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman for Wilbraham is to incorporate into the Constitution the details of the Act of 1852, concerning which there is so much difference of opinion in this Convention, and out of it; and I, for one, am not willing, with so much haste, to incorporate it into the Constitution, and I think we had better take time to examine and look into it.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. Hale, that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; and it was decided in the negative—yeas, 28; noes, 76.

So the Committee refused to rise.

The question was then taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Bridgewater, (Mr. Hale,) to strike out the second resolve, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the second resolve was stricken out.

Mr. HALLETT then renewed his motion to amend, by substituting the proposition which he had submitted for the resolves reported by the Committee.

Mr. HALLETT. I desire very briefly to explain the proposition I have just offered. In all its leading characteristics, it conforms to the Report of the Committee, except that it does not put the Convention in the power of the legislature. It provides with more caution, as I think, for carrying out the object designed by the Committee in their Report. That Report embraces three distinct propositions.

First, that periodical Conventions may be called for revising the Constitution every twentieth year. We desire that that shall be done by a law—a constitutional and fundamental law—which shall execute itself, so that the people hereafter shall have no occasion to be dependent upon the legislature for its action, and so as to avoid the possibility of the people and the legislature coming in conflict with each other upon the subject.

The second provision is, that the legislature shall have power to submit a proposition for a Convention to the people at other times than at these stated periods. Many believe that under the present Constitution, the legislature has not that power. I believe it has not. We want now to place the provision in a form which cannot be mistaken; and farther than that, when the legislature submits such a proposition to the people, and it is adopted by the people, we want that it shall become the will of the people, requiring no subsequent action upon the part of the legislature, and subject to no repeal by another legislature of different party politics.

Thirdly, we desire, behind and beyond this, to reserve to the people the right to alter and amend their fundamental law, whenever they think proper, in the exercise of their sovereignty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no delegate to this Convention, holding the republican doctrine of the right of the people to control their own government, who will not say that these propositions are right. The only question for us to determine, then; is, does the proposed amendment carry them into practical effect? I have given the subject a good deal of examination; and more than that, I have consulted with many members of the Convention relative to this proposition, and I think it will meet the enlightened and deliberate judgment of a majority of the Convention; I am also happy to say that the proposition meets the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee (Mr. Nayson) which reported the resolutions now under consideration.

Now, then, I will briefly refer to the details of this proposition to see if it meets my object, and the object which we all have in view. It is substantially the same proposition as that embraced in the Constitution of 1780, which provided for calling a Convention in fifteen years after its adoption. The only difficulty in relation to that proposition was, that it required action upon the part of the legislature to call the Convention and prescribe its powers. It failed of its object because, when the fifteen years had expired, the legislature either took no action, or took such action that the Convention failed to be called. It required a two-thirds vote, which defeats it of course; and ever since that failure, the people have been taunted and told that when that Convention failed to be called, they lost their right to amend their Constitution in any other way except by such amendments as the legislature chose, from time to time, to submit to them. Hence, it is important, in the new Constitution, to avoid that difficulty which was met with in revising the Constitution of 1780. And what is the provision before us? It declares that the question "Shall there be a Convention?" shall, in 1875, and in every twentieth year thereafter, be voted upon by the people, at the annual election, at which time the qualified voters in State elections of the cities and towns of the Commonwealth shall give in their votes, to be received, returned, and declared in the same manner as is by law provided in the election of general officers.

By this provision, it follows, if there are any selectmen in towns, or any inspectors in cities, to return votes, in short, if there is any law by which votes are to be received in general elections—by which they are to be returned, counted, and declared, then that law applies to this mode of voting upon the question, so that every citizen who has the right to vote in State elections, may go into the town meeting, in every one of these twentieth years and deposit a vote upon the question—yea or nay. Of course, these votes of "Convention," or "No Convention," will be provided, if there is any call for them, and every voter may give in his vote, yea or nay. If a majority of the votes in the Commonwealth are in favor of a Convention to revise the Constitution, after the manner of the act of 1852, then that shall be construed as the will of the people. The Act of 1852, has in fact, become the uniform mode of holding Conventions. It is the same as that of 1820, by which the Convention of 1820 was called. These acts embody all necessary details, and are generally understood and approved of, so far as the direct act of calling and holding a Convention is concerned. They are almost verbatim the same, and it has become almost a common law mode of proceeding, by which Conventions shall be called. Then, if the majority of the people say "Yes," what follows? Why, this Act shall be taken to be the will of the people, and the Convention shall be called accordingly. And thereupon the people will proceed, on the first Monday in March following, under the forms of law governing elections, in all the towns, to choose delegates to represent them in a Constitutional Convention. You require no action upon the part of the legislature, from first to last. You have got your law here, which, if accepted by the people, is to be the declared will of the people, and must be carried into effect accordingly. The selectmen in the towns, and the inspectors in the cities, must call the meetings, or be liable to penalties. They must receive the votes for delegates, who are to be chosen to meet at the State House, on the first Wednesday of May, following. Thus you will have the whole process and form of law for calling a Convention, provided for in the Constitution, so that no act of the legislature will be required to call it, and no alteration or repeal can be made by any subsequent legislature. I think, therefore, that this provision is complete, so far as the holding of a Convention every twenty years is concerned.

But, if the people do not desire to have a Convention, then the nays will have the majority when the vote is taken upon the question. That vote will be proclaimed, and that will be the end of it. I cannot see what other provisions are needed for holding these periodical elections. The Act of 1852 becomes a Convention law, just so far as it is applicable to the year the Convention is held.

The second proposition relates to the power of the legislature for submitting the question of calling a Convention at times other than at these specified periods. I want that the legislature should have express power to do it, and I want that power should be put in the Constitution; because, I trust that hereafter we shall have no powers exercised by the legislature which are not in the Constitution. And what is this provision? It is that the general court shall have power and authority in any year between these specified periods, to submit the same question to the people, to be voted on in the same manner, and the returns to be received and declared in the same manner as is provided for in the case of the pe-

Monday.]

AMENDMENTS. — HALLETT — GILES.

[July 18th.]

ridical elections. And if a majority of the people are in favor of calling a Convention, the same proceedings are to be had as are provided for in the first clause of this amendment.

Now, what is the effect of that? The legislature at any time, may vote to submit the question to the people: "Shall a Convention be called according to the Act of 1852?" The people vote upon that question in the several cities and towns—these votes are returned, counted and declared, and if there is a majority in favor of calling a Convention, then the people proceed on the first Monday in March to elect their delegates, who shall assemble in the State House on the first Wednesday of May following, in the same manner and with the same powers as is provided in the 2d, 3d and 4th sections of the Act of 1852. No subsequent act upon the part of the legislature is required, and no subsequent act can change or defeat the expressed will of the people. The legislature, simply by an act of theirs, submit the question to the people, and if the people vote, a majority of them, in favor of the Convention, the matter is then beyond the control of the legislature; and no action of theirs can affect it. I think these two propositions will cover, substantially, any case that may arise, because if a majority of the people want a Convention, they will have a majority of delegates in the legislature who will vote to submit the question to the people.

But, still, there may an extreme case arise, when the people will desire to call a Convention outside of any provision upon the part of the legislature. When more than the voters, the whole community may claim to act. And this third clause provides for that extremity. It is an extreme case, and I can hardly see how it could ever occur under our system of government. But still, if the legislature should come to represent the minority of the people, they might refuse to submit the question when a majority of the people desired it, or the whole people might demand a different basis for a Convention. But even in this case, if the people could have a Convention once in twenty years, I think they would sooner wait for the return of the regular period, when the question must, as a matter of necessity, be before them, than to take the matter into their own hands. But then, I want that they should have the right of amending their Constitution at all times, without a revolution; and therefore it is proper to make a provision which shall reserve to them that right, which the Bill of Rights declares they should have, to reform and alter their Constitution; and this is put in form, to prevent any construction of the courts against that great popular right.

The whole proposition, taken together, guards the process by which the people can act in enforcing that right without being dependent on the legislature to move first, and thus it carries out that view and enforces, in the most practical manner that can be done in the Constitution, the admirable doctrine which was laid down at a very early period in this excellent work which I hold in my hand, and from which I have read very often in this Convention. It is a very remarkable book. It was published in 1775, by Robert Bell, of Philadelphia, under the direct patronage of Washington, Franklin, Hancock, Jefferson, and all the great revolutionary statesmen of that day, for the purpose of imbuing the people of this country with right opinions of constitutional liberty. It is the very book that was quoted from by Dr. John Warren when he delivered his oration on the fourth of July, 1783, that being the first fourth of July oration ever delivered in Boston. The book is entitled "BURGH'S POLITICAL DISQUISITIONS;" and I must again ask the attention of the Committee to one or two passages which I quoted on a former occasion. He says, p. 456, of vol. iii. :—

"As the people are the fountain of power, and object of government, so are they the last resource when governors betray their trust. And happy is that people, who have originally so principled their Constitution, they themselves can, without violence to it, lay hold of its power, wield it as they please, and turn it, when necessary, against those to whom it was intrusted, and who have exerted it to the prejudice of its original proprietors."

Again, he says :—

"In planning a government, by representation, the people ought to provide against their own annihilation. They ought to establish a regular and constitutional method of acting, by and from themselves, without, or even in opposition to their representatives, if necessary!"

Now, Sir, that is a lesson for us. It is precisely the point to which I think these resolutions should be carried, and embodied in the Constitution, so as to enable the people to alter and amend their Constitution without ever coming in conflict with their own government, under any circumstances. Such instances of conflict have occurred in other States; and it is known to this Convention, that during the early period of its session, we were told that the Convention was entirely at the mercy of the legislature, which could, at any moment, by repealing the Act under which it was called, render its session unlawful. I therefore hope we shall provide, in the new Constitution, against any such possible emergencies, or conflicts, and remove all the doubts and denials of the lawyers as to how we are to collect the will of the people without the consent of the legislature. And we should adopt this, not only as a great popular measure, but also as a conservative measure, a peaceful measure for reforms and changes in government, by the popular will, without danger, and without the necessity of resorting to physical revolution. That is my sole purpose, and if it can be secured in this mode, or in any other which shall be found adequate to the purpose, I, shall be satisfied that the great and inherent will of the people, which is now denied to them by courts and lawyers, has been affirmed.

Mr. GILES, of Boston. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) because I said the other day that I agreed with him in reference to this subject. I have seen the amendment now before us, and the only objection I have to it is its length and complexity, which I fear will impede its adoption, if not defeat it entirely.

The difficulty in incorporating a Convention law into the Constitution is, that if it goes into specific provisions, it is too long; and more than that, it undertakes to settle details which should be left to posterity. I agree with the gentleman for Wilbraham, and I believe he agrees with me, that we do not wish to say in the Constitution that it shall be constitutional to violate the Constitution; nor do we wish to say that it shall be legal to violate law. When a revolution comes, basing itself upon the right of revolution, it will declare itself, and needs no declaration from us beforehand. What we wish is, to secure to the people the right of amending their Constitution whenever they see proper; so that when they declare their will to that end, no hostile legislature shall ever have the power to come in and balk them in their purpose. And when I say the will of the people, I mean that will legally expressed. I mean the people in the legislature, otherwise the people in the towns at one end of the State might vote for one proposition, and those at the other end for another, and their votes would bind nobody. What I want is, the will of the people in the legal sense; that the popular voice, constitutionally expressed, shall be considered and recognized as obligatory. I want it to have "free course, to run and be glorified;" I speak it with deference.

Now, I should be content with this first resolution. In fact, I should prefer the first resolution, with an addition which I shall read for information, and which, at a proper time, I propose to offer. I shall be willing to strike out the second and third resolutions entirely. The language of the first is a little objectionable, but I take it the Committee on Revision, will take care of that. I say, then, that I should rather prefer the first resolution, with this addition :—

And the right of the people at all times to amend that constitution of government, by Convention or otherwise, according to their will, legally expressed, shall never be restrained or obstructed in this Commonwealth.

It seems to me that this will secure all that is necessary for us to secure in the Constitution. It will provide, that when the people have signified their will, the legislature shall not obstruct or restrain that will; but on the contrary, that they shall promote and assist in carrying it into execution. So that, if the people have willed a Convention, and in the mean time the State House should burn down, it would be the duty of the legislature, if in session, to provide another place for the meeting of the Convention. Or if any other unforeseen event should intervene to render legislation necessary, the legislature, if in session, should perform it with a view to carry out the will of the people. I will go any length to secure that object. If it should be thought advisable to go farther than that first resolution, with the addition I have indicated, and have a Convention Act incorporated into the Constitution, you must do one of two things: You must either adopt, as a part of your resolution, the Convention Act of 1852,—which is the same as that of 1819,—and entail that for substance and detail upon posterity, whether it will suit or not, or you must depend upon the intervention of the legislature.

I have drawn up a Convention Act, which I should prefer, if the Committee would go that length, as a substitute for the one offered by my friend for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) for the reason that, instead of calling upon the people to vote whether they want a Convention, and then to vote for delegates to that Convention, or depending upon future legislation, or incorporating existing law into the Constitution, it will secure

Monday,]

AMENDMENTS. — CHURCHILL — ASPINWALL — WILSON.

[July 18th.

a Convention once in twenty years. I will read it for the information of the Committee, and as a part of my remarks :—

Resolved, That the qualified voters in State elections, in the several cities and towns, shall, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and as much oftener as shall be required by law, elect Convention Delegates, in conformity with the law then in force for the election of representatives; and the delegates so elected shall meet at the State House on the first Wednesday of May next after said election, and when organized, with not less than one hundred members as a quorum for the transaction of business, may consider, and adopt, and submit to the people for their ratification, such amendments of the Constitution, as shall be deemed best; and the right of the people, at all times, to amend their constitution of government, by Convention, or otherwise, according to their will legally expressed, shall never be restrained or obstructed in this Commonwealth.

Mr. CHURCHILL, of Milton. I am opposed to the proposition which has been submitted to us upon this subject, because I see no good reason or sense in it. It seems to me it is an attempt to foresee, for fifteen or twenty years, when the people of this Commonwealth will need and require a Convention to reform their Constitution, which we had better leave to the people themselves. I contend that we should leave the matter as it stands in the Bill of Rights, and upon the precedent set in calling this Convention. The Bill of Rights declares nearly all that the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Giles,) who has just taken his seat, has embraced in his proposition, and the precedent cited for calling this Convention will enable the people hereafter, when they desire a Convention, to demand of the legislature that they shall pass an act for that purpose. It seems to me that such a proposition as this is nothing more or less than subjecting this subject of calling a Convention to the decision of political parties, and the party which is dissatisfied with the operation of the Constitution, will be perpetually submitting a proposition for calling a fresh Convention. I think the people hereafter will be able to settle better than we can, when they need a Convention; and when they need it, they have a precedent and Bill of Rights, to which they can resort.

I move that the subject be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. The proposition made by the delegate for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) is rather a lengthy one.

Mr. ASPINWALL, of Brookline. I rise to a question of order. I suggest that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. OTIS, of Sumner. I move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. WILSON. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Natick has the floor. The gentleman from Brookline rises to a point of order, but the Chair cannot see how that can be properly made at the present time. Therefore, the gentleman from Natick will proceed.

Mr. ASPINWALL. Will the Chair allow me to suggest that the Committee cannot sit if there is no quorum present?

The CHAIRMAN. How are we to ascertain that fact?

Mr. ASPINWALL. By a count taken by the moderators. That is the way it is done in the House of Commons, or any other legislative body.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion, that while the gentleman from Natick is occupying the floor, that a motion for a count is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, very strange, that gentlemen who are daily and hourly pressing upon the Convention the importance of closing our labors here, should find it convenient to themselves to be absent so much of the time. Some of us are left here, however. I suppose those who are here at this hour, are governed by a sense of public duty in remaining; and, therefore, we had better proceed to do the business before us. The proposition made by the delegate for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) is a lengthy one, and therefore we cannot fully comprehend it, unless it be printed, and we have an opportunity to examine it. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Giles,) has already presented another proposition. It seems to me, that a plain, clear, and distinct proposition, can be prepared, and incorporated into our amended Constitution, providing for future amendments. Some gentlemen of the Convention think it unnecessary to have any such proposition inserted in the Constitution. I do not agree with these gentlemen, in that respect. Some gentlemen think that such a provision would be a limitation of the power of the people. I do not so understand it. In the debate upon the Berlin case, the judgment of this Convention was, that the people have a right to amend their Constitution without going to the legislature for authority so to do. Now, gentlemen propose to leave the Constitution, in this respect, precisely and exactly where it is at present. We know that nearly all the eminent lawyers of Massachusetts, believe that we are sitting here without any constitutional authority—that this Convention is an unconstitutional body. My friend for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) shakes his head, but does he not know that in the canvass of 1851, that, for party purposes, the judgment of the learned and distinguished gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Greenleaf,) and professor in the law school, who addressed the Convention the other day, was taken as an opinion, and that he declared the call for a Constitutional Convention was not constitutional? Another eminent lawyer of Boston, Mr. Charles G. Loring, a man whose opinions upon legal subjects are not surpassed by any other man, perhaps, in Massachusetts, gave it as his deliberate opinion, that the Act of the legislature calling this Convention, was an unconstitutional Act. The present governor of Massachusetts, in his address to the legislature, declared that Act to be of doubtful constitutionality. I know that some members of the existing supreme court, have expressed the opinion that the Act is unconstitutional. I know that Ex-Judge Wilde, who was for thirty years and upwards a member of the supreme court, has expressed that same opinion. And I say that four-fifths of the eminent Whig lawyers of Massachusetts, believe to-day, that we are sitting here in a body not called in accordance with the Constitution of Massachusetts. It was just so in 1820. The eminent legal gentlemen of that day denied the constitutionality of that Convention. I believe Judge Parker charged the grand jury upon the subject of that Convention. In the Convention of New York, held in 1821, Mr. Tallmadge, a leading man of that day in that Convention, declared that body to be unconstitutional. This question of the sovereignty of the people of this country, of their right to call Constitutional Conventions, from the origin of the government to the present time, has been denied by many eminent lawyers who have been called statesmen. The right of the people to call Constitutional Conventions, whenever and wherever they please, without the intervention of legislative bodies, has never yet been fully accepted by many of the eminent men of the legal profession of this country—men who borrow their ideas of our institutions from England, instead of fully comprehending the scope, genius, and spirit of our institutions. I believe it to be the duty of this Convention, to insert a provision in the Constitution for calling future Conventions, so that the people shall not depend upon the will of the legislature, and so that no future professors of Harvard University, no future judges of the supreme court, no future governors of Massachusetts, no future attorney-generals of Massachusetts, shall ever doubt the constitutionality of a Convention of the people of Massachusetts. In my judgment, we should incorporate a provision of that character into the Constitution, to give the people an opportunity of holding Conventions hereafter, without coming to the legislature and asking leave to hold such Conventions. I maintain, that the people of this State have a right to order a Constitutional Convention, whether the legislature give them that power or not. That is the American doctrine upon this subject. When the present provisions of the Constitution are so interpreted, and interpreted too by learned men, and whose opinions, in my judgment, lost us the Convention in 1851,—for these opinions of Professor Greenleaf, and Charles G. Loring, and other eminent legal gentlemen, were spread broadcast over the State, as election documents,—I say it is our duty to incorporate such a provision into the Constitution, that hereafter the question of the constitutionality of a Convention for revising the Constitution, shall never be raised upon the soil of Massachusetts by any lawyer or public man. A provision of that character, can be framed and adopted by this body. It does not seem to me, that it should be a lengthy proposition, and it may be brief and comprehensive. Such a provision is incorporated in the Constitutions of nearly every State of the Union. Gentlemen tell us it is only a restriction upon the rights of the people. Theoretically it may be so, but practically it is not so. Therefore, I wish to see a provision of that character incorporated into the Constitution, and if this Convention adjourns without doing that, I believe we shall be false to our obligations here; and you must expect, when the question is hereafter raised, that you will have professors at Cambridge consulted, and you will have a committee of the Senate and House of Representatives following the example of the minority committee of 1852, who declared that it was unconstitutional to have such a Convention. I have not the report of that minority committee before me, but they reported that the Act calling such Convention was unconstitutional. Such was the judgment of the great mass of the Whig party of this State, declared before the people in public assemblies, and declared through the columns of the press. The Daily Advertiser,

Tuesday.]

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS, &c. — HOBBS — GRISWOLD — BRIGGS — WILSON — SCHOULER.

[July 19th.]

and other leading journals of this city, advocated the repeal of that Act, as an unconstitutional Act, after the legislature came together, and after the governor had declared it to be of doubtful constitutionality. The gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker,) came into this Convention and declared that he believed the Act was constitutional, but he thought that the legislature had a right to repeal it, and turn us all out of doors. I do not believe in this doctrine. I desire to see placed in the Constitution a plain and clear provision upon this subject. I do not wish to see the legislature of this State amending the Constitution; and I trust that that great work will be left hereafter to the agents of the people, chosen for that express purpose.

On motion of Mr. BREED, of Lynn, the Committee rose, and the President having resumed the chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The Committee, by their chairman, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the propositions submitted by Messrs. Hallett and Giles, as substitutes for the resolves reported by the Committee on future amendments to the Constitution, were ordered to be printed.

The Convention then, on motion, at seven o'clock, adjourned until to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock.

TUESDAY, July 19, 1853.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment. Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Delegate from Concord.

Mr. HOBBS, of Weston, presented the credentials of Mr. CHARLES C. HAZEWELL, elected a delegate from Concord, in place of Mr. Gourgas, deceased, which were received, and the delegate took his seat.

Report from a Committee.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving, from the Committee on the House of Representatives, reported that it was inexpedient to act upon the subject of an order of May 25th, concerning the expediency of providing that towns and districts may have the right to be represented by any citizens of the Commonwealth.

The Report was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Compensation of Members.

The order submitted yesterday by Mr. Wilson, of Natick, being the first item on the Orders of the Day, was taken up for consideration.

It was read, as follows:—

Ordered, That the Committee on the Pay Roll be instructed to make up the same, including the day of final adjournment, allowing to each member pay only for his actual attendance, except in cases of sickness.

The question being on the adoption of the order.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, said he would like to be informed how the mover of this order intended that it should apply in the case of those members who were absent a part of Saturday and a part of Monday. He would like to hear the gentleman explain what he means by a day's attendance. I do not, continued Mr. Briggs, intend to take up any time in talking about this matter, but it does seem to me that the proposition should not be adopted.

There is necessarily a very great inequality in regard to the attendance of members here. The record shows that about one-half of the members of this Convention live at their own homes, and that they go home each evening and have some opportunity to attend to their business, while those who live farther have not that privilege. Some who live at a distance go home every Saturday and return on Monday. If, then, such a rule as this be stringently applied, it will cut off a large part of the compensation of those who are so situated. It appears to me there should be a little more liberality in matters of this kind. I speak in behalf of those members who live away from their homes as well as myself, and whose only opportunity to go home is to take a part of Saturday for that purpose, and a part of Monday to return. So far as I am concerned, I shall have no hesitation in putting down in my charge for attendance, every day in the week, although I have been absent on Saturday and Monday. I should have no compunctions of conscience whatever on that score, the more especially if those gentlemen who go home every day, leaving this hall long before the adjournment in the evening, are entitled, under this order, to make a charge for such days' attendance. I merely wish to be informed in regard to this order what is to be its construction in this respect.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I can only say, Mr. President, that it appears to me that the Convention ought to adopt some such rule as this. I think that honesty and sound policy alike demand its adoption. What are the facts? The record will show that from the commencement of the session to the present time there have been at least a hundred members absent each day; one-fourth of the members of this Convention have been daily absent. That is about the average. Now, Sir, we have voted ourselves three dollars a day. This is a large increase over the pay of members of the legislature, and if we are to draw our pay while we are not here attending to our duties, twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars will be taken out of the public treasury, that have not been fairly earned. The gentleman from Pittsfield may think it unnecessary to adopt a resolution of this character, but I confess I view the matter differently. There has been a similar rule in the legislature, but what has been the action of gentlemen of the legislature, during the past year? I hold in my hand the record of the pay of the members of the last legislature, taken from the books of the treasury office, which shows that the last legislature must have taken out of the public treasury twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars that did not belong to them. There were two hundred and eighty-seven members at least; and from the pay roll it would appear that there was an average attendance of two hundred and eighty-four and a half, although every one knows that there were eighty or ninety members absent every day. Our record shows that one-quarter and recently one-third of the members of this Convention have not attended here daily.

Now I am one of those who believe, that the sense of public justice should be stronger than the instinct of public plunder. I am in favor of having our pay while we are here, attending to our duties; and, while we are at home, attending to our own private business, let us pay ourselves. I have not, myself, been absent from the Convention for a single hour, from the time of its first meeting until the present time. I have not been at home, because I cannot go home, while the Convention is in session, without absenting myself from some one or more of its sittings. And I feel it to be my duty to remain here, so long as the public business remains to be done. I think there is only one fair and honest way of dealing, in making up the pay roll. It is that members shall receive pay while attending to their duties, and not while absent. What I wish, is, that the Committee on the Pay Roll should see to it, that a proper reduction is made for absences, and that money be not paid where no service is rendered.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I have nothing to say in regard to this order, but I do wish to correct an erroneous impression that may go abroad, in regard to the last legislature taking twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars out of the public treasury which did not belong to them, as would appear to be the case, according to the testimony of the gentleman from Natick. It appears he has been down to the office of the Auditor, and found out that thirty thousand dollars have been taken out of the State treasury by the members of the last legislature, without any authority.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. SCHOULER. Yes, Sir. I think it requires explanation.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Boston, that when he undertakes to repeat a statement made by me, he ought at least to state it correctly. What I said was this: that in my judgment there were, as appeared by the record, eighty or ninety members of the last legislature absent daily; and, that being so, from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars must have been drawn from the treasury by members of that legislature, that had not been earned by them. That is what I said, and I am ready to stand by it.

Mr. SCHOULER. That is exactly what I said, or intended to say, that according to the gentleman's statement, twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars were taken out of the State treasury wrongfully. Now I do not know how it may be. I presume the figures of the gentleman are right, in regard to the attendance of members of the legislature. Every-body knows that they have a rule in the legislature—and there is a similar rule here—that every member shall keep an account of his own time, and make returns of his attendance to the Committee on the Pay Roll. And the custom has been, from time immemorial, I believe, for members to return quite as much time as the rule permitted, and this practice has not been confined to members of the last legislature. If the gentleman had only pursued the investigation, he would have found, that all legislatures, heretofore, have pursued the same course. Members think they are entitled to pay, whether here or not. I will state for myself, that I never did take a day's pay for a day on which I did not attend; but I am aware that members who have been absent attending to their own private business, and who have not been in attendance in the legislature more than half the time, have drawn more pay for the session than I have, although I had been present every day with the exception of two or three. I merely rose to correct an erroneous impression, that might naturally be entertained in view of the representation of the gentleman from Natick, in reference to the last legislature being culpable in this matter, more than former ones. I do not think there is any good grounds for making the distinction.

Tuesday.]

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS. — WILSON — HYDE — LIVERMORE — RANTOUL — BRIGGS.

[July 19th.

Mr. WILSON. I did not mean, Sir, to speak of the last legislature as being at all different from those which preceded it. But I have only examined in reference to that, and in my opinion the legislatures of the last six years, have pursued about the same course.

Mr. SCHOULER. That is what I want to get at. I do not wish that the last legislature should bear all the blame to which others are equally liable. I think each member ought to keep an account of his own time, and render a correct account to the Committee. Therefore, I see no necessity for this resolution.

Mr. HYDE, of Sturbridge. I think this resolution altogether unnecessary. Members will see that the twenty-seventh rule prescribes that every member shall keep an account of his own attendance and travel, and deliver the same to the Committee appointed to make up the Pay Roll, and on his failure so to do, he shall be omitted from the pay roll; and no member shall receive pay for any weekday on which he has not actually attended, except in case of sickness. It seems to me, therefore, that this order is wholly unnecessary; and for the purpose of saving time, I move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE. I will ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. HYDE. To accommodate my friend from Cambridge, I will withdraw it.

Mr. LIVERMORE. I came in just as my friend from Natick was administering either some advice, or a rebuke, to the Committee on the Pay Roll. I do not know why. I heard only the conclusion of his remarks, wherein he said he hoped the Committee would see to it that no member was paid for any day that he is not in attendance. Now, I do not know how the Committee on the Pay Roll is to know when every member is here, and when not here. Are they to go round and find out who are absent, and keep a record of the absentees? The Committee on the Pay Roll have agreed to send to each member a certificate to be signed by him, stating the time of his attendance and travel, in accordance with the rule that has just been read. Now, I do not know what more the Committee can do; they are not the keepers of the consciences of members of the Convention; and if gentlemen see proper to send in a false certificate, it is a matter which rests wholly with themselves, though I trust no such imputation will be made. I will add, that the Committee have decided not to insert any name upon the pay roll, unless accompanied by a certificate, signed by the member. I believe this has always been the custom.

Mr. RANTOUL, of Beverly. The gentleman from Boston has stated that the custom has been, from time immemorial, that members of the legislature charge for attendance when they are not actually in attendance. I must take the liberty of differing from the gentleman, and saying that within the memory of man, the custom has been different. I have had some experience in the legislature, upwards of twenty years ago, and I recollect very well that the custom then was, to make a deduction from the pay of a member when absent, attending to his own private business. The practice which the gentleman alludes to, as having prevailed from time immemorial, must certainly have grown up within the last twenty years.

Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln. I will move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Natick, so as to make it read, that members shall certify their attendance, agreeably to the twenty-seventh rule, under oath. I will remark, that I made a similar proposition in the last legislature, and I think it is one that it is very proper to adopt. Members ought not to be paid for attendance when not here attending to the public business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I wish simply to say, Sir, that the gentleman from Lincoln states the fact correctly, that he offered this proposition in the last legislature; and, Sir, I will add what he omitted to inform us of, that we voted it down almost unanimously. [A laugh.]

Mr. EDWARDS, of Southampton. I should like to move to amend, so that every member shall be obliged to state how many hours he has been here on successive days. If the gentleman will adopt that modification, and make ten hours constitute a day's work, I shall be willing to go for it. I have attended, each day, until the close of the proceedings, but I have noticed that there are gentlemen who, after five o'clock, each day, absent themselves. We cannot equalize the matter. Some gentlemen have attended one hour, and others have attended closely to business until the close of the sessions each day.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say, in regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lincoln, that I can see no necessity for its adoption; on the contrary, I do not see how it can be adopted, and carried out. I take it, that the gentlemen who have not attended the sittings of the Convention every day, will find it very difficult to make up a statement of their attendance, under oath. They ought not to be required to do anything of the kind. All that can be expected of members of this Convention, who have not been able to be here daily, is this: that in making up their account, they should endeavor to deal fairly and honestly with the Commonwealth, and to deduct those days on which they think, or have reason to know, that they have been unable to attend here. Now, the gentleman says we have a rule of that character; so we have, and have had during the last six or eight years, but we have not acted up to it. It has not been at all operative. I do not know that it will be of any avail if we pass this, but we had better adopt it, nevertheless, and act up to it, if we can. As to the rule in the legislature, it is a mere matter of form. No attention is paid to it. In 1841 and 1842, it was the practice to deduct the time when absent. Nearly all the members did it; but, during the last seven or eight years, it has grown into a practice to allow for attendance when members are not here. Now, Sir, I hope that the Convention will set the example of dealing fairly and honestly with the Commonwealth in this matter, and that, after voting three dollars a day, to each member, we shall not take out of the public treasury any more funds than are required to remunerate members for actual attendance. Here is a simple proposition, ordering the Committee to make up the pay roll according to the rule we have adopted, and I see no reason why it should be opposed. If it should be opposed, and voted down, it will surely be taken as an indication that we mean to pay ourselves for all the time, whether we have been absent, or whether we have been in attendance.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge, asked for the reading of the order.

It was accordingly read, by the Secretary.

Mr. LIVERMORE. It appears to me, Sir, that there is an incongruity in the phraseology of that order, for, as I understand it, it directs the Committee on the Pay Roll to make up the Committee on the Pay Roll. It strikes me, that that Committee has been made up for some time, and are ready to act.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not see the necessity for any such order as this. At the beginning of this session, this Convention prescribed a rule by which members have been drawing their pay for attendance, and it seems to me, that it is only necessary that the order should instruct the Committee to make up the pay roll; they will understand how to do it. I should like to have the sense of the Convention as to what we are to do in this matter. I stated, when up before, that if I occasionally went home on Saturday night, and returned on Monday, I should feel authorized and perfectly justified in putting those two days into my account for attendance, and if it is not right to do so, I should like to be so informed. If those members of the Convention, from the country, who come here and sit from nine o'clock in the morning until the hour of adjournment, day after day, making a quorum, when other gentlemen see fit to absent themselves, receiving pay for full attendance, I want to know if, when others run home on Saturday night and return on Monday morning, they are to have their allowance for attendance on those two days stricken out, while other gentlemen go home every night, leaving the Convention long before the hour of adjournment, and are absent from the session of the body three times as long as those who go home on Saturday, and return on Monday? I say, I should like the instruction of the Convention in regard to this question.

As to the matter of swearing, I have not sworn as yet, and I hope I shall not be compelled, at this late period of the session, to swear as our army did in Flanders. I desire, in good faith, to know how I am to act in this matter.

Mr. WILSON. I supposed it would be a very plain case, and one to be easily comprehended, that every gentleman, under this rule, will be allowed to make up his accounts according to his own judgment, and what he thinks is fair, honest and proper; and that there would be no trouble in the matter. I see no necessity for any objection being made to the passage of the order by my friend, on that account.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, as an experienced man in this matter, I should like to have my friend from Natick say, whether he thinks I would be doing right or wrong in claiming for attendance

Tuesday,]

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS, &c.—WILSON—LORD—KINSMAN—STEVENSON.

[July 19th.]

on those days. I ask him in good faith, as I know nothing about it from my own experience.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. Mr. President: In reply to the inquiries made by the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Gov. Briggs,) I have to say, that the order is plain and simple in its language; that the gentleman from Pittsfield, and every other member of the Convention, can readily comprehend it. The member from Pittsfield, and other members, in making up the number of days' attendance, must be guided by their own sense of public duty.

It is true, Mr. President, that the rule explicitly declares, that "No member shall receive pay for any weekday on which he has not actually attended, except in case of sickness." But, Sir, what does the rule amount to? It is practically a dead letter. It has been the rule of the House of Representatives for years, and it has been generally evaded—disregarded altogether. A few members have acted up to its requirements; but the members generally pay no regard to it, none whatever. Sir, I venture to say, that with that rule before them, the members of the last five legislatures, have taken more than $100,000 out of the treasury—never earned. Here to-day, on the floor of this Convention, I make this declaration, and no man here or elsewhere, can or will deny it.

Sir, I have been to the treasury department, and I have procured a statement of the pay roll of the last House of Representatives. That House consisted of two hundred and eighty-seven members; two hundred and forty-three of those members drew pay for every day's attendance; leaving only forty-four members who made any deduction for absent days. The average attendance during the session—by the standard of the pay roll—was two hundred and eighty-four and one-half daily, making only two and one-half absences daily. Now, Sir, every man knows, who has any knowledge of the last House of Representatives, that the daily absences amounted, in that body of two hundred and eighty-seven members, to at least, eighty-seven members. I venture to say, that the daily average attendance of the House did not exceed two hundred members. Yet, if we are to take the pay roll as the evidence of attendance, the actual daily attendance averaged two hundred eighty-four and one-half. Is this right? Is it an evidence of public integrity? Not less than $20,000 were taken out of the public treasury by the members of the last legislature, which were never earned; money taken out of the public treasury, in violation of the rules of the House; rules made by the members for their own government.

Mr. President: I wish to be distinctly understood. I do not mean to say, that the members of the last House of Representatives were more remiss in their attendance than were the members of the legislatures of the two preceding years. Neither do I wish to give the impression that they took more money from the public treasury—which they had never earned—than did the members of preceding legislatures. I have not taken time to examine the pay rolls of those legislatures. I take the last legislature as an example of the loose way the accounts of members are now made up. It is time to put a stop to this mode of settling accounts—to this manner of squandering the public money. It is bad enough for members to neglect the duties assigned them here, to attend to their own private affairs, without at the same time drawing pay for services rendered—not to the public—but to themselves.

This Convention, Mr. President, owes it to its own reputation, to honesty, to a sense of public duty, to enforce its own rule, which declares that "No member shall receive pay for any weekday on which he has not actually attended, except for sickness." This Convention, called here to revise the organic law of this old Puritan Commonwealth, should set to future legislatures, who are to assemble under the revised Constitution, an example of inflexible integrity. The members of this Convention should deduct the days they have been absent, unless those days were days of sickness.

Sir, the adoption of this order will be deemed, and taken, by the members, to be a declaration that the members are required to obey the rule, which requires them to deduct from their account the days they have not attended. If this order is not adopted, the members will take it to be the sense of the Convention, that the rule is to be considered in the Convention as it has been considered in the legislature, a dead letter. I have performed my duty, as a member of the Convention, by proposing this order, which if adopted and obeyed, will secure to the treasury, at least, $25,000. There are four hundred and nineteen members of the Convention. The average daily attendance has not, I venture to say,—and I have some right to speak, for I have not been absent half an hour during the session,—exceeded three hundred, making about one hundred and twenty absences, daily. There should be deducted, at least, $25,000 from the pay roll of the Convention, for non-attendance.

Mr. President: We have voted to pay ourselves three dollars per day. I gave my vote for that resolve with a great deal of hesitation and reluctance. Gentlemen were called here during the busiest portion of the year; called from their farms and business avocations; called here at a pecuniary sacrifice. Compelled to work here from six to nine hours, daily, in mid-summer, I felt that those gentlemen who were here, away from their homes, ought to have that sum, and I voted for it against my own personal wishes and feelings. Having voted for the liberal sum of three dollars per day, I hope we shall all of us join in an effort to require the pay roll to be made up so that members will not draw from the treasury three dollars per day to which they have no claim—which they are forbidden to touch by their own rule, if enforced, as I hope it will be.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I desire to inquire as a question of order, whether this resolution can be entertained without a suspension of the rules. The twenty-seventh rule provides that members shall have pay for Sundays; this order excludes that and consequently is a violation of that standing rule. I desire to know if such an order can be entertained while the rule I have mentioned is in force.

The PRESIDENT. The question suggested by the gentleman from Salem is a question of consistency. The gentleman may object to this order as being inconsistent with the existing rule, which fact, it will be for the Convention to determine, and not for the Chair to decide. It is a matter wholly within the province of the Convention.

Mr. LORD. I had supposed that if it is proposed to do something that is contrary to what our rules require, it would be the duty of the President to decide how far it is permissible. The rule requires members to certify their attendance, including Sundays; this order requires that that day shall be excepted. I do not believe it is of any consequence, however, and I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

The question was taken on agreeing to the motion, and it was, upon a division—ayes, 137; noes, 44—decided in the affirmative.

Limitation of Debate.

The following order, submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Medway, (Mr. Brown,) was taken up for consideration:—

Ordered, That no member, except the chairmen of committees, shall speak upon any subject more than fifteen minutes, without leave.

Mr. KINSMAN, of Newburyport. I see no propriety, Mr. President, in passing such an order as this, and I can conceive of no reason why a distinction should be made between the chairmen of committees and others. As every one knows, there is a minority in this Convention, who have to content themselves merely with the right to speak and protest; and though it is a poor privilege, especially on a subject of importance, it is one they ought to enjoy, and which ought to be secured to them.

Now, what does this order do. It deprives them of the right of speaking more than fifteen minutes, and gives the prevailing party, in addition to the power they have already to control the whole action of the Convention by their votes, the right to occupy a whole hour in speaking, because the chairmen of the committees, according to parliamentary usage, are always of the predominant party. I do not make these remarks because I desire to speak, but it seems to me that the effect of the order will be to abridge the right which belongs to the minority to be heard, and to debate all subjects fully, and that therefore it ought not to pass.

Mr. ASPINWALL, of Brookline, moved to strike out the words "except the chairmen of committees."

Mr. STEVENSON, of Boston. I hope the amendment will prevail, if the Convention have any intention of passing such an order as this; but I am free to say that we shall hardly be able to determine, at present, how many matters there are on the Orders of the Day which will be affected by the adoption of an order like this, which puts it out of the power of those who are opposed to the propositions to discuss them fully. If there be, as I suppose, important questions to come before the Convention for consideration, before we can adjourn, it seems to me that it is highly improper that we should adopt a rule which will prevent them from being discussed, merely because they necessarily come up late in the session. The proposition is made, it is said, in accordance with the practice that prevails in the legislature. Now there is a clear and palpable distinction upon which the propriety of such a rule in the legislature may rest, but which can form no foundation for it here. In the legislature, where high party contests sometimes prevail, if an impression arises in the mind of the majority that the minority are endeavoring to create delay, the majority may be provoked to pass such a rule for their protection; and it would be justifiable, perhaps,

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY, &c. — ALLEN — BRIGGS — UPTON — DURGIN.

[July 19th.

because if it be a private matter, you can say to the individual interested, you should have come earlier; or if it be public matter, they may say we shall be here six months hence, and no great evil can result from the delay. But in an assembly constituted as this is, to recommend to the people changes in the Constitution, neither of these reasons can operate.

Then, in regard to giving an hour to chairmen of committees, and limiting other members to a less time, it appears to me that if such a rule is to be made, it ought to be made in another direction. The chairman of a committee has the advantage of the prestige of the report. He has the advantage of the views he has presented to the Committee, and the concurrence of the Committee, whereas those who come in opposition, stand upon a new ground, and their reasons are surely entitled to be heard. The rule ought, therefore, to be the other way; but I object to the adoption of any rule that shall prevent any question being debated; and let me say to this Convention, through you, that such a rule does not save one moment of time. The true way to insure a short debate on any subject, in Committee of the Whole, is to allow those who have examined the subject to discuss it thoroughly, otherwise each suggestion calls up members in every part of the House; and every suggestion which carries with it indications of justice and propriety costs absolutely more time in an assembly composed of over four hundred delegates than would be the case in the absence of such a rule. I hope the order will be rejected; but if it is to be adopted, I trust that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Brookline will first be made.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, for I like the exception better than the rule. If the Committee make a report recommending an amendment to the Constitution, it is necessary to make such explanation of the report as cannot be done in fifteen minutes; and I believe it is according to the practice of parliamentary bodies elsewhere to allow the chairman of the Committee an opportunity to explain the report; but I doubt the expediency of adopting the rule at all. I think the limitation to one hour, with a right on the part of the chairman to close the debate, is stringent enough. I therefore move that the order be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the order was accordingly laid upon the table.

Sectarian Schools.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, moved to take from the table the Report of the Committee in relation to Sectarian Schools, with the view to its being placed upon the Orders of the Day.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion, it was—by ayes, 73; noes, 85—decided in the negative.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, of Lowell, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day. The first matter on the Orders of the Day was the resolves on subject of

Elections by Plurality,

On their second reading, the question being on their final passage; pending this question the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) had moved to amend the first resolution, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:—

That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that in the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, attorney-general and councillors, the person having the largest number of votes shall be deemed to be elected.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. Is an amendment still in order.

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. UPTON. Then I move to strike out all after the word "the" in the sixth line, and insert the following: "individual having the highest number of votes shall be declared to be elected."

Mr. President: In offering the amendment, I had supposed that this Convention would agree to the principle laid down in the first part of this resolution, namely: "that it is expedient." I hope gentlemen of the Convention will mark and note the phraseology—"that it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that a majority of all the votes given shall be necessary" to elect certain officers. I agree to that expediency. It is well to provide in the Constitution that it is expedient that these individual officers shall be elected by a majority of the votes cast. But, Sir, it is also expedient to provide something beyond that, if the people do not see fit to elect these officers by a majority of votes, and to do the next best thing. Therefore, I propose to strike out the latter part of this resolution, and put in the next best thing, and that is: that the individual candidate having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected. It seems to me it is hardly worth while to go into an argument. It is not enough to declare the expediency of the principle, that the individual having the majority of votes shall be elected. But we must go beyond that, as these individuals voted for do not have a majority of the votes cast, perhaps; and therefore instead of leaving the question to the minority of the people, which most assuredly will be the case, when it comes to the legislature, I propose, in the amendment which I have offered, that the person having the highest number of votes shall be declared elected. I do not propose to go into a discussion of the question of the majority and the plurality; but simply to state the grounds of the amendment, and to express the hope that it may meet the approbation of the members of this Convention.

Mr. DURGIN, of Wilmington. When this subject was up before, I had the audacity to offer a few remarks, and I have some of the same sort left. I wish, on this occasion, to express freely my feelings and my views upon this subject. I have seen no good reason for changing them from that time to the present. In every age of the world, Sir, when republics and independent governments have arisen, great men have been there, and great men acted; and these republics came up, in despite and in defiance of monarchy of every kind. While those great men, those guardian spirits, those master spirits of the storm were there, those republics were safe. The same was true of our government. When this republic sprang up, there were great men and true there, men that feared God and regarded the interests of men—not like the unjust judge that feared not God nor regarded man—but men willing to sacrifice life, sacred honor, and fortune. Perhaps these great men have fallen.

Then, what has been the tendency of the ancient republics? There was, and there is, a tendency in republics towards monarchy. If you look for the ancient republics, where are they? They are not. They live only in history—only in song. And, if you look to modern republics even, look to Mexico, look to the South American republics, and what is the tendency to-day? Are they breathing, are they panting, are they striving, as the heart of one man, for liberty, or is there a tendency to monarchy? Look at France, with all her boasted liberty and her republicanism; that peaceful and bloodless conquest; that bloodless transit from monarchy to republicanism, and where is France now? Is it a republic? I say there is a tendency in republics to monarchy. How did it happen, and how does it happen? Is it because the people come out en masse, and assert their rights, and assert their liberties, and take the responsibility of the government upon their own shoulders—take the government into their own hands? No, Sir; but this tendency arises from the fact, that the people relinquish and yield, daily and unresistingly, that which, in duty, they are bound before God, to come out and to support. They yield it into the hands of a few, and that few hand it down to a still less number, and that less number may perhaps make the one man power in the nation. Thus the tendency is going on, and every man that has half an eye, that has half a thought, can comprehend this fact.

But, Sir, let me say, that there is no absolute and fatal necessity for this state of affairs. The first cause of this tendency, is the removal of the government from the people. While the people hold the government in their hands, and while they exercise its functions, this thing never can take place; but, when the government is removed from them, or when they surrender it, then this is the legitimate tendency. The cutting off of the participation of the people in the government, is the first, and one of the fundamental causes why this state of things ever exists in the world.

The second cause, is the want of knowledge on the part of the people, of the principles of a free government. You give to every individual citizen a knowledge of the great principles of a free government, and there is no danger of a republic's waning, or becoming a monarchy. How shall you give to the people a knowledge of the great principles of a free government? Throw the government upon their shoulders; throw it into their heads and hearts, and make the people responsible; make them understand their rights; school them; educate them in these principles. And how shall they be educated? By withdrawing the great principles of free government from them? No, Sir; but by holding them up before their understanding, and making the people feel that government is for the people.

Again. The more widely the government is diffused among the people, the farther it is from monarchy. Let the people of any nation, the whole mass of the people be responsible, and be actors in the great principles of a free government, and a monarch will die; he cannot breathe; there is no air which is congenial to his existence. There is no food on which a monarch can be sustained, none that shall give subsistence

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—DURGIN.

[July 19th.

and vitality, and he fails and dies. He moves not; he thinks not; he feels not; he is not there.

Again, let me say, the fewer the people who participate in the government, the nearer that government approaches to a monarchy or an aristocracy. I want this principle clearly understood, that the fewer the people, the less the number of those who participate in the government, and have a voice in its concerns, the nearer that government approaches to a minority, and by so much it approaches to an aristocracy, both of which are opposed to the great principles of true republicanism, and true democracy.

Plurality, Sir, is something less than the people. Yes, I avow it. A mere plurality is not the people in any correct republican sense of the term, as used in a government like ours. I say, that a plurality is something less than the people; it is not the voice of the people, it is but a voice of a minority of the people. What are its tendencies? You may undertake to convince me that seven is not less than ten. Who will believe it? Who can admit it as a fact? No one, unless he is deprived of his senses. The legitimate, and the only tendency of a plurality system, no matter where it is adopted, or where it acts, whether in Massachusetts, or Rhode Island, or in every State in this federal republic, whether in America, or in Europe, is to contract and narrow down the powers of men, instead of extending them abroad and diffusing life and vitality; and the tendency is constantly towards monarchy; towards the one man power, in spite of the very fates. Sir, look at it. If you have a plurality to-day, you have a less number to-morrow, and a less number next year, and so on. Some good mathematician, some individual skilled in algebra, or well skilled in progression, perhaps, may tell if you give him the data, how long it would be, before the one man power would exist. Every man knows that this is the legitimate tendency, if there is any tendency at all.

Again. I say every man should be made to feel, as far as possible, his responsibility in relation to the government in such a country as ours. I am opposed, therefore, to anything that will lessen a man's responsibility in this government. I was very much pleased with an order introduced by the reverend gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Lothrop,) sometime since, making it penal to neglect the discharge of duties towards the government, and not to go out and vote and take a share of the responsibility in this great government. Why, Sir, I would no more neglect the government than I would neglect my God. It is the duty of every man in this republic to go up to the polls and there show, by his voice and his vote, that he feels his responsibility, and teach it to his sons, and his sons' sons, and teach it to the rising generation that they are to take the responsibility of this great government upon themselves. The individual who looks at the specific and legitimate tendencies of curtailing and checking this responsibility upon the rising generation, though he may not feel it in his heart, is virtually an enemy to his country, an enemy to his God. These are my convictions, and these are my views. The plurality system, Sir, is a departure, it is a daring, fearful departure from those high, world-wide principles which distinguish Americanism from monarchy. Is there no specific difference, is there no difference in the practical workings of Americanism, so-called republicanism, as enjoyed by this great federal republic, and the government of a monarchy, or a monarchical form of government?

Now, Sir, I say that the plurality system is a daring, and I had almost said, a Heaven-daring departure from those principles. Tell it to some of those patriots of 1776, who have long slumbered in their graves, and I should not think it strange at all that they moved from their resting places.

What do the principles of monarchy do, Sir? When these principles are carried out, their legitimate tendency is to extort groans, and tears, and sighs. They not only clothe a people in rags in too many cases, but they spread hunger and death through the realm. Look at England, proud as she is, and see what has been the result of her system of government, with all the professions of liberty which they make—see what results have been produced there for the last quarter of a century in this respect. Why, Sir, there is Ireland, which contributes largely to the funds of that nation; and it presents the most frightful picture of distress, poverty and wretchedness—all owing to the working of that government, which is world-wide from that of a republic.

Let me say again, that the tendency of the plurality system, if carried out, will be to lull the mass of the people to sleep; for it does, and it will of necessity, deprive the great mass of the people from acting, or from seeing any results of their action. A man will stay at home because he cannot act conscientiously. We have had a question up here this morning about the pay roll, and the gentleman from Pittsfield avowed his wish to act conscientiously in relation to this matter; and that is the way it will be with a great many people throughout the Commonwealth. Men will not go and vote, if they cannot vote upon principle. They will say: "If you tie up my hands and my feet, how can I act? If you adopt the plurality system, what can I do? If I act at all, I want to act conscientiously." So you see, Mr. President, that the result of the plurality system will be to keep a great many men from the polls. A man will say to himself and to his boys: "Let us stay at home, for if we were to go and vote, we should vote so and so; and we know that we cannot have the privilege of expressing our opinions, or if they are expressed, it will do no good at all. Let us stay at home, and let the government go to rack and ruin." Men will feel thus, and they will talk thus. Every man can see, if he will reflect on it, that this will be the result of that system.

It is said that the plurality system will be more convenient. That seems to be the great bugbear that is brought up here against the majority system; but what have we got to do with convenience, in a government like this? It might have been more convenient for our fathers in 1776 to have remained at home quietly, and let the iron heel of tyranny and oppression tread out the last spark of life and liberty from these colonies—that might have been more convenient; but, Sir, they were not men who heeded the labor, and toil, and peril, of the cause in which they were engaged. They looked beyond all these considerations to the principle of right and justice, and upon these they acted; and Sir, they acted nobly, wisely, and victoriously. A government like ours, if it does not cost anything, would scarcely be worth anything; can we expect that such a government as ours will be brought to us if we lie supinely upon our backs and make no effort? If it be a mere matter of convenience, I would rather take the noble principle of one anciently, when he said: "I will not sacrifice to God that which costs me nothing." It seems to be a mere matter of dollars and cents—a mere saving of a little time. I ask the members of this Convention, through you, Mr. President, must we sacrifice principles which are as high as eternal truth, at the shrine of sordid convenience? This is nothing more nor less than sordid convenience; it is a mere saving of dollars and cents; and I hope and pray that we shall do no such thing. Why shall we not have the plurality system in all things, if it is a good principle? I was pleased to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Stevenson). When he made his remarks I said "Amen!" in spite of myself—it drew it right out of me—for he is a gentleman who speaks so eloquently, and more than that, he speaks only when he has something to say. Why not have the plurality in everything? Why not carry it into your juries? If they cannot decide, let the majority rule; or why not let even a plurality rule, if a case could arise, where there could be a plurality, why not let them decide the question? Would it be a departure from principle, and a sacrifice of principle? I tell you it would. Sir, no little fraction, no clique, no little squad of men ought to rule in the town, in the parish, in the county, in the state, or in the nation, and woe to this Union when the people allow such a state of affairs.

Sir, the adoption of this plurality system is not a tacit acknowledgment, but it is an open, unblushing avowal, that men are not capable of governing themselves.

Sir, that is just what Old England, just what Russia, just what Austria, just what every tyrannical government under heaven declares—they all agree in the opinion that men cannot govern themselves. Now, this is not a tacit acknowledgment of this doctrine, but it is a candid, open, unblushing avowal, that a majority of the people cannot govern themselves; and therefore you must place the government in the hands of somebody else. Now, Mr. President, I am not in favor of making this avowal to-day, or at any time. Far from it, Sir. As I have said before, this is the acknowledgment; for a plurality is not the people, but it is something less than the people. If you adopt this system, therefore, you declare, by a vote of this body, the conviction that the people cannot govern themselves. But, says one, other States have adopted it. So much the worse, say I. Suppose every State in this whole republic should adopt the plurality system, I say that only makes the matter so much the worse; it is only making the acknowledgment so much the more universal, that men cannot govern themselves, and it is consequently so much the more to be lamented and deplored. There is only one thing under Heaven that would induce me to go for the plurality system, and that is this: If we were likely to fail and not have any government at all, I would go for the plurality system, or almost anything else, in order to prevent such a result, upon the principle that almost any government is better than no government at all. But that is the only inducement that would operate upon me to make me favor that system.

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — HATHAWAY.

[July 19th.

[The hammer fell, the time allowed having expired.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Upton, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. SCHOULER, and the question being taken by yeas and nays, the result was—yeas, 159; nays, 159—as follows:—

YEAS.

Adams, Benjamin P. Hobbs, Edwin
Aldrich, P. Emory Hooper, Foster
Andrews, Robert Hopkinson, Thomas
Aspinwall, William Hubbard, William J.
Atwood, David C. Hunt, William
Austin, George Huntington, Asahel
Ayres, Samuel Huntington, Charles P.
Barrows, Joseph Hurlburt, Samuel A.
Bell, Luther V. Hyde, Benjamin D.
Bishop, Henry W. Kellogg, Giles C.
Blagden, George W. Jacobs, John
Boutwell, George S. James, William
Bradbury, Ebenezer Jenkins, John
Braman, Milton P. Jenks, Samuel H.
Breed, Hiram N. Kellogg, Giles C.
Brewster, Osmyn Kingman, Joseph
Brinley, Francis Kinsman, Henry W.
Briggs, George N. Knight, Hiram
Brown, Adolphus F. Knight, Jefferson
Bullock, Rufus Knight, Joseph
Bumpus Cephas C. Knowlton, Charles L.
Burlingame, Anson Kuhn, George H.
Carter, Timothy W. Ladd, John S.
Chandler, Amariah Leland, Alden
Chapin, Chester W. Littlefield, Tristram
Childs, Josiah Livermore, Isaac
Clark, Henry Lord, Otis P.
Clarke, Alpheus B. Lothrop, Samuel K.
Clarke, Stillman Loud, Samuel P.
Coggin, Jacob Meader, Reuben
Cogswell, Nathaniel Miller, Seth, Jr.
Cole, Sumner Mixter, Samuel
Conkey, Ithamar Morey, George
Cook, Charles E. Morss, Joseph B.
Cooledge, Henry F. Morton, Marcus
Crittenden, Simeon Nayson, Jonathan
Crockett, George W. Noyes, Daniel
Crosby, Leander Oliver, Henry K.
Crowell, Seth Orcutt, Nathan
Cushman, Henry W. Osgood, Charles
Dana, Richard H., Jr. Park, John G.
Davis, Solomon Parker, Adolphus G.
Dawes, Henry L. Perkins, Jonathan C.
Dean, Silas Pomroy, Jeremiah
Doane, James C. Putnam, George
Easton, James, 2d Putnam, John A.
Eaton, Lilley Rantoul, Robert
Edwards, Elisha Read, James
Edwards, Samuel Sargent, John M.
Ely, Homer Schouler, William
Farwell, A. G. Sikes, Chester
Foster, Aaron Sleeper, John S.
French, Charles H. Southern, John
Frothingham, R., Jr. Stetson, Caleb
Gilbert, Wanton C. Stevens, Charles G.
Gould, Robert Stevens, Granville
Goulding, Dalton Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Gray, John C. Stevenson, J. Thomas
Green, Jabez Storrow, Charles S.
Griswold, Josiah W. Strong, Alfred L.
Griswold, Whiting Sumner, Increase
Hale, Artemas Talbot, Thomas
Hall, Charles B. Taylor, Ralph
Hammond, A. B. Train, Charles R.
Haskell, George Turner, David
Hawkes, Stephen E. Turner, David P.
Hayward, George Upham, Charles W.
Heard, Charles Upton, George B.
Henry, Samuel Viles, Joel
Hersey, Henry Walcott, Samuel B.
Hewes, James Wales, Bradford L.
Heywood, Levi Walker, Samuel
Hillard, George S. Warner, Samuel, Jr.
Hinsdale, William Weeks, Cyrus
Hobart, Aaron Wheeler, William F.

White, Benjamin
Wilbur, Daniel
Wildner, Joel
Wilkins, John H.
Wilkinson, Ezra

NAYS.

Abbott, Josiah G. Hoyt, Henry K.
Adams, Shubael P. Hurlbut, Moses C.
Allen, Charles Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
Allen, James B. Johnson, John
Allen, Joel C. Kendall, Isaac
Allen, Parsons Keyes, Edward L.
Alvord, D. W. Kimball, Joseph
Baker, Hillel Knowlton, J. S. C.
Banks, Nath'l P., Jr. Knowlton, William H.
Barrett, Marcus Knox, Albert
Bates, Eliakim A. Ladd, Gardner P.
Bates, Moses, Jr. Lawrence, Luther
Bennett, Zephaniah Lincoln, Abishai
Bigelow, Edward B. Little, Otis
Bird, Francis W. Marble, William P.
Booth, William S. Marcy, Laban
Boutwell, Sewell Marvin, Abijah P.
Bronson, Asa Mason, Charles
Brown, Alpheus R. Merritt, Simeon
Brown, Artemas Moore, James M.
Brown, Hammond Morton, Elbridge G.
Brownell, Joseph Morton, William S.
Bryant, Patrick Newman, Charles
Buck, Asahel Nichols, William
Butler, Benjamin F. Norton, Alfred Carruthers, William Orne, Benjamin S.
Case, Isaac Packer, E. Wing
Chapin, Daniel E. Paine, Benjamin
Chapin, Henry Paine, Henry
Churchill, J. McKean Parris, Jonathan
Clark, Ransom Parsons, Samuel C.
Cleverly, William Partridge, John
Crane, George B. Peabody, Nathaniel
Cressy, Oliver S. Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
Cross, Joseph W. Penniman, John
Cushman, Thomas Perkins, Jesse
Cutler, Simeon N. Perkins, Noah C.
Davis, Ebenezer Phelps, Charles
Davis, Isaac Phinney, Sylvanus B.
Day, Gilman Pool, James M.
Deming, Elijah S. Rawson, Silas
Denton, Augustus Rice, David
DeWitt, Alexander Richards, Luther
Duncan, Samuel Richardson, Daniel
Dunham, Bradish Richardson, Samuel H.
Durgin, John M. Rogers, John
Eames, Philip Ross, David S.
Earle, John M. Sanderson, Amasa
Easland, Peter Sanderson, Chester
Eaton, Calvin D. Sheldon, Luther Fay, Sullivan Sherill, John
Fellows, James K. Simonds, John W.
Fiske, Emery Smith, Matthew
Fitch, Ezekiel W. Sprague, Melzar
Foster, Abram Spooner, Samuel W.
Fowle, Samuel Stevens, William
Fowler, Samuel P. Stiles, Gideon
Freeman, James M. Taft, Arnold
French, Rodney Thayer, Willard, 2d
French, Samuel Thompson, Charles
Gale, Luther Tilton, Abraham
Gates, Elbridge Tilton, Horatio W.
Gilbert, Washington Tyler, William
Giles, Charles G. Underwood, Orison
Giles, Joel Wallis, Freeland
Gooch, Daniel W. Walker, Amasa
Gooding, Leonard Ward, Andrew H.
Graves, John W. Warner, Marshal
Greene, William B. Waters, Asa H.
Hallett, B. F. Weston, Gershom, B.
Hapgood, Lyman W. Whitney, Daniel S.
Hapgood, Seth Whitney, James S.
Haskins, William Wilbur, Joseph
Hathaway, Elnathan P. Williams, Henry
Hayden, Isaac Wilson, Henry
Heath, Ezra, 2d Wilson, Willard
Hewes, William H. Winslow, Levi M.
Hobart, Henry Wood, Charles C.
Hood, George Wood, Otis
Howard, Martin Wright, Ezekiel

ABSENT.

Abbott, Alfred A. Kellogg, Martin R.
Alley, John B. Langdon, Wilber C.
Allis, Josiah Lawton, Job G., Jr.
Appleton, William Lincoln, F. W., Jr.
Ballard, Alvah Loomis, E. Justin Ball, George S. Lowell, John A.
Bancroft, Alpheus Marvin, Theophilus R.
Bartlett, Russel Monroe, James L.
Bartlett, Sidney Morton, Marcus, Jr.
Beach, Erasmus D. Nash, Hiram
Beal, John Nute, Andrew T.
Beebe, James M. Ober, Joseph E.
Bennett, William, Jr. Paige, James W.
Bigelow, Jacob Parker, Joel
Bliss, Gad O. Parker, Samuel D.
Bliss, William C. Parsons, Thomas A.
Bradford, William J. A. Payson, Thomas E.
Brown, Hiram C. Peabody, George
Brownell, Fredrick Perkins, Daffiel A.
Bullen, Amos H. Pierce, Henry
Cady, Henry Plunkett, William C.
Choate, Rufus Powers, Peter
Clark, Salah Preston, Jonathan
Cole, Lansing J. Prince, F. O.
Copeland, Benjamin F. Reed, Sampson
Crowninshield, F. B. Richardson, Nathan
Cummings, Joseph Ring, Elkanah, Jr.
Curtis, Wilber Rockwell, Julius
Davis, Charles G. Rockwood, Joseph
Davis, John Royce, James C.
Davis, Robert T. Sampson, George R.
Dehon, William Sherman, Charles
Denison, Hiram S. Simmons, Perez
Dorman, Moses Stacy, Eben H.
Ely, Joseph M. Stutson, William Eustis, William T. Sumner, Charles
Fisk, Lyman Swain, Alanson
French, Charles A. Taber, Isaac C.
Gardner, Henry J. Thayer, Joseph
Gardner, Johnson Thomas, John W.
Goulding, Jason Tileston, Edmund P.
Greenleaf, Simon Tower, Ephraim
Hadley, Samuel P. Tyler, John S.
Hale, Nathan Vinton, George A.
Harmon, Phineas Wallace, Frederick T.
Holder, Nathaniel Wetmore, Thomas
Houghton, Samuel White, George
Howland, Abraham H. Wood, William H.
Hunt, Charles E. Woods, Josiah B.
Huntington, George H.

Absent and not voting, 99.

The PRESIDENT. One hundred and fifty-nine gentlemen have voted in the affirmative, and one hundred and fifty-nine gentlemen in the negative. In the belief that it is inexpedient to submit to the people so radical a change in the Constitution upon a casting vote, the Chair votes in the negative, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown, moved to amend the third resolution, so that it would read as follows:—

Resolved, That representatives to the general court shall be elected as by law shall be provided.

Mr. HATHAWAY. It is with diffidence that I propose this amendment. I know the fate that befell the amendment which I proposed yesterday, when this Convention was in another situation, that of the Committee of the Whole. I suppose that I have a little, if not a full share, of the same feeling that it is said pervades most families: that the more sickly and rickety the bantling, the more the parent becomes attached to it, because of its weakness; while the healthy and strong one is left to care for itself. Sir, I recollect that this proposition, when offered to the Convention in another situation, fell almost lifeless. There is

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—HATHAWAY—HOOPER.

[July 19th.]

another reason, that oppresses me, upon this matter. I know very well the situation in which I stand here, in relation to certain gentlemen, and this Convention; but before proceeding to that, let me say to the gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) that what he yesterday said is not precisely true, as to myself. He yesterday said, if I understood him correctly, that no man dared give the reasons why this Report was made, and resolutions offered in their present form. Sir, let me say to him, that I “dare do all that becomes a man, and he who dares do more, is none.” But, Sir, there are certain reasons, I doubt not, for this Report, which the Committee itself do not like to give, and would not be judged to be exactly appropriate and parliamentary; and therefore it would be improper for me here to say, that such reasons controlled their action, and hence I shall not undertake to give them; but in giving reasons that are proper and appropriate, and from which no one would start back, I will assure the gentleman from Salem that he will find me by no means backward in giving, in defence of any measure I may propose; but I am not answerable for this Report and resolutions, and shall leave it to the Committee who reported them, to give their reasons therefor. I cannot refuse the temptation of saying, that I feel that a debt of gratitude is due from me to my constituents, for the generous confidence they have bestowed upon me,—aye, Sir, something more,—a debt, not only of gratitude, but of duty. I feel as though I should fail of performing my duty to them, did I not make the proposition which I have made to this Convention, in reference to this amendment. Permit me, Sir, to say, that I may be again, as I unjustly heretofore have been, subjected to the shafts of calumny, from a certain quarter, for the course which I am taking; but I have had, thus far, and trust that I shall continue hereafter to have, but one rule to guide me in this Convention. When I came into it, it was for the purpose of correcting our fundamental and organic law, wherever, in my judgment, it had operated badly with or upon the people; and wherever it had worked well, and we stood well upon it, there, I said, long since, that I was willing to stand, without a change; and where I thus stood, to “stand still.” I believe that such are the views of all my associates, in this Convention, from the county of Bristol; and although we may have sometimes voted differently, yet our difference was a manly one, and in good faith, all of us seeking for the best measures and greatest good; but others have levelled at some of us—because we choose thus to act, independent of their direction and bidding—the shafts of detraction and calumny. I presume that there is no one here, from the county of Bristol, who is not perfectly willing to stand up and meet these Partisan arrows of detraction, although they may fall as fast as hail from a summer’s cloud; but let me say, that they have been, thus far, impotent, because they were hurled at us by a puny arm, and came from a feeble hand. And let me say, farther, that time will soon heal the wounds which have been inflicted by that feeble hand and puny arm, and will soon allay the stings that calumny has attempted and intended.

Sir, to come to the matter in hand, I go for the amendment to the resolution, because the people do not demand the change which is contemplated by the resolution. Let me say, as the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) said the other day, in reference to the loan of the State credit, that the object of this resolution was not a part of the programme of the campaign which preceded the call of this Convention. Will he, or anybody else, tell me where this amendment to the present Constitution, in reference to elections for representatives, town, or district officers, was put forth, or recommended, in that famous document that was drawn up by him, and sent out to the people? Sir, so far as I know, it made neither part nor parcel of that document. It was not one of those propositions which were there chalked out for us here to act upon. It may possibly be there, nevertheless; but if it is, it has escaped my observation.

But, Sir, I have a deeper and more solid objection than this; and I ask whether our present Constitution, thus far, in regard to this matter of choosing representatives and town officers, has worked well? Permit me to say, still farther, that I hope that your Constitution will remain precisely as it now stands, and has stood ever since 1780, as to the election of your representatives and town officers. Will gentlemen point to a single word in that Constitution that requires by which mode your representatives and town officers shall be elected, whether by a majority vote or a plurality vote? Sir, have there been any petitions from the people laid upon your table, showing that they desire a change of the Constitution in this matter? Again, Sir, I ask, has the table of any of your legislatures ever groaned under the weight of complaints, embodied in petitions from the people, in regard to this matter? No, Sir—No, Sir. Then, if there be no complaint, and has been none, in the community, why make this change? I put it to gentlemen seriously: Why should we make this change? The great complaint has been in reference to the election of your governor, and those officers who have been elected, not by towns, but by the people generally; that it was necessary to have a plurality vote as the test in such elections, because of the great difficulty of calling the whole people of the Commonwealth, or any great portion of them, out a second time. Gentlemen have said, and repeated it, and it has been handed from the lips of one to the other, that your towns were but little republics, and that you could go on and vote perhaps as many as three or four hundred times in a day, in some instances—that in town elections the people are all together; and it has been repeated here, again and again, that your nominations in town meetings for representatives, or town officers, are not made in caucus and in convention, as for State officers, where the nominations are taken from the towns, but that they are nominated upon the spot, and at the time of the election; that these nominations come from the people themselves, when they are all together; and, if this is so, I cannot see, for the life of me, why, in this matter, you should not allow the Constitution to remain as it is. This, as I said before, did not constitute any part of the reasons that were given why this Convention was called; neither has there been any complaint, to my knowledge, in reference to this matter, on the ground that the people did not choose, or had failed to choose, all the representatives to which they were entitled. Sir, whenever it is shown to me that the people demand this change, I shall go heart and hand for it; but, until I do see it, I shall go, not for rebuking them because they have not complained—as you virtually would if this resolution shall pass—but, I am for retaining the good old rule which has thus far worked so well, and in regard to which no one has ever complained. I would leave it precisely as it is; and let me say to gentlemen, in reference to this matter; that if this resolution shall be adopted, then I would make not only the representatives and town officers elective, under a statute such as the legislature may hereafter make, but I would apply it to all your state and district officers. I cannot see any reason why the rule should not be a uniform one, and apply to the whole, as well as a part of them.

Sir, I am not inclined to discuss this matter at any great length; but it seems to me that, unless gentlemen show a substantial reason for making this change in the organic law as it now stands, no such change should be made. I know of no rule in the present Constitution, under, and by which, the legislature might, not, at any time, since 1780 down to the present time, have changed the law in an hour, and have adopted the plurality system in the election of representatives and town officers, if it had so pleased; and if there had been any great evils in this matter, arising from the requisition of a majority of the voters, and if the people had felt and suffered inconvenience and wrong, think you that the legislature would not have been called upon, again and again, to make a change? Assuredly, it would.

Sir, I have no great regard for the amendment to these resolutions, on any other ground than that I believe it to be right and a good one. It is not, however, such an amendment that I cherish so dearly as to induce me to vote against the whole of these resolutions, in case it should not be adopted; but it does seem to me, that the Constitution as it now stands, is altogether better than the change which is proposed. I do not believe that the people of the Commonwealth are ready for a change in this matter; and least of all, for such a change as this.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I shall vote for the gentleman’s proposition to amend, but not for the reasons which he has assigned for its adoption, but for reasons precisely the opposite of those which he has given. I shall vote for it because I am in favor of electing representatives by a plurality vote. I should prefer to have all elections decided on the first ballot; and if I cannot get that, then I would leave the matter to the legislature; and then the people can accommodate themselves, and have the plurality system whenever they choose to have it. I think it altogether preferable to leave it to the legislature to determine, than to put into the Constitution a provision providing for the plurality mode on the second ballot, and only on the second ballot. If that is done, the mode can never be changed until we change the Constitution itself.

I fully concur with the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) that as this thing has stood in the Constitution, the legislature might have changed the mode at any time, and have adopted the plurality system. They might have made this change in reference to representatives and all town officers, and therefore I am willing to leave it in that shape; for I believe that the people will see to it, that they will have their views carried out, and that the time is not distant

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—KEYES.

[July 19th.

when they will require all elections of town officers, to be conducted on the plurality system.

For these reasons, in brief, I hope that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. Since this discussion took place, I have waited without saying a word; supposing that it was well understood that this plan was a compromise between the two parties here, in relation to the questions of plurality and majority. When the Committee reported to the Convention in favor of universal plurality, it was defeated, and it was found that there was a great difference of opinion, a majority of the members of the Convention being in favor of the majority system, and a new Committee was appointed, and a compromise plan was drafted, which, so far from being an unmeaning and imperfect system, was founded on reason in every part of it; and if there had been a disposition to concede anything on the part of either one side or the other, that system would have been adopted without farther strife, by a large majority of this body. I must confess, however, my surprise at the vote just taken; and while I am filled with surprise, I must also be allowed to express my gratification at the fact that this Convention has been saved from lasting disgrace by the casting vote of the Chairman; for, had we lost this question, what should we not have lost? Everything. The liberal party in the Convention would have been defeated in all the most important matters; the Whig party would have been triumphant, and in a fair way to hold the reins of power, for an indefinite period. Sir, had that amendment succeeded, I would have prayed Heaven that the people might have hissed the whole amended Constitution into oblivion.

Now, what is the system before us? It has been mainly adopted, and there was a reason why it should have been adopted. It was adopted as a compromise, on the ground that the Convention was about equally divided upon the subject to which it refers. We have proposed a plan of compromise, basing the elections in part upon the plurality system, and in part upon the majority system. The reason was this, viz.: certain officers elected on general ticket, were restricted to the majority rule on the ground that if the people should fail to elect, and the election should devolve on the legislature, they would still be elected by the immediate representatives of the whole people; and according to this the people would be allowed to nominate their own officers without trouble, or the intervention of others.

In regard to the Senate, the majority system has been objected to, under the present system, on the ground that the representatives of one locality or section, have elected the local representatives of other sections. To do away with that difficulty, it is provided that the Senate shall be elected by a plurality vote, so that each district may elect its own senators, and other district officers, without interference on the part of representatives of other districts.

We supposed that that would do away with every difficulty which existed in regard to the present system.

Those who go for the plurality system in reference to State officers, are at heart in favor of the majority principle for electing members of the House of Representatives. What is the reason that they now go for a plurality system? Why,

Sir, because they suppose that they are going to derive some advantage from it. Within the last ten years, the people of the country towns have been deprived of a thousand representatives, by the operation of the majority system. If there be any place where the plurality system is wanted, it is in the election of town representatives. If you want to establish the principle of equality, there is no case on earth, where plurality in voting is justifiable to so great an extent, as it is in the election of town representatives, that the towns may enjoy their own legal rights on the floor of this House. I want to see every town in the State of Massachusetts represented according to its legal rights, every year, in the legislature; because, let party ties be as strong as they may, they are looser in the country towns than they are anywhere else. In State conventions, the leaders of a party can obtain, and hold control, and the delegates en masse, in nine cases out of ten, are mere machines to register their edicts. By this term, I mean no disrespect, but simply to intimate that they usually follow their leaders, either for the reason that they have confidence in them, or because they see no practicable mode of doing otherwise. I have had some experience myself, in regard to this matter. The first time I was elected to the House of Representatives, although belonging to the dominant party; I was just on the extreme verge of it; and, on that account, was considered as being no better than an infidel. But with six of the leaders pitted against me, and without a single voice raised in my favor, I flogged them over and over again, by the aid of the country members. It was upon a party question, to be sure; but the country members are not trained altogether, and solely, to follow party lead; and when they come here, and see how the wires are pulled—which, towards the close of a session, they have generally pretty well learned—they are then able to act independently.

If you will have plurality, therefore, give it to the country towns, that they may always elect their representatives, and not be deprived of such a large fragment of their strength, as is exhibited in that long list which has been presented to us by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Giles). Now these are the reasons why a compromise was proposed; and it was supposed that, on these grounds, and with the proposition which the new Committee put forth, the Convention would be harmonized on the subject, if parties were disposed to harmonize at all. But this feeling, I am sorry to say, has not been met in what would seem to me, to be a proper spirit, on the part of members of this Convention; but gentlemen have stood up here, and opposed this compromise, not, as I believe, I may safely say, because they have changed their principles within the last two years, but because of some advantage, which they expect will accrue to their party, from the course they are pursuing. They have their own objects in view, and the men who desire the success of the Whig party, have voted that way, whether they are called Whigs, or by some other name. There is no use in trying to disguise that fact any longer.

Now, in respect to all these resolves but one, and I do not recollect indorsing that one which relates to municipal officers—in the Committee—I hope they will pass. I thought, at least, that in regard to the election of municipal and town officers, the mode was to be left to the legislature. We have comprehended the whole organization of the legislature, and have prescribed the method by which that body shall be constituted; and if any change is to be made, wherein the plurality rule is to be made to apply, it should be, according to my view, to the election of town representatives; because we know that a state of things has existed, and will exist, hereafter, for the next four years at least, which renders it necessary; for there is an impassable barrier between the union of any two of the existing parties within that period; and therefore, I say, that in case of failure to elect, on the part of the country towns, by reason of the majority system, it would be equivalent to reducing their representation in proportion to the number of said failures.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment. The gentleman entirely mistakes the proposition I made. The proposition which I made, was to leave it entirely within the power of the legislature to determine whether the mode of election should be by plurality, or majority, or any other mode.

Mr. KEYES. In order to have a system which shall embrace the three great branches of the government, so that all the people could understand it, and to place it beyond the possibility of change by the legislature, I should prefer to have the matter fixed and stationary in the Constitution. As regards town and municipal officers, I would leave it to the people themselves, to do as they please.

Now, Mr. President, it strikes me, that if the Convention itself had sat in Committee, and considered what the state of opinion was in this body, as indicated by the votes already taken, and if they had been willing to indulge the same liberal spirit which actuated the Committee, in order to harmonize the views, by conceding something on both sides; then I think that this plan would have been adopted by a triumphant majority.

I have looked at the Convention—perhaps I shall be out of order in saying so—from a hundred miles distance; and when I have seen the votes recorded on several important questions, it struck me that the Convention was not acting upon its own judgment, but that members were actuated by unwise fears of the people. They have seemed to desire to show that they were more economical, for example, than they actually are; they do not seem to me, to have acted as if they were elected to exercise their own judgment and sense of right, according to their ideas, but to take counsel of every bugbear and opinion in the community, so that their course might be shaped accordingly.

How these amendments are to be submitted to the people, I do not know; but so far as the action of the Convention is concerned, in my opinion, it has defeated, in many important cases, the very ends which a large majority of the people desired, especially in relation to the judiciary. The election of judges, by the people, would have been, in my opinion, a jewel in the Constitution, which the people would have rallied most strongly to support. Yes, Sir, the people all over the State, talk to-day about the Convention, as not daring to utter its sentiments, on various important matters, and especially on the question of loaning the credit of the State to private corporations, because a certain portion of the people threaten to rise in opposition to the new Constitution, should it contain any restrictions in regard to that policy. Now a Convention so controlled, is worthy of the hisses

Tuesday.]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—SUMNER—BATES—BROWN—JAMES—WHITNEY.

[July 19th.]

and scorn of the people, instead of its votes. How can we expect them to indicate their real sentiments, if we stand here cowering before them, afraid to declare our own?

But I will not detain the Convention with anything of that sort; I wish to say, in sincerity, that the Committee was appointed to take up and consider the various views of this Convention. They have given the subject their careful attention, and have brought in a compromise plan, which has reason and common sense as its basis, and I trust it may be adopted.

Reconsideration.

Mr. SUMNER, of Otis. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Convention rejected the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) if such a motion is in order.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I should like to inquire of the Chair, whether the motion of the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) is not the first motion under consideration?

The PRESIDENT. That amendment is to the third resolve, but the gentleman from Otis, (Mr. Sumner,) moves to reconsider a vote already taken in reference thereto, and it is the subject first in order, under the rules.

Mr. SUMNER, of Otis. I have but few words to say, in reference to this subject. Aware that the Convention must be, to a very considerable extent, wearied with the debate which has been had upon this most important matter; yet from the consideration that in relation to it I have kept silence heretofore, I trust that a few suggestions from me, in support of the motion which I have made, will be entertained.

I make the motion, among other reasons, for this: that it is very apparent from the vote which has been taken, that there is a very strong disposition in this Convention, and out of it, to sustain the plurality principle; and if the votes which have just been given in favor of the affirmative of the proposition were canvassed, I apprehend they will be found to rest upon a large majority of the people of Massachusetts. Sir, I have no doubt of the fact, radical as the proposition may appear in the minds of some, that there is in this Commonwealth a very great majority of the people in favor of a change. I, as one of the friends of this Convention, supposed, from the way in which it was called, and in which the delegates were elected to it, that one of the prominent objects which would be carried into effect by its action, would be the adoption of the plurality system; and no one could have been so deaf as not to have heard, from every section of this Commonwealth, one complete chorus of voices proclaiming that the old majority principle, like many other matters of policy which had been used in this Commonwealth in times past, had become worn out. Once, it was required that our governor, lieutenant-governor, senators, and representatives, should have a property qualification. That requisition answered their day and generation perfectly well. But that has long since been worn out, and others, newer and fresher, have been adopted. And such has been the difference of opinion, so to speak, that the majority rule is now worn out; and I submit, that if the people have demanded any change in the fundamental law of the State, they have demanded a change in respect to the majority rule.

Sir, I do not propose to go into a discussion of this question at length, but I have very great doubt whether, upon a fuller consideration of this subject, this Convention will be content with the limited proposition which is now offered to the people in regard to this matter. I think it is worthy of fuller consideration, and reconsideration, also; and therefore I have made my motion.

Mr. JAMES, of South Scituate. I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I rise to a question of order. I believe a motion to reconsider, must go into the Orders of the Day.

The PRESIDENT. Not upon a collateral question.

Mr. BATES. I also rise to a question of privilege. As appears by the yeas and nays called this morning, and recorded by the Secretary of the Convention, opposite the name of H. C. Brown is recorded the word "yes." To the call of that name the clerk says, there was an audible response, and he so recorded it. The gentleman says he was not in the hall, and did not vote upon the question. I should like to know how far that matter has been carried, and how many gentlemen have been recorded as voting who did not vote?

The PRESIDENT. It is competent for any member of the Convention who is recorded as having voted upon the question, to call the attention of the Convention to the subject, and have the record amended in that respect, if wrong.

Mr. H. C. BROWN, of Tolland. I was not present at the time the yeas and nays were called. Had I been present, I should have voted differently from what appears by the record.

The PRESIDENT. It is competent to have the record amended, inasmuch as the question immediately pending is on a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the amendment, and if it shall appear that the vote was improperly announced, then the action falls. By reference to the record, the Clerk informs the Chair that the word "yes" is placed opposite the name of H. C. Brown, and it is for the Convention to say, whether a deduction shall be made from the affirmative vote, and if the Chair hears no objection, the record will be amended according to the facts.

No objection was made, and the record was amended accordingly.

The PRESIDENT. The change does not affect the result, and therefore it is unnecessary for the Convention to pursue the matter farther.

Mr. ASPINWALL. It may be as well to suggest at this time, as there are several gentlemen in the Convention by the name of Brown, and a mistake has occurred, that some one of them may have answered to the wrong name. I therefore request that the record may be examined to ascertain whether all the gentlemen by that name are recorded as they answered.

The PRESIDENT. Any gentleman who thinks that his vote is improperly recorded, can examine the journal at his pleasure. The gentleman from Scituate is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JAMES, of South Scituate. I was about to say, when I was interrupted, that I hoped that the motion to reconsider would prevail, and the amendment adopted, and then the Convention will have done one thing which the community desire. I can speak for my own constituents, and for those in the neighboring towns, that they consider this one of the most important matters before the Convention, and are almost unanimously of the opinion that the plurality system should be adopted. We have met with a great deal of difficulty, not only in our elections of members of congress, but in our elections of members of the legislature. For five years the town of Scituate went unrepresented, because trial after trial could affect nothing. I would ask if that is not an evil? That is a sufficient answer to the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) who asks if any evil exists in the Commonwealth? That is an evil, and ought not we to lay our hands upon it, and reform the evil? I should be glad to see this matter reconsidered, and to see the plurality system adopted throughout, and I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. The immediate question, I believe, is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) was rejected. I wish to say a word in reply to the arguments urged in favor of a reconsideration. They are based upon the idea that the people desire the plurality rule, in order to get rid of the inconvenience of a second election. Now, Sir, if gentlemen will examine the Report of this Committee—which is the second Committee upon this subject, and appointed in full view of the votes previously taken upon the subject,—it will be found that they have carefully matured the system they present, so as to avoid a second election by the people. They simply leave the Constitution, in reference to the officers for whom the whole people of the State vote, where the Constitution now leaves it. They provide that the House of Representatives shall send the names of two out of three—instead of two out of four—to the Senate, and that the Senate, from the two thus sent, shall select one. Now, here is the principle of the present Constitution retained, which, so far as I know, is satisfactory to the people. What the people complain of, is the trouble, expense, and ill-feeling growing out of second elections. Now, your Committee have provided against this. They have reported that in the election to be held by the people, when they shall vote for members of the House, and for senators—after they have adopted the amendment—they will vote for those representatives with a full knowledge that they delegate to them the right to vote in the legislature for State officers not elected by a majority vote. Now, I take it, as I have before said—and I must, to some extent, repeat—that the people have no attachment to the plurality rule, as an abstract question. They have no attachment to the idea, theoretically, that a less number than the majority should rule. It is a necessity forced upon them by a division of the Commonwealth into more parties than two, that makes them desire some expedient to rid themselves of the trouble and expense attending repeated elections. The resolutions, as they now stand, meet the desires of the people here, and they will prefer to delegate to their representatives the right to vote in the legislature in case of failure to make a choice, to being called upon a second time to ballot. They will choose to provide against this in the manner here proposed. I undertake to say, in every town in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, when a representative is to be elected under your amended Constitution, he will be elected with a direct reference to some man standing before the people as candidate for governor. No candidate for election as a rep-

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — WHITNEY — DANA.

[July 19th.

representative could be elected, unless it were understood by the constituency which is to elect him, that he would vote for the candidate for governor, which a major part of that constituency favor, in this House, in case of a failure upon the part of the people to elect their governor, and the election is thrown into the House of Representatives. In case there are three parties, and two unite in their preference for a particular candidate for governor still it is expected that the representatives will carry out the will of a majority of the people in that respect, and the people will take care of this matter when they elect representatives and senators.

Now, Sir, the argument has been brought up, that our governors have been elected by a legislature in which all the people of the Commonwealth were not represented. It must be recollected that under the amended Constitution, if this compromise Report be adopted, we shall not assemble here with vacancies in half the towns in the Commonwealth. By the application of the plurality rule in your election of representatives, you will have filled your House, and there will stand here a representative for every town in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. And those representatives will come here indoctrinated with the principles of the constituents they represent; they will bring with them the voice of a majority of the people in the towns from which they are elected, in reference to the man for whom they are to vote to fill the office of governor of the Commonwealth. They will come here, and vote, not by ballot, but vote visa voce, for there is to be no dodging hereafter in this matter. The men who are sent here must declare by the voice the will of their constituents; and I undertake to say, that men will come here virtually instructed by their constituents to vote one way, and there will be no danger that they will vote another, but they will meet the desires and will of the people who elected them.

Mr. President: I did not come here prepared to discuss this question; but in relation to this motion for a reconsideration, made by the gentleman for Otis, (Mr. Sumner,) I believe that any judicious mind who wishes for the adoption of the amendments which we shall recommend, by the people, would not think it wise or expedient to submit to the people an amendment making so important and radical a change as this makes, which was adopted in the Convention only by a bare majority of one or two votes; adopted by less than a majority of those who favored the calling of a Convention originally, who have the responsibility of calling the Convention, and who will have the responsibility of carrying these amendments before the people. I say, a majority of these men are against a reconsideration of this question, on the grounds proposed, to wit: in order to ingraft upon these resolutions an amendment to be carried by a bare majority. And, I repeat, it is these men who will have the responsibility of carrying the amended Constitution before the people, who object to the amendment proposed by the gentleman for Otis.

Now, Mr. President, I put it to you, I put it to the members of the Convention, whether it would be wise, expedient, or in any sense desirable, for us to go before the people upon any amendment to the Constitution, in relation to which we are about equally divided? There can be no doubt about it. The part of wisdom, then, seems to be, to agree, as we have done, upon some medium ground upon this subject, and stand there. But, Sir, where is the necessity to alter the resolutions? As they now stand, we shall have filled our Senate by elections by the people, for a plurality elects there. We shall have filled the House of Representatives by plurality elections, so that there will be no vacancies there, and we shall thereby have, in the legislature, an expression of a majority-will of the people of the Commonwealth, elected with a direct reference to this question of State officers. A majority of the people will have delegated their power to their senators and representatives to elect their governor, in case they themselves fail in an election. So that, in the election of governor, and of your highest State officers, you will still recognize the great majority principle as the true principle. We shall still preserve that principle in the choice of our governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, auditor, &c., and we shall keep embodied in our Constitution, permanently, the sacred principle, that, in the majority of the people alone, resides the sovereignty of this Commonwealth. We shall transmit that principle, sacred with our Constitution, to our posterity. Sir, let us not give up that principle. I would keep it in the Constitution, in some form. I would recognize that fundamental doctrine of all republican governments, somewhere in our amended Constitution.

Sir, gentlemen go for the plurality, not because it is right in principle, but because it is a political necessity, forced upon them by circumstances now existing in the Commonwealth. This is the only avowed reason. Now, Sir, the Report of the Committee has adopted that principle so far as that necessity exists, but it does not exist in the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, and your other State officers, elected by general ticket. I therefore hope, that we shall stand by the Report of the Committee, and that we shall not vote to reconsider, for the purpose of farther alterations in the amendment proposed by these resolutions. Let us stand upon this ground, and I fear not the people; they will sustain us. I believe we can then go triumphantly before the people with this amendment as it is; and I repeat, I hope the Report will be adopted as it now stands, without any alteration.

Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln, demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered. (Cries of "question," "question.")

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. I am aware, by the call of "question," "question," which I have just heard, that the Convention wish to come to a vote upon this motion, and I will not, therefore, detain them but a moment. I had the privilege of addressing the Convention, on another occasion, upon the plurality side of this question. I then said all that I deemed it important to say; but, I now wish to call the attention of the Convention, for a moment, to the principles contained in the proposition before us, as it came from the Committee.

When this subject was before under consideration, the question was on the adoption of the plurality or the majority system absolutely; but it now comes before us in the form of a compromise, and to the merits of that compromise our attention is called. Now, Sir, the only distinction, which I can see, upon which a compromise of these two principles can properly be made, is this:

In deliberative assemblies, where there can be frequent ballotings taken without inconvenience, and where there is danger of being taken by surprise, the majority principle should be adopted. I would always require it in an assembly like this; I would always require it in your town affairs, and in the election of town officers. But where the people vote in large masses, where they cannot vote often, without very great inconvenience, and where, from the nature of the case, there is no danger of surprise, then, from the experience we have had for the last eight years, I would adopt the plurality rule. I can see no other distinction in principle, than that. It lies between deliberative assemblies which can vote often, and which are liable to be taken by some surprise, and between more large assemblies, which cannot resort to frequent voting without great inconvenience. I am willing to make that distinction. I am in favor of retaining the majority system in town meetings—in voting for town officers—in town affairs, and in the election of representatives to the general court. I would, at any rate, have that matter in the hands of the legislature; I would not tie the hands of the legislature, and if the towns found the majority principle to work too much inconvenience, I would allow the legislature to establish the plurality system for them.

Now, my objection to this compromise system is this: it proposes to retain the majority principle where the reasons are the strongest against it. It proposes to retain the majority in cases where there can be no danger of surprise, and where, from the nature of the case, a second election cannot be held without great inconvenience. You propose, if you cannot get a majority upon the popular vote, to throw the election of your governor and of your high State officers into the legislature. Now, this very system constitutes the strongest objection to the whole majority principle. The result of the plan submitted by the Committee, will be that in your great offices, the people will not elect at all; but these officers will be elected by assemblies which meet in this Hall, and which were not chosen for that purpose at all. I repeat it, your compromise proposes to retain the majority system where the strongest reasons exist for adopting the plurality system, and the result of it will be to place it in the power of the Senate and House of Representatives to elect all the great officers of the Commonwealth.

Now, Mr. President, let us ask gentlemen who advocate this plan, if the most objectionable feature of the present system of election is not that the great officers of the State are elected by the legislature? And will it not be still more objectionable under the system which you propose to adopt, when a larger number of these officers are made elective? There are more officers to be elected by the popular vote now, by the system you have provided, than there were under the former Constitution. It increases the patronage of the people, and in case they fail to elect, will increase the patronage of your legislature; that is to say, we shall increase the evil which already exists under the present system. There is now nearly double the necessity for taking the power from the legislature that there was under the former Constitution.

For this reason, if for no other, I cannot support the proposition reported by your Committee, and throw into the hands of your legislature the election of all these officers, which you propose to make elective. It is from this very system that this danger of corruption and perversion of the popular voice, from which we have suffered, has arisen. It seems to me that this proposition of compromise is not founded in principle, and that we ought not to support it. Let the people of the Commonwealth elect by one election, their governor, their lieutenant-governor, and all their State officers. I believe it is the will of the people of the State that they should be thus elected, and that the people should not be kept in suspense for four or five months after the election has taken place, before they can know who will be the officers of the State.

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—DANA—TRAIN—KEYES—WILSON—SCHOULER.

[July 19th.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway, (interposing). I would suggest to the gentleman for Manchester, that the secretary of the Commonwealth, the treasurer, and those officers of which he speaks as having now been made elective, are now elected by the legislature under the present Constitution, so that in case of a failure to elect by the people, the legislature will have no more officers to elect than under the present Constitution.

Mr. DANA. The attorney-general is not.

Mr. WHITNEY. True, the attorney-general is not, but the secretary, treasurer, and auditor, are, and the evil of which the gentleman speaks, therefore, at least, cannot be increased by the system which the Committee propose.

Mr. DANA. Well, Sir, the adoption of the provision, making these officers elective by the people, shows one thing. It shows that it is better that all these officers should be elected by the people rather than by the legislature, so that the gentleman's remark certainly does not affect my argument. I want that the election of these officers shall be taken out of the hands of the legislature and put into the hands of the people. We have taken the appointment of the attorney-general away from the governor and given it to the people. We have taken the appointment of the secretary and auditor out of the hands of the legislature, and yet, with the experience of the last eight years before us, you propose to give this appointing power back to the legislature, for that will be the result of it. No gentleman can be blind to the result. If you adopt this majority principle, it is verbally saying that four out of five times—I am not certain about my arithmetic, but it is somewhere about that—these officers shall be elected upon this floor.

Now, Mr. President, that is the first aristocratic feature of this government, to say that a small body of men—some four hundred or five hundred in number—shall elect the great officers of the State, and to say, that they shall not be elected by the people. Sir, I am opposed to the establishment or continuance of any such principle. It is not a question of electing those officers by a majority of the people. Your compromise plan does not provide for that in its practical effect. You provide, that four out of five shall be elected upon this floor, instead of being elected by the people at all. But, gentlemen should recollect, that if they elect these officers by plurality, they do not vote against electing by a majority. If a majority of the people of the Commonwealth are in favor of any one candidate for governor, a majority will elect, whether the rule be established, that the plurality or the majority shall elect. But, if you cannot get a majority, then the plurality rule provides the nearest approach to a majority, that you can get. For these reasons I cannot support that part of the first of the compromise resolutions.

The last portion of it, also seems to me to be somewhat objectionable. It says, that in the election of representatives to the legislature, a majority shall be required upon the first trial, but that a plurality shall prevail upon the second trial. Now, if the plurality is to prevail, why not adopt it at once? Why not let it prevail at the first trial? By your proposition, in many places, the first trial will be a mere tentative. The people will say, that the first trial will amount to nothing—that they will vote for anybody just to try their hands. Then, upon the second trial, comes the real contest—and it is not apt to be near so fair a contest—not so fair an expression of the public opinion, as if the people knew beforehand, that the first trial would settle the whole matter. Now, Sir, I submit it to the judgment of gentlemen better acquainted with town affairs than I am, although I am somewhat acquainted with them. It is not true, as the gentleman from Boston remarked, that I have never been in a town meeting in all my life. I lived in the town of Cambridge, and attended their town meetings, until Cambridge became a city, and they would not give me any more town meetings to attend. I say, I appeal to gentlemen who are conversant with the proceedings of town affairs, if it is not true, that if the people know beforehand, that the first vote is to be decisive, they would not give a fuller vote, and whether we should not have more fully an expression of the popular voice, than upon any second trial? Why, after the first vote is taken, a few of the leading politicians in the towns will settle the matter among themselves. When the moderator announces the vote, that there is no choice, a majority being required upon the first ballot, and another ballot is immediately opened, what is the consequence? The consequence must be, that a few of the leading men will put their heads together, agree upon some candidate, and he will go right in. Will not that be the result? The second trial will follow so closely upon the first, that the people will not have time to consult together at all; no time for deliberation; and so the whole matter will be settled by a few of the leading politicians. It seems to me, therefore, that as to the towns, we had better not tie the hands of the legislature. I think we had better allow them to remain as they are, for the present, but to leave the matter in the hands of the legislature, so that, if in the course of time, they get tired of their majority elections, they can come to the legislature, and the legislature can release them, and give them the plurality system. I am willing that they should have the plurality rule, if it should be found expedient for them; but I think it would not be a wise course for us to tie their hands, and the hands of the legislature, in relation to the matter, by declaring in the Constitution, that they shall elect by plurality.

Now, I submit to the Convention, whether it would not be the simplest thing after all, and whether it would not be better to adopt the plurality system for everything except town affairs, and leave that matter in the hands of the legislature. I had prepared an amendment to this effect, but of course it is not in order to offer it now. I hope, however, that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that something like that result will be reached—that we shall adopt the plurality plan throughout, except in regard to the town elections, and that they may be left to the legislature to provide.

Mr. TRAIN, of Framingham. I move the previous question.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I hope the previous question will not be sustained. It is very easy as we have just heard, for gentlemen to adopt a principle and then to suit their plans to it. There is another principle which should be illustrated, if we had an opportunity, and it is a principle which happens to be in accordance with the whole scheme, as I said before—

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon sustaining the previous question.

Mr. KEYES. I only want to say this, that this is not the time to take the vote; I think this is a very important question—

Mr. TRAIN. I rise to a question of order, that the gentleman is not discussing the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand the gentleman as yet to be debating the main question.

Mr. KEYES. I believe that this Convention thoroughly understand this question, and the principles upon which this plan was adopted in Committee.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. KEYES. I am stating the reasons why discussion should be had, and why the previous question should not be sustained at this time. Drummers have been sent here to assist my friend for Manchester (Mr. Dana,) to help the Whig party to sustain its life; and the reason why I hope the previous question will not be sustained is, if the case was thoroughly understood, that the question would not be decided as it might be under other circumstances.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I wish to say a single word in relation to this motion for the previous question, which has been moved by my very adroit and skillful friend from Framingham, (Mr. Train). I wish to say nothing in regard to this matter which is not distinctly understood by the members of this Convention. The delegate for Abington has hinted at the matter. I wish to say that one of the reasons why the previous question should not be taken at this time, is this: we now see the advantage, to which allusion has so often been made, that the city of Boston has upon this floor. I wish simply—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Natick, that he is entering upon a wider field of discussion than the motion for the previous question would warrant.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say in relation to this matter, drummers have been out, and gentlemen from sick beds are here; and we are to have the advantage of the votes of these gentlemen, at this particular time, for the first time in the session; and we are to be cut off from the discussion of this question. Debate is to be stopped, and the previous question forced upon us at a particular time to serve a particular purpose.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I hope the previous question will be sustained. This is a question simply upon a reconsideration. If we vote in favor of a reconsideration, the whole question is open for discussion, and as much discussion as the gentleman for Abington and the gentleman from Natick could desire. It is a mere matter of reconsideration, and I hope, therefore, that the motion will prevail.

Tuesday,] ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—ALLEN—LORD—WHITNEY—HILLARD—TRAIN—BRIGGS—GRAY. [July 19th.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I was gone out of the Convention a short time, and on returning, to my great surprise, I find this state of things existing. Before I went out, upon one side of the House there was an earnest desire that there might be free opportunity to discuss all important questions here, and that no limitation should be imposed upon debate. In accordance with the wish of gentlemen upon that side of the House, and expressed in various quarters by their leading men, I thought we were to have a free and full discussion. But, to my astonishment, I find those same gentlemen, pressing, at this moment, the demand for the previous question. If they insist upon it, I trust that they will not complain hereafter, if the majority should adopt rules, such as may suit them, upon the subjects discussed, and rigidly adhere to them. I think that if members of this Convention have occasion to look back to the changes of opinion which have been expressed on other occasions, and manifested from time to time by that same minority, they will see, in the sudden change which has taken place in all their views this very morning, and this very hour, upon the subject of free discussion, that some motive, not quite so apparent to all, may exist, for pressing the previous question at this time. I hope it will not be urged, because upon the right decision of the question now under consideration, —I will not say how it should be decided,—may depend the whole result of this Convention; for gentlemen may rely upon it, that this is a question of vital importance to the business we have before us, and the adoption or rejection of our labors may depend upon our harmonious action in this matter. In a Convention so equally divided in regard to this subject, it seems to me the most unfitting time that has occurred, from the commencement of our deliberations, for the adoption of any rule which shall put an end to all debate.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. There is one consideration which influences me very strongly to desire a vote upon this question. I wish to see how gentlemen feel under it. That is the only consideration which induces me to vote for the previous question. When debate has been stopped, over and over again, upon a subject which had not been half discussed, gentlemen felt remarkably well, and I desire to see how they feel now, when there is a proposition to stop debate upon a subject which has been debated more than all others put together. The principle I hold to, in regard to this matter, is, that debate, like trade, should regulate itself, and that when the subject is exhausted, debate will cease. That is the principle upon which I act. Now and then gentlemen will feel it necessary to talk a little against time. For example, if it should be deemed inexpedient to take the yeas and nays fifteen minutes before the hammer should come down for the hour of adjournment, it would be well enough to talk up to that time, because you cannot conveniently take the vote at that time. It has been suggested here that the House is fuller, and that there are more gentlemen to vote here now than there were before; but this fact, to my mind, is no argument against the previous question. If there were three hundred and twenty gentlemen present when the question was taken before, and there should happen to be three hundred and fifty here now, I do not think that is any reason why we should not vote now in preference to voting in a thin House.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Salem, as he did to the gentleman from Natick, that he is entering upon a wider field of remark than the motion for the previous question would warrant.

Mr. LORD. I was not replying to what the gentleman from Natick said about drummers, but only speaking to what the gentleman said about there being more persons here now than there were before.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I think the previous question should not prevail at this time, because the main question is a reconsideration of the vote which we have just taken. We have had no time to review and reconsider the question, and we do need the time until to-morrow for the examination of this question. The previous question, if sustained, will precipitate this important question upon us now, at a time when we are unprepared for it. I think, after a tie vote upon this matter, and which has been decided by the vote of the President of the Convention, that we do need twenty-four hours for a consideration of the main question, and that gentlemen should not press a reconsideration of this matter upon the spur of the moment. I hope the previous question will not be sustained by the honest and fair-minded men of this Convention. I ask it as a privilege, so that I may reflect upon this question until to-morrow. I may change my vote upon this subject, upon farther consideration, and I do not know what I may do to-morrow. I hope gentlemen will give us all an opportunity of getting more light upon this matter, and for that reason I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. HILLARD, of Boston. It occurs to me, if I understand the operation of the motion to reconsider, that the delegate from Conway will gain the very advantage which he desires. If the motion to reconsider prevails, the whole subject is open for discussion and consideration as it was in the early part of the day. I would suggest, by way of meeting the wishes of all, that we shall agree to take the question to reconsider by yeas and nays, and if that motion should prevail, that we assign some hour to-morrow for taking the question upon the amendment, so that there may be no surprise; for I take it, the difficulty in this matter is, that there is an uneasy feeling in the minds of those who were absent, that they had not voted, and all parties, whatever may be their opinions, will be content with the result, if they have as full expression of the sentiment of the Convention as it is possible to get.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I move that when the vote is taken on the motion for the previous question, it be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. TRAIN, of Framingham. I merely wish to set myself right upon this matter of the previous question. I am not aware that I ever moved the previous question before in my life, although I have had a little legislative experience, not enough, however, to acquire the reputation for adroitness which my friend from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) would give to me; but then it is a habit in our country, to pat each other upon the shoulders, and call each other good fellows. [Laughter.] I rose to address the Convention amid cries all over the House, for the question, and like an adroit lawyer, I covered my retreat by saying that I rose to move the previous question, which I thought would come from me with exceeding good grace under the circumstances. [Laughter.] Then my friend for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) rose, under some degree of excitement, proper excitement I will admit, and desired to make a speech upon this question. With the utmost degree of fairness, I then offered to withdraw my motion, if, after he had made his speech, which I wanted to hear, he would renew the motion; but he would not do that. When you cannot suit others, it is the best way to suit yourself; and, therefore, although I have been interceded with to withdraw the motion, I shall persist in adhering to it, because I think the motion was made fairly and properly. If the Convention choose to reconsider, the whole discussion will be then opened, and those gentlemen who have not spoken, or who wish to repeat their old speeches, can have the opportunity of so doing. Having stated the reasons which induced me to make the motion I did, and having, I trust, set myself right before the Convention, and thanking the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) for the compliment which he has bestowed upon me, I have said all that I desire to say.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I would like to know, if we commence calling the yeas and nays, we lose our dinner? [Laughter.] Mr. President: I shall most certainly vote against the previous question, whether the yeas and nays are taken upon it or not. I feel a little as my friend from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) does. Our friends must feel what it is to be skinned themselves. We have got used to it, so that it hardly makes us smart when the skin is peeled off. But I do not believe in the previous question except upon extraordinary occasions, and I do not think this is one. We have a full house now, and I hope we shall have a vote this afternoon. If we take the question now and should happen to succeed in it, it settles nothing. Sir, no snap judgment here, is worth anything, and it should not be sought by any party or the friends of any measure. On all important questions, I hold that we should let debate run its course. It is very important that it should, and more important that questions should be settled right, than it is that we should settle them before dinner, or to-day, or to-morrow. I wish we could agree upon some time to take this question, and then upon some time to take the main question, if it is reconsidered, and then see that our friends in the city are all here, for I do not think it would be unconstitutional to have them all here once to vote, and I do not think it would be an alarming concentration of power for them all to be here once during this Convention. I wish, for these reasons, and others which might be stated, that we might, by common consent, fix upon some time, either this afternoon or some other, when we will take the vote on this question on the motion, so that we may have a full Convention and a fair vote, and one which will settle the question satisfactorily.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I do not feel disposed to vote for the previous question, and I need not travel over the reasons which have been generally given by other gentlemen; Sir, I have been against limiting debate in any way, either by the previous question or by fixing an hour for taking the question, because I have yet to see a single instance in which there has been any speaking, to to any extent, against time. But I cannot agree with the suggestion of my colleague, to take the question without the yeas and nays, because he will recollect that if the motion for reconsideration succeeds, it is very well. The whole question will be open; but suppose, in taking the question upon the motion for reconsideration by yeas and nays, it is rejected; that vote is final. Now, what I suggest is this: that, under the circumstances, the motion for the previous question should be withdrawn. Then I am ready to go with my friend from Pittsfield and fix some time to take the question, which will give gentlemen an opportunity to debate it to the fullest extent; and when that time comes, if farther debate is really wished, I hope farther time will be given. I should be very glad to see every one of my colleagues, as well as both of the intelligent and respectable members from Pittsfield, and every member of this Convention, present, when the vote is taken; and if I knew of any drum to be beaten which would bring them all in, for the first time in my life, I would lend a hand at the work.

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY, &c. — LORD — HOOPER — BIRD — WILSON.

[July 19th.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. It is my impression, that a motion for the previous question, cannot survive an adjournment. If I am right, inasmuch as we have ordered the yeas and nays on the motion to take the previous question, I will, for the first time in my life, move an adjournment. I ask, if the motion for the previous question lives over an adjournment?

The PRESIDENT. It does not.

Mr. LORD. Then I move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention adjourned until three o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

Reconsideration.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River, moved a reconsideration of the vote, by which the resolves relating to the limitation of the incorporation of towns, was indefinitely postponed.

The motion was placed upon the Orders of the Day, to be considered to-morrow.

Mr. HOOPER. I move that the rule be suspended, so that the motion to reconsider may be considered at this time.

Mr. ASPINWALL, of Brookline. I hope that the rule will not be suspended, but that we shall go on with the unfinished business of the morning.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I think it is hardly worth while to change the order of business, unless there be some special reason for doing so. If the order is to be changed, it ought to be known beforehand. I therefore ask, or shall, before I sit down, that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to suspend the rule, is not debatable.

Mr. LORD. Then, inasmuch as we have, at present, rather a thin House, if the gentleman does not withdraw his motion, I must ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOOPER. I supposed there would be no objection, and that the matter would not give rise to debate; but, as objection is made, I will withdraw my motion.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

Perpetuation of the Records.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, from the Committee appointed under an order of May 5th, to consider and report what measures were necessary for the Convention to adopt, to continue and perpetuate its records, made the following Report:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 19, 1853.

The Committee appointed under the order of the Convention of May 5th, viz.: "Ordered, That a Committee of five be appointed, to consider and report what measures it is desirable for the Convention to adopt, to preserve and perpetuate its Records," have attended to that duty, and submit the following resolves.

For the Committee,

F. W. BIRD, Chairman.

Resolved, That at the close of the session, the Secretaries of the Convention deposit the original Journals, together with the papers of the Convention, in the office of the Secretary of State.

Resolved, That William S. Robinson prepare an Index to the Journal, and procure two thousand copies of the Journal and Index to be printed and bound, on such terms and in such manner as shall be approved by the Committee on the Preservation of the Records, and that he be paid four dollars a day for his services therein.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to draw his warrant on the treasury for such expenses incurred in the execution of the preceding Resolves, as shall be approved by the Committee on the Preservation of the Records.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Commonwealth be requested to distribute copies of the Journal to each member of the Convention, and to all persons and public bodies mentioned in chapter 2, section 2, of the Revised Statutes, excepting members of the Legislature.

The Report having been read, Mr. BIRD moved that it be considered now.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the adoption of the Report of the Committee, it was decided in the affirmative.

Assignment of time for taking the Question.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that ten o'clock, to-morrow, be assigned for taking the question on the resolves on the subject of Elections by Plurality.

Pending which motion, Mr. LORD, of Salem, moved that the Convention proceed to the consideration of the Orders of the Day, which being a privileged motion, had precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Natick. And the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative. And the Convention thereupon proceeded to consider the

Orders of the Day,

The first item being the resolves on the subject of Elections by Plurality.

The pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Otis, Mr. Sumner, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) had been rejected.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays, having been previously ordered, were taken, with the following result—yeas, 146; nays, 188:—

YEAS.

Adams, Benjamin P.	Jackson, Samuel
Aldrich, P. Emory	James, William
Andrews, Robert	Jenkins, John
Aspinwall, William	Jenks, Samuel H.
Atwood, David C.	Johnson, John
Ayres, Samuel	Kellogg, Giles C.
Barrows, Joseph	Kingman, Joseph
Beebe, James M.	Kinsman, Henry W.
Bigelow, Jacob	Knight, Hiram
Bliss, Gad O.	Knight, Jefferson
Bradbury, Ebenezer	Knight, Joseph
Braman, Milton P.	Kuhn, George, H.
Breed, Hiram N.	Ladd, John S.
Brewster, Osmyn	Leland, Alden
Brinley, Francis	Lincoln, Frederic W., Jr.
Briggs, George N.	Littlefield, Tristram
Bullock, Rufus	Livermore, Isaac
Bumpus, Cephas C.	Lord, Otis P.
Carter, Timothy W.	Lothrop, Samuel K.
Chandler, Amariah	Loud, Samuel P.
Chapin, Chester W.	Miller, Seth, Jr.
Choate, Rufus	Mixer, Samuel
Coggin, Jacob	Morey, George
Cogswell, Nathaniel	Morris, Joseph B.
Cole, Sumner	Morton, Marcus
Conkey, Ithamar	Morton, Marcus, Jr.
Coolidge, Henry F.	Noyes, Daniel
Crockett, George W.	Oliver, Henry K.
Crosby, Leander	Orcutt, Nathan
Crowell, Seth	Paige, James W.
Cummings, Joseph	Park, John G.
Dana, Richard H., Jr.	Parker, Adolphus G.
Davis, John	Peabody, George
Davis, Solomon	Pemroy, Jeremiah
Dawes, Henry L.	Powers, Peter
Deming, Elijah S.	Putnam, John A.
Denton, Augustus	Rantoul, Robert
Easton, James, 2d	Read, James
Eaton, Lilley	Reed, Sampson
Ely, Homer	Sargent, John
Eustis, William T.	Schouler, William
Farwell, A. G.	Sikes, Chester
Foster, Aaron	Sleeper, John S.
French, Charles H.	Souther, John
Frothingham, Rich'd, Jr.	Stetson, Caleb
Gardner, Henry J.	Stevens, Charles G.
Gilbert, Wanton C.	Stevens, Granville
Gould, Robert	Stevens, Joseph L., Jr.
Goulding, Dalton	Storror, Charles S.
Goulding, Jason	Sumner, Increase
Gray, John C.	Talbot, Thomas
Green, Jabez	Taylor, Ralph
Greenleaf, Simon	Thomas, John W.
Hale, Artemas	Tileston, Edmund P.
Hale, Nathan	Train, Charles R.
Hammond, A. B.	Tyler, John S.
Hawkes, Stephen E.	Upham, Charles W.
Hayward, George	Upton, George B.
Heard, Charles	Viles, Joel
Henry, Samuel	Walcott, Samuel B.
Hersey, Henry	Wales, Bradford L.
Hewes, James	Walker, Samuel
Heywood, Levi	Weeks, Cyrus
Hillard, George S.	Wetmore, Thomas
Hindsdale, William	Wheeler, William F.
Hobart, Aaron	White, Benjamin
Hopkinson, Thomas	Wilbur, Daniel
Hubbard, William J.	Wildor, Joel
Hunt, William	Wilkins, John H.
Huntington, Asahel	Wilkinson, Ezra
Huntington, Charles P.	Williams, J. B.
Hurlburt, Samuel A.	Wilson, Milo
Hyde, Benjamin D.	Wood, Nathaniel

NAYS.

Abbott, Josiah G.	Allen, Parsons
Adams, Shubael P.	Alley, John B.
Allen, Charles	Alvord, D. W.
Allen, James B.	Baker, Hillel
Allen, Joel C.	Ballard, Alvah

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — WILSON.

[July 19th.

Ball, George S.
 Barrett, Marcus
 Bates, Eliakim A.
 Bates, Moses, Jr.
 Bennett, William, Jr.
 Bennett, Zephaniah
 Bigelow, Edward B.
 Bird, Francis W.
 Boutwell, Geo. S.
 Booth, William S.
 Boutwell, Sewell
 Bradford, William J. A.
 Bronson, Asa
 Brown, Alpheus R.
 Brown, Artemas
 Brown, Hammond
 Brown, Hiram C.
 Brownell, Joseph
 Bryant, Patrick
 Buck, Asahel
 Cady, Henry
 Caruthers, William
 Case, Isaac
 Chapin, Daniel E.
 Chapin, Henry
 Churchill, J. McKean
 Clarke, Alpheus B.
 Clark, Henry
 Clark, Ransom
 Clarke, Stillman
 Cleverly, William
 Crane, George B.
 Cross, Joseph W.
 Cushman, Henry W.
 Cushman, Thomas
 Cutler, Simeon N.
 Davis, Charles G.
 Davis, Ebenezer
 Davis, Isaac
 Day, Gilman
 Dean, Silas
 Duncan, Samuel
 Dunham, Bradish
 Durgin, John M.
 Eames, Philip
 Earle, John M.
 Easland, Peter
 Eaton, Calvin D.
 Edwards, Elisha
 Edwards, Samuel
 Fay, Sullivan
 Fellows, James K.
 Fiske, Emery
 Fisk, Lyman
 Fitch, Ezekiel W.
 Foster, Abram
 Fowle, Samuel
 Fowler, Samuel P.
 Freeman, James M.
 French, Charles A.
 French, Samuel
 Gale, Luther
 Gardner, Johnson
 Gates, Elbridge
 Gilbert, Washington
 Giles, Charles G.
 Giles, Joel
 Gooding, Leonard
 Graves, John W.
 Griswold, Josiah W.
 Griswold, Whiting
 Hadley, Samuel P.
 Hallett, B. F.
 Haggood, Lyman W.
 Haggood, Seth
 Haskins, William
 Hathaway, Elnathan P.
 Hayden, Isaac
 Hazewell, Charles C.
 Heath, Ezra 2d.
 Hewes, William H.
 Hobart, Henry
 Hobbs, Edwin
 Hood, George
 Hooper, Foster
 Howland, Abraham H.
 Hoyt, Henry K.

Hunt, Charles E.
 Hurlbut, Moses C.
 Ide, Abijah M., Jr.
 Jacobs, John
 Kendall, Isaac
 Keyes, Edward L.
 Kimball, Joseph
 Knowlton, J. S. C.
 Knowlton, William H.
 Knox, Albert
 Ladd, Gardner P.
 Lawrence, Luther
 Lincoln, Abishai
 Little, Otis
 Loomis, E. Justin
 Marble, William P.
 Marcy, Laban
 Marvin, Abijah P.
 Mason, Charles
 Meader, Reuben
 Merritt, Simeon
 Monroe, James L.
 Moore, James M.
 Morton, Elbridge G.
 Morton, William S.
 Newman, Charles
 Nichols, William
 Nute, Andrew T.
 Ober, Joseph E.
 Orne, Benjamin S.
 Osgood, Charles
 Packer, E. Wing
 Paine, Benjamin
 Parris, Jonathan
 Parsons, Samuel C.
 Partridge, John
 Peabody, Nathaniel
 Pease, Jeremiah, Jr.
 Penniman, John
 Perkins, Jesse
 Perkins, Noah C.
 Phelps, Charles
 Phinney, Silvanus B.
 Pierce, Henry
 Pool, James M.
 Rawson, Silas
 Rice, David
 Richards, Luther
 Richardson, Daniel
 Richardson, Nathan
 Richardson, Samuel H.
 Rogers, John
 Ross, David, S.
 Royce, James C.
 Sanderson, Amasa
 Sanderson, Chester
 Sheldon, Luther
 Sherril, John
 Simonds, John W.
 Smith, Matthew
 Sprague, Melzar
 Spooner, Samuel W.
 Stacy, Eben H.
 Stevens, William
 Stiles, Gideon
 Strong, Alfred L.
 Taft, Arnold
 Thayer, Willard, 2d
 Thompson, Charles
 Tilton, Abraham
 Tilton, Horatio W.
 Turner, David
 Underwood, Orison
 Vinton, George A.
 Wallis, Freeland
 Walker, Amasa
 Ward, Andrew H.
 Warner, Marshal
 Waters, Asa H.
 Weston, Gershom B.
 Whitney, Daniel S.
 Whitney, James S.
 Wilbur, Joseph
 Williams, Henry
 Wilson, Henry
 Willard
 Winn, Jonathan B.

Winslow, Levi M.
 Wood, Charles C.

Wood, Otis
 Wright, Ezekiel

ABSENT.

Abbott, Alfred A.
 Allis, Josiah
 Appleton, William
 Austin, George
 Bancroft, Alpheus
 Banks, Nathaniel P., Jr.
 Bartlett, Russel
 Bartlett, Sidney
 Beach, Erasmus D.
 Beal, John
 Bell, Luther V.
 Bishop, Henry W.
 Blagden, George W.
 Bliss, William C.
 Brown, Adolphus F.
 Brownell, Frederick
 Bullen, Amos H.
 Burlingame, Anson
 Butler, Benjamin F.
 Childs, Josiah
 Clark, Salah
 Cole, Lansing J.
 Cook, Charles E.
 Copeland, Benjamin F.
 Cressy, Oliver S.
 Crittenden, Simeon
 Crowninshield, F. B.
 Curtis, Wilber
 Davis, Robert T.
 Dehon, William
 Denison, Hiram S.
 DeWitt, Alexander
 Doane, James C.
 Dorman, Moses
 Ely, Joseph M.
 French, Rodney
 Gooch, Daniel W.
 Greene, William B.
 Hall, Charles B.
 Harmon, Phineas
 Haskell, George
 Holder, Nathaniel
 Houghton, Samuel

Absent and not voting, 85.

So the motion did not prevail.

The question recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) to amend the third resolve so as to provide that representatives in the general court be, hereafter, chosen as by law shall be established.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I now move to amend the third resolve by substituting the following:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to provide that in all elections of representatives to the general court, when no election is effected on the first trial, the meetings may be adjourned, from time to time, until the meeting of the legislature to which the said representatives are to be chosen, provided that no one adjournment shall be for a longer time than six days.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I will detain the Convention but a few moments on this question. I am willing, although I am in favor of adhering to the majority system, to depart from that system under the pressure of necessity. By the Report of the Committee, senators are to be chosen by the plurality rule, and county and district officers are also to be chosen by that rule. I see a necessity for this, and I am willing to acquiesce in it. But I see no necessity for making the representatives and town officers elected by the plurality rule; none whatever. Gentlemen may say that it is necessary in order to secure a representation from all the towns in the Commonwealth. I say to gentlemen, you cannot secure a representation by the plurality system. It is competent for the towns of the Commonwealth, when the voters are assembled together, to vote not to send a representative; and if there be three or four political organizations in those towns, and if the plurality rule prevails, the minorities will unite and vote not to send, without any trial at all, or after trying once under the majority system, which the resolutions propose to retain. I say, therefore, to the friends of the plurality system, you certainly gain nothing by its application to the election of representatives; nothing, whatever. You may adopt that rule if you please; but you cannot force the minorities in any of the towns of this Commonwealth to elect a man under the plurality rule. Now, adhere to the majority principle in town elections, and in the election of representatives; take off all constitutional restraints; allow the towns to adjourn from day to day, or from one day to another, not exceeding six days; to call new meetings at their pleasure, from the time the annual meeting is held to the time of the meeting of the legislature, and then, if there be a necessity, there will be a union of men in those towns, and they will elect representatives; and in my judgment, under the majority system, you will secure as full a representation from the towns in this Commonwealth as you can get by the plurality rule, because you cannot take from the people the power to vote not to send, if they choose to do it, under the plurality rule. They will exercise that power. Then let this system stand as a compromise.

I understand that this was the position of affairs when the question was sent to the Committee the second time. A vote, and the largest vote taken during the Convention, was that upon the State officers, by which it was required that they should be chosen by a majority, and it was also agreed by the same vote that senators, county and district officers, should be elected by a plurality; but that in the election of representatives and town officers, a majority should be required. I am ready to stand by that vote, as a compromise. But I do not like this present Report. Gentlemen tell us this is a compromise. What kind of a compromise is it? Why, we agree that your Constitution shall say that the senators shall be elected by a plurality; we agree to elect representatives on the second trial, and all the town officers on the second trial by a plurality. Then we have abandoned the majority rule altogether, as far as the principle is concerned, and we have simply saved the principle so as to apply it to six officers, to be elected by the people of the whole State.

The gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) told us that he saw through this plan. That gentleman is very keen-sighted, and sees all that is to be seen. He sees, or thinks that he sees, the reason why this plan is made. It carries on the face of it something that looks very much like an arrangement for party ends. But, Sir, let us have the representatives and the town officers elected by the majority system. The election of these officers is a question of as much moment and importance as any other question that the people themselves can direct and control in their own primary meetings. And then we have adopted a system, a compromise system, and one which

Tuesday.]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — HOOPER — FRENCH — ABBOTT — GARDNER.

[July 19th.]

I am ready and willing to sustain. But if we are to adopt the Report of the Committee, if we are to elect representatives and town officers by a plurality rule, I say frankly and freely, for one, you may take the plurality system altogether;—take it, and let it have free course and be glorified.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I am exceedingly surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Natick. I had supposed that this Report was a compromise, and had made up my mind to stand by it as such. It is well known, that in the first instance, I was in favor of the plurality system throughout. But I found that gentlemen differed; and I was willing, as I could not get the whole, to take half of it rather than have none. I supposed that the Committee thought this Report equitable, and I came to the conclusion to support it. I confess it has taken me altogether by surprise, that the gentleman has made the motion which he has. The class of officers to which he alludes, is that to which I wish to have the plurality principle apply. I prefer that it should be applied in the first instance; but if we cannot have it in the first instance, let us have it at the second trial, and let town officers be elected in the same manner. The greatest complaint in the town which I represent is, that we have not been able, for several years, to elect our town officers without great delay and inconvenience. Now, we want this remedy, so as to have an opportunity to elect them at the second trial, at least, if we cannot have it at the first. I was in hopes that we should take this Report as a compromise on which we could all stand; so that we should all feel that we have succeeded in obtaining what we wish, in part, at least. I hope that the gentleman from Natick will take this view of the matter, and that we shall adopt the Report without farther amendment, since the Amendment of the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) has been rejected. There seems to me a propriety in making this distinction, if you make any; that you should leave those officers who are to be voted for by the people of the State, so as to apply the majority rule to them. It has been said here that the judges are elected by the people, because they are appointed by a governor who is elected by the people. In the same way, we may say that these officers will be elected by the people, because they will be elected by a legislature which is elected by the people. If the argument is good in one case, it is just as good in the other. Now, in that view, as long as we can have the will of the people represented in the legislature, it is only at second hand that we elect these officers; and I think, that if we exclude any from this rule, these officers are the proper ones to be excluded. There was a strong reason why the senators should be elected by plurality; for if not elected at the first trial by the people, their election was transferred to another constituency, other than the one they represent. The people in the small towns are immediately interested to have this pass, because without it, many of them will fail to be represented. But the gentleman says, we shall not compel them to send representatives, because they may vote not to send, if they please. That is true; but it will seldom take place. The result will be, that when it is found there will be an election, men will take measures to see that the right candidates are put in nomination, and they will attend the polls to see that their election is made secure; consequently, a better class of men will be elected than we have had under our majority system. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail, but that the Report of the Committee will be adopted as it now stands.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. Mr. President: I am rather astonished at the gentleman from Fall River. He appears to want a plurality to elect town officers, and I know that they have been embarrassed in that place on account of not being able to elect their town officers. But I cannot hardly understand what the gentleman wants. To this third resolution I had intended to have offered an amendment, if it had not been done by the gentleman from Natick; because I do not think it looks proper, as it now stands. At the first ballot a majority is to elect; and then it is provided that if a majority fails, an election shall be had by a plurality. Well, Sir, what do you want a second vote for? On the very first vote, you have a plurality, if you do not have a majority. But it seems to me to be proper that the people should not come together upon two bases for electing representatives and town officers; that they should try one at a time, and if that did not succeed, they could have another meeting and time to take breath, and take a sober second thought. Now this accomplishes all the gentleman asks for; for if they are not elected by a majority on the first ballot, they are sure to be elected by a plurality at the second meeting. All the difference is in two meetings. That is all; and I do not see but the gentleman may be accommodated under this amendment. I am in favor of this amendment, and I believe it to be right.

Mr. ABBOTT, of Lowell. I desire to say a single word on the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, and I am free to say that unless that amendment prevails, I, for one, am disposed to put myself on some sort of principle. I am disposed to go for the compromise, or else for the plurality, or else for the majority. [Laughter.] But as the matter is, at this present time, as it seems to me, I am going for neither the one or the other; or, to use a more common expression, the scheme presented by the Committee is "neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring." For my part, I do not wonder that my friend from Fall River is willing to go for what he calls a compromise; but I ask if he expects those who are in the position that I am, those who believe in the majority principle, that it is the true conservative power where the power is in the hands of the people, who believe that a man has a right to shelter himself, and his conscience, and will, behind the heart of the people; I ask if he believes gentleman who believe that, can go for this compromise? A compromise, indeed! It is a compromise which is all on one side. I want to know how much I, as a majority man, get here by this compromise?

I want a majority, or I want something like a majority in the law-making part of this government. I do not care so much whether it be a plurality or a majority in the little petty offices, or the great offices, if you please, where men are chosen every year merely to execute and carry out the laws which are made by the law-making part of the government; but I want a majority in the law-making part of the government, and when I am called upon to vote for the men who are to make the laws, before I have to give up my will and my way, I want to know, and I think I have a right to know, that the majority of the people go for that particular thing. I want the right to call upon a majority, and not upon less than a majority, or upon every little faction that may come up and get so as to number one more than any other faction in the community. Well, Sir, how is it in this compromise, as they call it? You are to vote for your governor, attorney-general, and some other officers—how many I do not know, and do not care—once, and if you do not choose them by a majority, they are to be chosen by whom, I pray you, Sir? They are to be chosen by two bodies, who are to be elected upon the plurality system, and the worst kind of plurality that can be brought into this House, or anywhere else. It is something that gentlemen cannot wink out of sight, or keep out of sight, that you have provided here by your vote, that a majority of the House of Representatives may be chosen by one-third part of the people of this Commonwealth; and now you ask gentlemen to allow your governor and the other great officers to be elected by that House so chosen, and by the Senate, who are elected by pluralities. I do not regard the first trial by majority, as anything—that is merely tentative; it is merely a feeler, as my friend for Manchester, has told us. But, on the next election, you abandon the whole; and yet you talk to me about principle, when you have given up all principle, and all that you have got in exchange, is something to go into the legislature and trade upon. Somebody else besides the gentleman from Salem, will come to the same conclusion, and see the same thing; you have given up principle and got something that you can trade upon in the legislature. That is so apparent, that it sticks out in every direction; the lion's skin is not a quarter large enough to cover something that I will not give any name to. Now, Sir, gentlemen expect persons who believe as I believe, in the majority principle; who believe that it is the true conservative doctrine, that a democrat should put between him and harm; that the great will of the people, the great heart of the people, is seldom if ever wrong, when a majority are suffered to give expression to their views—they expect that we, believing all this, can go for this compromise where we give up everything, and gain nothing that will do us any good—gain nothing that in my humble judgment will not be a reproach to us forever after. I say, if the gentleman from Natick, would take the Report of the Committee as it is, I, for one, am prepared to go for it, and accept the plurality system to that extent. While this is not a fish, that would be, although I agree with him, that this smells mighty fishy.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk. I have not detained the Convention at all upon this question, although I have listened with much interest to the remarks of other gentlemen who have spoken upon it; but, before the question is taken, I wish to express my views in short, in regard to it. I must say, that I am obliged to differ with my friend from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) and many other gentlemen of the Convention, who have stated here, that the people of the Commonwealth were dissatisfied with the present system, and in favor of the plurality system. I think that I know something myself of the views and feelings of the constituency which I represent here, and the people of that part of the State. To be sure, I am from the same county with my friend upon

Tuesday.]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — TRAIN — DAVIS.

[July 19th.

my right, (Mr. Hooper); but, Sir, I do not believe that a majority of the people of the county of Bristol, or of this Commonwealth, are at present prepared for the plurality system, even so far as we have already adopted it. I hope, therefore, that the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Natick, will be adopted. I think gentlemen may, perhaps, make up their minds for themselves, in some instances, better than they can for their constituents. I think they are mistaken in supposing that the people desire so many reforms in the Constitution. We have made some which are salutary and democratic in their tendency, which are well conceived, and which I have no doubt will be adopted by the people; but I doubt very much, whether we have made a judicious reform in the manner in which we have settled the basis of the Senate; I should have preferred that it had been based upon legal voters. In regard to the plurality question, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Natick will prevail; and if it should not, I should like to move an amendment to the third resolution, which would be, to strike out all after the word "election." I should prefer that, but still I shall give my vote, with great pleasure, for the proposition which has been made by the gentleman from Natick. I have not, upon any occasion, detained the Convention with any very protracted remarks; nevertheless, there are some questions which have been taken here, in cases where the previous question has been unexpectedly ordered, or some motion has been made that the question should be taken at a specified time, so that the gentlemen, who, like me, happen to sit in the rear of the hall—though with my own position I am well pleased—have not had an opportunity to express their views. At any rate, I will take the liberty to say, that some questions have been passed upon, in a manner which, in my judgment, needs to be reviewed, before we adjourn. Although I am in favor of bringing the doings of the Convention to a close as speedily as possible, yet I hope, that what we do will be done for the public good; and I hope that this question will be discussed, if need be, until we shall vote down the propositions contained in these resolutions.

Mr. TRAIN, of Framingham. I am very happy, Mr. President, that the gentleman from Natick has moved this amendment; because, Sir, it has given me an opportunity to know that that gentleman, and my friend from Lowell, (Mr. Abbott,) have been brought to a realizing sense of their condition. [Laughter.] In other words, they have been brought to appreciate that the Report of this Committee is by no means such a proposition as this Convention should go for; that it is an attempt, either intentional or unintentional, to place the chief offices in the Commonwealth in the hands of a legislature who may be chosen by a majority or not, as political capital upon which to truck and dicker. Now I think, that, as a member of the minority of this Convention, in relation to the remarks of those gentlemen, I am entitled to speak right out, without keeping anything back. We have been told, by the member for Manchester, by the member from Natick, and by the member from Lowell, all leading minds in this Convention, that that is the result of this Report; and I think that I am assuming nothing, as a member of the Whig party in this Commonwealth, when I say "Amen" to their declaration. We are called upon to vote here that senators and councillors should be chosen by plurality; that district and county officers should also be chosen by plurality; but that six of the highest officers in the Commonwealth should be chosen by a majority, and that failing, that they should be chosen by the legislature. Now I should like to have some gentleman who has astuteness enough, point out the principle upon which this distinction is made. I have been unable to see it. I agree now, as I always have done, to the general doctrine, that if you apply the plurality principle in one instance, you are bound to apply it in the whole. I need not recapitulate the arguments which have been gone over in the course of the debate upon this subject, because it is well understood, and I think it must be conceded that the argument of necessity alone—if it is an argument—should induce the people of this Commonwealth to adopt the plurality system; and I do not rise for the purpose of going into an argument generally upon the propriety of adopting either the plurality or the majority system, but for the purpose of addressing myself to the amendment of the gentleman from Natick; and, Sir, having been born and educated in one of the country towns of Massachusetts, I know of nothing that would be more oppressive, that would create more hardship, and would place the House and Senate more in the hands and in the power of the money of Massachusetts, than this amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Natick. The proposition, as I understand it, is that if a majority fails to elect at the first ballot in any of the towns, they may adjourn from day to day for the purpose of election, provided, that that adjournment does not extend beyond six days. Now, Sir, I desire to know how many towns there are in this Commonwealth where a majority of the people can afford to go to town meeting from the first Monday in November until the snow flies? I do not know of any such towns. In my town we have seven hundred voters, and there may be one hundred and fifty out of the seven hundred who can afford to go to town meeting from the first Monday in November, until the legislature meets, but there are not more than that. At the first town meeting perhaps there will be five hundred voters out of the seven hundred, and you can get a large expression of the people of the town; but at the next election there would not be more than half of the whole number there, and after that there would be but a small fraction. These men find that it is a great expense of time and money to go to town meeting so often; and hence the oppression of the amendment of my friend from Natick. In my own town I have three hundred constituents who work by the day in the cotton factory, or who work at manufacturing boots and shoes; and every day that they go to town meeting causes them a loss of from one to two dollars each, which they need to appropriate to the support of their families; and are we to be told now that we should vote from day to day from the first of November, until the legislature meets, for the purpose of choosing a representative by majority? I put it to members from the country, as a matter of fairness and justice to those who are unable to go to town meetings from day to day, if they should be dragged into any measure, which will, in the end, put the power of administering political affairs into the hands of those few who can thus afford to go when the others cannot?

That is the whole of it. Those who have the most money, those who have the best wind—to use a race-course expression—and the most bottom, will choose their men at last; for they can attend the election after the poor man has been obliged to stay at home, to earn bread for his wife and children. That is what I understand the proposition to be.

Now, I do not know to which party I belong here—whether I am a conservative or a radical. I thought I was a conservative—I was always taught that I was a conservative—but since my friend from Lowell, whom I have known so long, claims to be a conservative, I think it is very possible that I have been driven to the other side. If a desire that my fellow-citizens should be allowed to exercise their rights and to be represented, is radical, then I am a radical. If being driven from the position that but a small part of the seven hundred voters in my town should be allowed to choose a representative is radical, then I am a radical as opposed to that position. Look at the last election in the district in which I live, or in any of the congressional districts in which there were elections last fall; and I say, Sir,—I believe that I cannot be mistaken,—that the representatives to congress who were chosen by pluralities at that election, were chosen by a smaller vote than the minority candidate had at the first election. I believe that to be true; I am not quite so sure how it was in my own district, where Mr. Sabine was chosen; but I am very sure that it was so in the adjoining district, where another gentleman was chosen whom I will not name. Gentlemen will find that just in proportion to the number of elections, just in that ratio does the number of voters diminish; because a majority of the people of the Commonwealth who exercise the right of suffrage cannot afford to go to the polls and vote day after day; and that is the reason why I oppose the amendment of my friend from Natick. I trust that no such amendment will pass. The same reason which he urges in favor of the amendment, as it seems to me, applies with double force against it. He says that if you adopt the plurality principle in these towns, there may be a desire to concentrate against the plurality candidate, and so they will vote not to send. I say it is better that they should have no representative, than that, because they are unable to send a man to represent them properly, they should be misrepresented by a representative upon this floor. These are, briefly, the views which I have entertained in regard to this matter. I did not propose to occupy the time of the Convention as I have done; but I have a very strong feeling and belief, that the principles which I have enunciated are the true principles which should govern the elections in this Commonwealth.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I am very glad, Sir, that the gentleman from Natick has seen fit to move any amendment which will shape, or which will have the tendency to shape, the Report of the Committee. I agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Lowell, that I see no rule—I see no principle—I see no compromise in the Report of the Committee; and I have not yet seen that the chairman of the Committee which made that Report, has evinced any desire to recommend it farther than by thus offering it to this Convention. He has not defended it, nor is he present here

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—BRIGGS—KEYES.

[July 19th.]

to take charge of it; and certainly, if the Convention will read the preface to the Report, I think they will perceive that he has given no reasons there which will recommend it to this body. I am glad, Mr. President, that this amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Natick, because it is, in some degree, like that which was offered in Committee of the Whole, yesterday, by myself; and I certainly do not care which amendment prevails, if either of them has any tendency to prevent the election of town officers by plurality; because I regard them as substantially the same. I rise, at this time, to state one reason why the plurality system should not prevail in any election—more especially in town elections and in the elections of representatives—and it is a reason which I have not seen or heard stated. It is more particularly applicable to town and city elections. It seems to me that elections by plurality, for town officers and town representatives, would be the means of introducing a political demoralization here, which the experience of other States has shown us almost necessarily follows in town and municipal affairs. I ask gentlemen of this Convention whether they believe that if the majority system had prevailed in the city of New York, the country and the world would have seen that spectacle of corruption in the aldermen of the city of New York, which has now become a matter of history!

I believe that plurality in elections for representatives, as well as for town officers, tends directly to that end; and moreover, that if any local object is to be gained, if any particular private speculation is in view, in a town or city; if a street is to be out in a certain direction, or a new one laid out through some man's land, or any other particular object is to be attained, all that they have to do is to get a caucus; and while the more silent, honest, but careless voters are slumbering in security at home, or are divided upon other matters, this caucus nomination is brought out under the guise of party, and before the majority of the citizens are aware, by the vigilance and activity of men intent upon a private purpose, they carry their election under the plurality system. It was for that reason,—a reason I did not state before, because I supposed it was the sense of the Convention that, without debate, many parts of the Report of the Committee would be rejected,—that I offered this amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. It has been said that politics makes strange bed-fellows, and I believe that Conventions do also. But a little while ago I found myself voting point blank against the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and, I believe, the gentleman from Lowell, over the way. Now, Sir, I find myself in their ranks, an humble supporter of the proposition of the gentleman from Natick, although I could wish that he would modify it a little. I have made inquiry, a great many times, of gentlemen who, I suppose, would know something about it, how it happens that that provision came into the Constitution that the towns were obliged to elect their representatives in one of four days,—first on regular election day, then at two adjournments, and then on the fourth Monday in November,—and I must say that I have never yet had a sufficient reason assigned. The gentleman from Framingham has given, perhaps, as good a reason as can be given, which is, that it is not advisable that the people should be called together too frequently for the purpose of voting. That, however, is not a satisfactory reason to me. I should prefer to adopt the system of permitting the people to hold meetings as long as they pleased for election purposes, even if they did not succeed, down to the very day of the adjournment of the legislature. I would carry out what we have carried out here. I see before me the respected gentleman who succeeds our lamented colleague, whom we last week put into the grave, who takes his seat on the second day of the week during which the Convention have declared that we should close our labors. Is there any objection to that? None whatever. Would there have been any objection to it if the people had seen fit to have voted on the matter ten times? None whatever. And, Sir, if you will not give the people such a Constitution as will permit them to elect their officers on the first ballot, what earthly reason can be assigned why they should not be allowed to try until they can come to a final determination, and elect a man according to their own mind? I would not provide that they should not adjourn for a longer period than six days. I see no necessity for any provision of that kind. Leave the matter to the people of the towns. Let them adjourn for as short a time, or as long a time, as they please. Leave it to them; and then I would adopt a provision in the Constitution to the effect that the towns which are entitled to representation, and which have not chosen a representative, may send a man to the legislature any day previous to the last day of the session. I shall, however, vote for the proposition as it is.

One word more, Mr. President. Gentlemen complain of the Report of the Committee. Why in the world should they? They say that it contains no principle. Why, Sir, does it not contain all principles? [Laughter.] Who is there that ought not to be satisfied with it? Do you want an election by a majority? Governor, lieutenant-governor, treasurer, attorney-general, and auditor, must be elected by the good old-fashioned method of a majority—of what? Why, Sir, they must come up here and be elected by representatives chosen by one-third of the people. [Laughter.] Can any majority man be dissatisfied with that? Do you want a plurality? Your plurality men—of whom I have the honor to be one—why, Sir, your senate is to be elected by a clean plurality, and so are your county officers. Do you want both principles? Look at your town representatives, and your municipal elections. Do you want a majority system? There you have it, and if you cannot elect upon that system, then you have the privilege of trying the plurality plan; and yet, here we are, grumbling at this Report—a Report which furnishes individuals everything they want in that line, as far as it goes. Now, it seems to me, that we are making a mistake. I say, with all respect to the Convention—I know we have no right to talk to them, but I know, also, that they are civil gentlemen, and they will bear with me—I say, I believe at this moment, that the great people of the State of Massachusetts, are looking up to this House for the adoption of the plurality system. I may be mistaken; if I am, I am mistaken; but that is my opinion. As to the majority system, have they not felt the inconvenience of it, year after year; and have not members of different parties, on different occasions, advocated the plurality system? And are there not numbers of gentlemen,—I say it with all respect; I do not intend it, as my friend from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) would say, as a "fling,"—are there not gentlemen, whose ears listen to me, that came here strong plurality men, who have abandoned that notion, and has it not been assigned by some, as a reason for abandoning it, that the Whigs have come up here in one solid phalanx in favor of it? And is that a sufficient reason? Mr. President: with some gentlemen I have no doubt that that reason is all-sufficient. If the people want it, is there any danger in adopting it? And, if they do not want it, no man ought to go for it; and, as far as I know, those who cooperate with me in political affairs out of the Convention, at home, and who have expressed their opinions honestly, have entertained this opinion, though they may have changed that opinion, as all honest men will do when they see sufficient reason for doing so.

I say, Sir, without occupying more of the time of the Convention, that I seriously wish gentlemen would attend to the arguments that have been presented to them, not on this side of the House, but from their own friends. I wish they would come forward and answer the arguments of my friend for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) on this subject, or carry out those principles which but three hours ago were so strongly shown to be the sense of the Convention. This is certainly an important subject; one which strikes deeply at our political rights, and which will have an important effect upon those rights for years to come. I would wish that this question should be met and decided upon its merits, and that we should carry out fully and fairly, and clearly and plainly, what I believe to be the unmistakable indications of the public wish. But, Sir, if that cannot be done, for one individual, I am disposed to get as near to it as I can; and, with the present aspect of the proposition before the House, I shall support most cordially the proposition of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) though I wish he would present it in a somewhat modified form.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I should not have risen to say another word to the Convention, on this subject, had it not been for the fact, that it has been mentioned, several times, that the chairman of the Committee which reported these resolutions, is absent, and that absence been construed as being intentional on his part. And, as I had as much to do with that Report as he had, and as it has been assailed as having no principle, and it having been asserted, again and again, that no good reasons can be assigned for the several points it embraces, I wish to say a word or two in its defence.

The gentleman from Plymouth (Mr. Davis) is opposed to it, because he regards it as a monster, without character, without principle, and without everything else that, in the remotest degree, could recommend it. But, Sir, I immediately saw the reason why he opposed it. He had offered an amendment, similar in its provisions to that which is now pending, as offered by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and which was rejected by the Committee of the Whole. That is a sufficient reason for his opposition.

Then, the gentleman from Lowell (Mr. Adams) is similarly situated. He made a very proper speech, in favor of the majority system—and I am

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — KEYES — SCHOULER — WILSON.

[July 19th.

sorry that we had not many speeches of the same kind—a long time ago. But it is too late to make them now. There has been a great deal said here about “principle;” but it strikes me, Mr. President, that there is very little principle in the whole matter. Now, Sir, here is a complete compromise; not like the compromises we hear of in some other parts of the country, which contain matter which nobody can adopt; and, Sir, I contend that there is a good reason for every one of these propositions. What were the complaints before? They were not made on the ground of principle, at all. There is not a man on the floor of this hall, who would wish to say, before the people, that the majority principle is not the only and the proper principle that ought to be adopted; and the moment you depart from it, you lessen the government, and degrade it, in every sense of the word. And, as I said before, the only principle about it is, on the ground of inconvenience, and its only effect to destroy one party and permit another party to rise into power.

Now, Sir, I say that we had evidently abandoned the idea of coming to any decision on the ground of any distinct and positive principle; and that was the reason why the Committee went out to see if we could not devise some plan on which we could harmonize. In the early part of the day, I explained briefly some of the reasons which had operated upon the Committee, and some of the advantages which would result from the adoption of the Report. In regard to the town system, every-body knows that it extends the privileges of the people to give them more than one ballot. Why do they wish it? It is for their own satisfaction and convenience. When they cannot agree upon the caucus nominations, they can have a second choice—a choice emphatically of their own, without the intervention of a caucus; and there is, therefore, no inconvenience in the arrangement, so far as it regards the towns. If they say: “Let us decide upon the matter to-day,” they will do so; and, after having voted once and come to no decision, they may have twenty candidates if they please. Here, then, in these propositions, there is a fair compromise on both sides.

Now, it was said by the gentleman from Natick, that if the people, at a town meeting, could not agree on a candidate, they could agree to adjourn; and that, therefore, the majority would rule. But, Sir, it is not so. The polls are open at nine o'clock, and there are no majorities there to adjourn on this system; and they will go on and take a vote, and after they have made a count, and decided that they will have no election, then the majority rules.

The gentleman from Lowell, said that the House of Representatives, by this plan, may be elected by a third party, in Massachusetts. Why, Sir, the moon may be made of green cheese, for anything I know. A great many things, may be; but may bees do not fly in July or August. We all know that all this talk about inequalities in representation, is humbug, from beginning to end. It is all absurdity, and reminds me of a conversation I had with a gentleman from Boston, the other day, who told me, with a long countenance, that this inequality was perfectly awful. I asked him if it had ever occurred to him, that during the last ten years, he had exercised sixty-six times more power in the legislature than I had; and that while that was the case he had never thought there was any necessity for a change in the Constitution? I told him that I lived in a town having 4,500 inhabitants, electing one representative every year; that I voted for one representative every year, while he voted for forty-four representatives; that he elected one representative for every 3,100 of the population of Boston, and I one for 4,500; and that he had sixty-six times more power in the legislature, than I had; and yet he had lived under the system for ten long years, and said that all was equal enough, and answered every-body's purpose well enough. There was no ruin and destruction, under that system. The country towns, Sir, are to be opposed to each other always. Why, Sir, if you had a decent party, here in Boston, one half of the country towns would go for you. [Laughter.] Therefore, these towns are divided against each other, and this vast accumulation of power in the country is just as much for the benefit of cities, as for anybody else, and they can calculate upon it if they only behave themselves.

Now, as I said before, I felt in duty bound to go for the Report, because I thought it was made to meet the wishes of the members of this Convention, a wish expressed by a previous vote. It has not given everything to one side, and kept everything from the other, but has divided the spoils. But now that gentlemen see fit not to accept of it, the obligation I felt under to support it, is removed from me. I do not care whether any more of it be adopted, or not; and I will simply say, in defence of this Report, that it answers the purpose for which the Committee were sent out to make it. It answers that purpose as completely and as fully, as any report, made by anybody possibly could. It is a compromise, and a fair one, giving to each party what belongs to each, and there is good reason for each paragraph in it.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. The gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) has said that politics make us acquainted with strange bed-fellows, but that is not half so strange as the speech just made by the gentleman who represents Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) for there is no man in this State, I might, perhaps, say there is no man in the United States, who has spoken more frequently, and more bitterly against all kinds of compromise than that gentleman; and yet he comes forward here in this Convention, finding that the chairman of the Committee shirks from the responsibility, and takes upon himself the responsibility of advocating this compromise Report.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. Will the gentleman from Boston allow me a word of explanation?

Mr. SCHOULER. Most certainly I will.

Mr. WILSON. My friend from Boston has made a remark which I am sure is unjust, and which he will consider so, when he ascertains the facts. The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) to whom he referred as shirking the responsibility of this Report, was compelled, by death in his brother's family, to be absent this afternoon. Justice to him requires that I should make this explanation.

Mr. SCHOULER. That is a matter which I did not know. But the gentleman from Lowell was here yesterday all day, and also has been here to-day during the whole discussion until this afternoon, and he has not put forth any defence of this Report. But the gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) takes up the gauntlet; a gentleman who has been opposed to all kinds of compromises—who has stood upon the pinnacle of principle, has become the advocate, par excellence, of compromise. And what has he made out of it? He said it was the compromise for which this Committee was sent out of the Convention to make. Who ordered them to make it? Where was it made? In coffee-houses, and pot-houses.

Mr. KEYES. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, from his own experience in going to coffee-houses and pot-houses to make compromises, he judges that this Report came from the same place? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHOULER. I did not mean anything personal by my remarks, and I am sorry that the gentleman should suppose I did. When I spoke of coffee-house and pot-houses, I did not intend any personal reflections upon the gentleman who represents Abington; but I have heard, and other people have heard, that the compromise for the basis of representation which was brought into this House, was concocted over a dinner-table down near a certain coffee-house. That the gentleman will not deny, because if he does, I can prove it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEYES. I do not know how far my opinions may have accorded with others who have considered and talked over this matter, everywhere, almost; but, Sir, this entire Report of the Committee, with the exception of one single paragraph, was prepared by myself at home, and submitted by me to the Committee. I have not dined in any coffee-house, or any restaurant during the whole session, and have been at no dinner, or public display of any character, except once, and then I spent five minutes in a caucus, where I saw nothing but a lamp upon the table. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHOULER. It was the remark of an English poet, “may not a man have a house in his own inn.” I supposed that the gentleman who signed the Report was the concoctor of it, and he is the gentleman who represents Lowell, (Mr. Butler).

Mr. KEYES. I will state that the principles of this Report were adopted mainly during the absence of that gentleman. Being afterwards submitted to him, he agreed to them, and signed his name to the Report.

Mr. SCHOULER. All I judged from, was the signature of the Report, and that is the signature of the gentleman from Lowell, and I presumed he was the chairman of the Committee, for he made the first speech to explain the Report; but now it appears that the gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) is not only the defender of the compromise, but the author of the compromise. He has brought in an omnibus bill, and asks us to go for it. It is a bill which he cannot even get his own friends to support. I dislike omnibuses, any way. It was said yesterday, it has been said to-day, and it will be said hereafter, and it cannot be denied—and, as the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Abbott,) who spoke this afternoon, well put it, it cannot be winked out of sight, and it wont go if you do wink it out—that, by this basis of representation, one-third of the people of Massachusetts, can have a majority in this House. That is the point which the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Abbott,) put to the Convention this afternoon, and the fact cannot be gainsayed, however much we may talk about

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—SCHOUler—HATHAWAY—HILLARD.

[July 19th.]

compromises, however much we may try to enlist the sympathies of this body by calling this a compromise.

I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Natick. I go for the representation of our towns, and of our cities; and I go for that, because I think every man, woman, and child in Massachusetts, should always be represented in the legislature; and that they should be the makers of the laws. If we adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Natick, we will have the great difficulty and the great objection which lies against the present Constitution, for it leaves the Constitution, in that respect, precisely where it now is.

The gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) in speaking yesterday, said it is no great inconvenience if a hundred towns are left out of the legislature. Now, Sir, I take issue with him upon that point. I say, there is an inconvenience and a wrong about it, which no compromise and no speech can overcome; because these people, not represented in the legislature, are still bound to obey the laws which other people make for them. It was to get rid of this town representation of small towns, and parts of the Commonwealth, which we came here principally, among other things, to perform; and, by the district system, we would have obviated the evils to which I refer.

The gentleman from Natick, and others who have discussed this question, have not looked at it outside of the small towns. He gives the small towns the right to vote two or three times every day, from the first Monday of November up to the time of the assembling of the legislature. Although we have cut down the representation of the cities unequally with that of the towns, still this makes the inequality still greater, because in the cities we cannot have elections every day. When we once get together for that purpose, we have to remain, for the mayor and aldermen cannot adjourn the meetings in the cities, as can be done in the towns. You may vote five or six times in the small towns, but you cannot do it in the cities; and, as the Constitution now stands, I do not see how we can obviate it at all. We can have but two elections—one, the annual election, and the other on the fourth Monday of November. I say this is not fair; because it gives to one part of the Commonwealth the right to try to elect a number of times, and allows the cities to try only twice.

But, the farther we go into the consideration of this matter, the more we see the difficulties. There are but two courses to pursue, and, as long as we keep to the principle of either, we keep in a straight line. I can see why some should travel in one line, and prefer the majority rule, and why others should pursue the other, and prefer the plurality principle. If gentlemen are in favor of the majority rule, say so, and stick to it. If they are in favor of the minority principle, stick to that, without compromise, and then we shall have a Constitution which is plain. If we adopt either the one course or the other, the people will know what it is, and it will operate equally throughout the State. The more we discuss this matter, the greater will be seen to be the difficulty of any attempt to compromise a principle; to attempt to put into the fundamental law of the Commonwealth, a provision which has no principle whatever in it, and never was intended to have any principle in it. I trust, that as the representatives of the people, we shall see the necessity, when we are framing an organic law, of founding it upon principle. Unless we do so, it will not stand. All expediency, all compromise, seeks something beside principle, and will fall. I trust we will throw overboard this whole compromise platform, upset the omnibus, and adopt a principle, and stand by it through and through.

I do not wish to consume the time of the Convention. I rose merely for the purpose of showing the absurd position in which the gentleman for Abington (Mr. Keyes) places himself, and from which I do not see that he will be able to extricate himself.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. I am always extremely anxious to know precisely what I am called to vote upon, and I ask the indulgence of the Convention for a moment, upon this matter. In this part of the House there are various opinions as to the provision of the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson). My friend from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) says it contains the majority principle, and so I understand the gentleman from Natick to say; but if I understand the proposition, it is this, and nothing more: That upon the failure of an election of representatives, town meetings may be adjourned, from time to time, until an election shall be had. I do not pretend to give the precise language of the amendment, but that is the substance of it. I ask the gentleman from Natick where, in his amendment, he finds the majority of all the voters in an election required to effect an election, and wherein does it differ from the provisions of our present Constitution? Where is there any provision in his amendment to prevent the legislature, the very first day of their session, in January next, from passing a law, providing that thereafter a plurality may or shall elect? What violation would there be in that, of any principle or provision which he has incorporated in his proposition? If I am wrong in reference to this matter, I should like to be now corrected.

In consequence of the Convention, the other day, refusing to have a proposition read so that the Convention might understand it, and believing that all the Convention did not understand the precise proposition contained in this amendment, a few moments since I went to the Chair, and reexamined it, and I found my impression true, that there was nothing in it to prevent the legislature from saying that a plurality may or shall elect. My friend from Worcester, (Mr. Allen,) suggests to me there is nothing in the present Constitution which requires that a majority of votes shall be required for an election of a representative. I agree with him, and I can find nothing in the Constitution which would have prevented, in times past—from 1780 up to the present moment—the legislature from providing, by law, that a plurality might elect; and the same difficulty, it seems to me, is involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Natick, if he intended to require a majority of all the electors to effect an election. In order that the Convention may understand the matter, and not be misled—which I do not believe the gentleman from Natick designed should be the case—I call for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HILLARD, of Boston. I think this Report, when we take it in connection with its parents and its pedigree, is rather a singular document. In this Convention, I, in common with the minority party, am only a passenger on board ship, not responsible for the course of navigation; but, from some symptoms that develop themselves, there seems to be a likelihood of a mutiny in the fore-castle, in which case, we may be able to get a look at the log-book, and learn where we are, and where we are going.

As to the majority and plurality rules, I assent, substantially, to the views of the delegate for Manchester, (Mr. Dana). The plurality rule, it seems to me, ought to be applied to the election of the governor and all officers chosen by the general action of the whole State, but not to the election of town officers, or representatives. This is just reversing the application of the Report before us. That document reminds me of the horse advertised for a show, that had his head where his tail ought to be. But we are told that as we cannot have the whole of the principle, we must be content with what we can get. The gentleman for Abington (Mr. Keyes) was, in my judgment, right, in the doctrines he just now laid down and defended, with his usual courage and frankness. He said the Report did not pretend to push one principle to its extreme, but that it was a compromise; a compromise of principles. So far, so good. But I never expected to live to see the day when the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) and the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) would talk so glibly of compromises. Especially should I have thought that the word would have stuck in the throat of the latter gentleman, like Macbeth's "Amen." Perhaps he has been denouncing compromises so long, that he has learned to speak the word easily. It is only on this supposition, that I can account for its having been spoken so trippingly on the tongue, as it was just now.

I am one of those unprincipled men who believe, and always have believed in the necessity of compromises. My household consists of two persons, and I find I cannot govern it without daily compromises; [laughter:] and as to undertaking to govern a community of a million of souls, without compromises, it is just as impracticable as it would be to pass from one point to another without passing through the intermediate points. I go for compromise in this matter; but, as I said before, I would have transposed the rules, adopting that of plurality for the governor and other State officers; but not extending it to town meetings.

I spoke a moment or two ago of symptoms of mutiny in the fore-castle. So far as we can learn from what we can hear through the bulkheads—

Mr. KEYES, for Abington, (interrupting). I am not very particular, generally, about what place is assigned me by gentlemen; but in this instance, I beg that the gentleman from Boston will say cabin, or quarter-deck, and not fore-castle.

Mr. HILLARD, (resuming). Well, Sir, from whatever part of the ship the voice comes, we learn from it that the Committee were moved by the wish to keep political power in the hands of the party which now enjoys it. The line of legitimate succession was not to be broken. This is a legitimate motive for political conduct, and I think the better of the gentleman for Abington for his frank avowal of it. We all feel this; we all act upon it; but we do not often speak it out so openly. There are but two houses in this world, Sancho Panza says, the house of Have, and

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY. — HILLARD — WHITNEY.

[July 19th.

the house of Want. Just now, it is my house that wants, and his house that has. I profess to be a party man; and I hold that the preservation of party organization and the maintenance of party ascendancy are motives upon which all party men must of necessity act, to a certain extent.

Now, as to the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) so far as I understand it, I am ready to go for it. But I admit that I have no claim to speak upon this subject with any authority, for I have not been in a town meeting since I was twelve or fourteen years old. For this reason, I am ready to admit that the testimony of the gentleman from Framingham, (Mr. Train,) is much more important than any I, who have lived in a city all my life, am able to bring. But so far as I am able to judge, I hold, that in town meetings, the rule of the majority should always be applied strictly and exclusively. I would keep out of the town meetings the plurality principle, and under no circumstances, nor for any considerations, would I allow it to intrude here. The town meeting is a pure democracy; and as I hold to the government of the majority, so far as it is practicable, as an essentially democratic principle—as this is the very breath of the nostrils of democracy, I would not introduce any principle at variance with it into these primitive democracies. And, Sir, I do not believe that in the long run, the application of the majority principle here will occasion any serious inconvenience; because, the elements which make the application of the plurality rule necessary in many cases, cannot apply in small towns, or in towns of moderate size, because I assume that you cannot have three parties acting separately—and I wish to be understood as making the remark generally, without reference to the present state of things. I say, you cannot have three parties acting separately, unless there are prizes or objects of some considerable importance to be struggled for; and I do not think that any offices or favors that are to be distributed or given out in the town meeting, are of sufficient consequence to produce that result. The natural tendency in our communities is for men to arrange themselves under the banners of one of two parties. The worst that could happen would be, that a certain number of towns would go unrepresented. This would be no public or general misfortune. It would be an inconvenience to the particular constituency not represented, and no more. In plain English, it would be nobody's business but theirs.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I have a strong desire to say a few words, before a final vote is had upon this subject. Gentlemen from different sides of the House have attacked this Report, it seems to me, without a reasonable consideration of its merits. Some gentlemen tell us there is no principle involved in this whole matter; that we are only discussing the adoption of a rule for governmental action. Others urge that the embodiment of true republican principle lies in the plurality rule alone; while others claim that any departure from a positive majority, is a departure from the true democratic faith. Now, Sir, from what I heard in our previous discussions upon this subject, I had been led to believe that every member of this Convention concurred in the opinion, that the first principle upon which all our civil institutions were established, was, that a majority of the people were only entitled to rule; that sovereignty was acknowledged to reside only in the expressed will of a majority of the whole people. I did suppose that upon this, as a principle, we were all agreed; that we had agreed that this was the principle upon which the Constitution of 1780 was founded; and that this was the principle upon which our present Constitution now rested, as an established fundamental doctrine; and that under the present Constitution, this idea was intended to be carried out in all our elections; but it is true, in the present Constitution, in case the majority of the people fail to elect the governor of the Commonwealth, then the people delegate their authority to their agents. Let us see what the Constitution now says:—

“But if no person shall have a majority of votes, the House of Representatives shall, by ballot, elect two out of four persons who had the highest number of votes, if so many shall have been voted for; but, if otherwise, out of the number voted for; and make return to the Senate of the two persons so elected; on which, the Senate shall proceed, by ballot, to elect one, who shall be declared governor.”

Gentlemen speak of a great departure in this Report, from the majority principle, as recognized in our present Constitution, in this respect. Why, Sir, the Report is precisely the principle of the present Constitution. It is an embodiment of the same idea precisely, although the language is somewhat changed. You have provided, by this Report, that certain officers now elected by the legislature shall be elected by the people, if they can elect them by a majority of their votes, but if they cannot so elect them, then you provide that they shall be elected by the legislature, the same as under the present Constitution. Well, Sir, no evil can grow out of this amendment, if our present Constitution is right, certainly, for in one case these officers are elected by a majority of the people, and in the other they are to be elected by the same number, or otherwise precisely as we now elect them; in this particular, this Report coincides precisely with the method recognized in the old Constitution. Now, Sir, is that principle a correct one, as it stands in the old Constitution? If it is, then that upon which the Report of your Committee rests is also correct, for it is identically the same thing. And when gentlemen object to the Report because it is a departure from the majority principle, they object to our present Constitution—which in the minds of some gentlemen is perfect. We agree that it is a departure, to some extent. We have departed in the election of officers to be voted for by the whole people of the State, only so far as has been demonstrated that a departure was necessary, and no farther. We abide by the old Constitution in the main, in the election of State officers.

But other gentlemen say there should be a departure, in toto—that the plurality is the principle. Well, Sir, be it so, for the purposes of the argument. Suppose it is the principle, have we not accommodated these gentlemen in this Report, in a measure? Have we not adopted the plurality in every case where a political necessity can be shown to exist? I take it the people have no attachment to the rule of a less number than a majority, as a principle. They consent to the rule of a lesser number than a positive majority, as a political necessity, growing out of the multiplicity of parties. This Report adopts the plurality system of the election of all the officers except those which are now elected by the legislature. It leaves these officers to be elected by a majority of the people, if a majority can elect. Now, where is the great departure from principle in this Report, which gentlemen talk so much about, and say has been concocted in a pot-house, eating-house, or somewhere else?

But the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) objects to it, because it gives the plurality system in the choice of representatives; and says, sooner than choose by plurality, towns will go unrepresented, and vote not to send. Now, I submit to that gentleman, if in his sober judgment, he believes the towns will be less likely to send representatives under this third resolution, giving the plurality choice upon the second ballot, than they will under the present system? I put it to every member of the Convention, if the towns will not, in nine cases out of ten, be less likely to return full delegations under the system proposed by the gentleman from Natick, than under that proposed in the Report of the Committee? It is not because the towns do not want to be represented, that they do not send their full quota of representatives. They like to be represented, but every man is attached to his own party, and dislikes to give up in favor of another party; they also dislike these repeated elections, and therefore they allow themselves to go unrepresented; and perceiving no prospect of a choice, they vote not to send. I think there is no weight in the objection of the gentleman from Natick.

The gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) has well answered the argument of the gentleman, that a third part of the people of the Commonwealth, from the small towns, will choose the governor. The case has never arisen, and never will arise, when all the small towns will array themselves on one side, and all the large towns upon the other. There always will be some of the small towns which will sympathize with the large ones, and there always will be some of the large towns that will sympathize with the other small towns; and the case, therefore, will never arise where a portion of the House of Representatives, representing only a third part of the people, will choose the governor. Under this resolution, if adopted in your Constitution, I verily believe you will always have your governor chosen; if not by a majority of the people themselves, by the representatives of a majority of the entire people of the Commonwealth. And how is the case where the majority rule is applied exclusively? Why your governor has often been chosen by a minority during the last eight years. Where there are third parties, there always will be vacancies under the majority rule. And under that rule, a small majority, by possibility, may choose your governor. And I therefore think that this argument, as applied to the Report of this Committee, is entitled to no weight at all.

The gentleman from Framingham (Mr. Train) said that this Report would furnish an opportunity for “truck and dicker.” Now, Sir, I say that if there be any such opportunity furnished anywhere, it cannot be charged upon this Report, or upon this Convention, should it adopt this Report; because in these particulars it copies the present Constitution; and therefore the majority of this Convention can in no sense be charged—by those who have opposed all alterations in the Constitution—when they leave the Constitution as it is, with having furnished opportunities for “truck

Tuesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY.—WHITNEY—ALLEN—FROTHINGHAM—FRENCH.

[July 19th.

nd dicker." It is chargeable upon the present Constitution entirely, and not upon the Report now before us. Your present Constitution makes the same provision, so far as elections by the legislature is concerned; and the fault, if fault there be, rests upon that, and not upon us. The people have not complained, so far as I know, of the present mode of choosing governor; they have made no call upon us to change the present mode of choosing their State officers. In fact, I am not aware that any fault has been found with it; and therefore, I take it that the argument, so far as relates to alterations of the Constitution for choice by the legislature in case of failure to elect by majority our State officers, is, in this particular, groundless, with regard to the election of representatives, and other officers that the people must elect, if elected at all.

Every gentleman knows the effect upon communities, of frequent elections, where they are continued day after day; where neighbor is arrayed against neighbor, and friend against friend; ill-feeling is often engendered, ill-blood is produced, discord and strife provoked, all of which tend to degrade your electors, and bring them into disrepute, and thus drive the better portion of the people away from the exercise of the sacred right, and high privilege of self-government.

Now, Sir, if you want to make the people love and respect their government, let the people have an opportunity, at the ballot-box, to elect by a practicable number of their votes; and in case of their failure to elect by a majority, let a plurality suffice, in the election of members of the legislature; and let that legislature be chosen by the people, without engendering that ill-feeling and party animosity which is the certain result of frequent elections. But to return to the matter of "truck and dicker." I hold that, as to this matter, the Report of the Committee leaves it precisely where the present Constitution leaves it, with the exception that where the present Constitution allows the House of Representatives four candidates to "truck and dicker" upon, four persons to be voted for, this Report furnishes only three; therefore, I undertake to say that this Report has lessened the number of chances to "truck and dicker," and to that extent it has removed the objection.

Now, Sir, I think the repeated trials to elect, to which the people are subjected under a majority rule, is what the people of this Commonwealth wish to change in the Constitution. They look upon the plurality rule as a necessity in some cases; and they wish to adopt this rule only so far as a necessity exists, retaining the great principle established by our fathers: that in a majority, the only acknowledged sovereignty resides in an organic law, wherever it can be preserved consistently with the practical convenience of the great body of the people. And I think we ought to transmit to our posterity this great principle in our constitutional law.

I intend to vote for the Report of that Committee, as I cannot see any great objection to it, or that departure from principle which gentlemen have endeavored to make out. It provides that every elective officer, excepting such as are elected by the legislature, shall be elected under the plurality rule. If the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) favors the plurality rule, why does he not favor the Report of this Committee?

Mr. SCHOULER. I did not object to this part of the Report, but the other portion of it.

Mr. WHITNEY. I beg pardon of the gentleman. I am happy to hear that he is intending to support the Report of the Committee. I would much prefer, in the case of representatives to the general court, to have had a plurality upon the first choice. In the terms of the Committee, generally, it is true, there is an opportunity to ballot twice upon the same day, and there may be something gained by a second ballot. If men come together, and a caucus nomination is not acceptable to the sober judgment of the people of the town, they will repudiate that caucus nomination on the second ballot. They will once vote, and thus get an honest expression of sentiment upon the first ballot, as to who is the best man to represent them, and after having obtained that expression of opinion by this method, the Constitution will allow them to change the mode of election, if they fail to make choice by majority, to that of plurality. I think that such a plan will not work any great inconvenience to the people. I go for the majority rule as a principle; but I say we cannot abide by it, and as the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) said, in another matter the other day, we cannot carry theories always into practical demonstration in our government. We cannot abide strictly and legitimately by theories, and the theory which I take to be right here is the government of the majority. We depart from it in this case only so far as our convenience compels us to do so, and we give the people the opportunity to prevent any snap judgment, as the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) calls it, by a speedy vote. We will require a majority the first time. I believe the people all over the Commonwealth are looking to this Convention to lighten their burdens in reference to repeated elections. I hope this Convention will stand by the Report of the Committee, and, for one, I design to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) for I think it has produced confusion, and will, if adopted, leave this matter in a worse state than it was before. I intend to vote for the plurality in every case where the people are liable to be called together the second time, for an election; and in every case where the Constitution provides that they shall now be chosen by the legislature, I propose to let the Constitution remain as it is, only giving the opportunity to the people to elect by majority, if they will, if not, let State officers remain where they now are in the Constitution. By so doing, I see no great departure from principle. I think that upon a reexamination of the Report of the Committee, gentlemen will not find it such a monstrosity as it has here been, by some gentlemen, represented to be. I shall abide by the Report of the Committee exactly as it came from their hands.

The question was then taken on Mr. Wilson's amendment, and there were—ayes, 59; noes, 145.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I move to amend by striking out the third resolution entirely. I will not multiply words at this hour of the day. Striking out the third resolve, will leave the Constitution where we found it, and surely that must be a very good condition of things, and a wise provision of the present Constitution, when gentlemen, upon all hands find it so difficult to change it. Upon this question of plurality or majority, gentlemen have changed their opinions from day to day; not only single individuals, but bodies of men. My friend from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) and those with whom he associates, have acknowledged the changes which have been wrought in their minds, and, indeed, so rapidly have they been, that my head grows dizzy when I think about them. I was gratified with the course of the conservative members of this Convention in this one particular. I would not preserve the rust which remains in the Constitution; but, as there is great diversity of opinion in respect to any modification of one of its substantial propositions, I propose that we leave the Constitution, in regard to representation, just where we found it. I have not heard any great complaint, only in respect to the election of representatives. I believe that the practice which is allowed for the purpose of a choice, three days in November, and one in December, is amply sufficient on all ordinary occasions. I believe no serious difficulty has been found in this matter in the towns of the Commonwealth, when we had two parties, and none even when the Commonwealth has been divided into three. It was necessary to introduce another element, but I apprehend it will soon be removed from the political affairs of the Commonwealth, and we shall find that we shall go on hereafter, as we have heretofore, quite comfortably and conveniently, so far as respects the manner of choosing representatives, and the principles which will govern them, under the Constitution as it now stands. Differing in almost everything which has been proposed, let us unite in this matter, and retain that provision of the Constitution to which I have alluded, which has existed so long.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I shall go for as much of the plurality principle, as I can get; for I believe there is a demand upon the part of the people for it, and its adoption would save time and expense, and certainly party feeling. We have taken the vote upon this question several times. Yesterday, the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) moved an amendment, the effect of which was to strike out this plurality rule after the first choice. Then, this afternoon the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) to my great regret, moved an amendment, which amounted to the same thing. Now, we have another amendment moved by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Allen). All of these amendments would have the tendency of destroying the plurality rule, for the choice of representatives. I have nothing more to say, at this time, but I appeal to members of the Convention to stand fast by this rule, for the election of members to the House of Representatives; for it will be sure, notwithstanding what has been said by the gentleman from Natick, to cure that great evil—non-representation.

Mr. STETSON. I move the previous question.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I hope the gentleman from Braintree will withdraw his demand for the previous question, for a moment. I wish to offer the following amendment:—

But in case of the failure of an election on such ballot, then at a subsequent meeting, called for the purpose, the person having the highest number of votes, shall be deemed, and declared to be elected.

I have said a word in regard to this amend-

Wednesday,]

ELECTIONS BY PLURALITY, &c. — HOPKINSON — HILLARD — CHAPIN.

[July 20th.

ment before, and I labored under an entire mistake, when I supposed that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Natick, had for its object, the same effect.

Mr. STETSON. I rise to a question of order, and it is this: I moved the previous question, and I would like to know if debate can go on?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman from Berkley to discuss the merits of the question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Allen,) to strike out the third section.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. I rise to a question of order. I find the first resolution provides, substantially, that the governor, among other officers, in case of a failure of an election by the people, shall be elected in a particular manner pointed out, to wit: that a certain number of candidates shall be voted for by the House of Representatives, that they shall return the persons so elected to the Senate, out of which number the Senate is to make an election. I find by referring to the record of the 30th of May last, that this Convention, by a very large vote, passed upon this subject, and adopted a different provision. The resolve adopted on that day, reads as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to alter and amend the Constitution, so as to provide that in case of the failure of an election of governor by the people, he shall be elected by the Senate and House of Representatives, by joint ballot.

I suppose it is a general parliamentary rule, which, if it has not been applied here, has been frequently applied, that when a particular matter has been finally passed upon, a reconsideration may be moved within a certain time; but if that time has passed by, such a reconsideration cannot be moved. It appears to me that this provision is a violation of the rule, as it makes provision for the choice of governor, by another method than that already passed upon and determined by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The suggestion as to the question of order amounts to this: that this proposition is inconsistent with another proposition, which has been assented to by the Convention. It, therefore, revolves itself into a question of consistency, and that is a matter for the Convention to decide. The Chair understands the general parliamentary rule to be that where a subject has been disposed of, the same subject cannot be presented again. But, that rule is not invariably adhered to, under the general parliamentary law. It is also provided for by a rule of legislative bodies, as by our House of Representatives, that when a question has been rejected, that question shall not be presented again. But, that is not the case in this instance.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to have the resolution which has been heretofore adopted, read.

It was accordingly read.

The PRESIDENT. This is, in the judgment of the Chair, a question of consistency, and not of order, and is so laid down in Jefferson's Manual, which is the standard authority.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Boston. I would inquire, whether, when a matter has been acted upon, it can be taken up again?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot reply to a question of that general character, but only with reference to this particular case. The decision of the Chair is, that it is not for the Chair to decide, whether this is consistent or inconsistent; it is for the Convention to determine.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Newton. I would ask the Chair, as a question of order, would not this be a matter for discussion, and as this is like a question of order, whether, the previous question being ordered, it will cut off these two contradictory acts of the Convention?

The PRESIDENT. The rule is, that after the previous question has been ordered, the main question shall be taken without debate.

Mr. HILLARD, of Boston. I suppose that the previous action of the Convention has been limited to an expression of opinion, that it is expedient to do so and so; and I take it, that these expressions of opinion will be put into definite shape, and come up for the action of the Convention; and that when so brought before the Convention, and the inconsistencies are pointed out, instructions can be given so as to obviate them.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. I would ask for a division of the question, so far as relates to the first resolution, so that it may be taken upon that separately.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be taken on ordering the first resolution to a second reading.

The question being taken, there were, upon a division—ayes, 140; noes, 90.

So the resolution was ordered to a second reading.

The question was then taken separately, on ordering the second resolution to a second reading, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I ask for the yeas and nays on ordering the third resolve to a second reading.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the question being taken on ordering the third resolution to a second reading, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question was taken on each of the succeeding resolutions separately, and they were ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. DUNCAN, of Williams-town, the Convention then adjourned until nine o'clock, to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, July 20, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President at nine o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Lieutenant-Governor.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, of Bernardston, the amended resolves on the subject of the lieutenant-governor were taken from the table and placed upon the Orders of the Day.

Orders of the Day.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day, the first item being the motion of the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) to reconsider the vote by which the resolves relating to the incorporation of new towns had been indefinitely postponed.

On motion by Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown, this item was passed over.

The resolves on the subject of the Judiciary, and the resolves on the subject of Harvard College were also passed by.

General Laws for Corporations.

The resolve on the subject of General Laws for Corporations, being the next item on the calendar, was taken up for consideration. The question being upon its final passage.

The resolve was read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision that corporations shall not be created by special act, when the object of the incorporation shall be attainable under general laws.

Mr. CHAPIN, of Worcester. I voted against the resolution as amended, when it was before us on a previous occasion; and I wish to give some reason why I did so. It seems to me there is a misapprehension as to its meaning and operation, because I find that gentlemen voted in its favor on precisely different grounds. Some voted for it because it meant nothing, in their opinion; and others, because, I am bound to suppose, they expected it would accomplish something. Now the difficulty which I have in regard to it, is this: when I vote for a resolution, I wish to vote for one which is intelligible to myself, and the meaning of which I can, at least, think I understand. Now, I wish to make one proposition, and to ask this question of the members of this Convention: Do they wish to adopt in the Constitution a provision which will forever forbid the legislature granting any charter for a railroad? Some would say they do, and others that they do not. Now I ask if, upon that resolution, there is not a question whether the legislature will have the right to grant such a charter? What is the meaning of the clause "when the object of the incorporation shall be attainable under general laws." If it means that the legislature are to decide whether it is attainable or not under general laws in existence, why not say so? If it means an incorporation, the object of which is, in its nature capable of being attained under general laws which may be passed, why not say so? There is an uncertainty about it which makes it difficult for me to vote for it. I would not be willing to vote to give to the legislature power, under a general law to charter a corporation which should have the right to make a railroad or a turnpike so that the company might exercise the right of eminent domain, and so that it might appropriate your land and mine at its election, reserving to us only the right to have compensation. I believe that it should be left to the legislature to pass special acts for corporations of this kind. I am not an advocate for vested rights, but I am an advocate for the doctrine of good faith in legislation. If you and I, Sir, have invested our money in a railroad originally, it has not been for the purpose of making money by the investment, but for the purpose of encouraging the enterprise. Are we to make it necessary for the legislature to pass a general law on the subject, so that this question

Wednesday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—SCHOULER—DAVIS.

[July 20th.

can never be examined by the legislature as each case arises—and so that A, B and C may establish railroads where they please, and locate them over every acre of the Commonwealth without any special legislation upon the subject? I do not say that this resolution necessarily involves this result, but I do say that it leaves it in vagueness and uncertainty, and I am unwilling to adopt a resolution which contains in itself the elements of uncertainty, doubt, and consequent litigation.

I find, on looking at the Constitution of New York, there is a provision somewhat like this resolution; but there is in that Constitution an expression like this: "when in the judgment of the legislature it shall be expedient." Now suppose the legislature of Massachusetts should grant a special charter for a railroad, this resolution standing as a part of the Constitution. You go on and take stock in that road; and by and by, for some reason, you refuse to pay your assessment. The road is under way, the money has been invested, but persons who have taken stock, refuse to pay their assessments. Suppose they are proceeded against, and they come before the court and say that the legislature has no constitutional right to grant that special act. Then comes the question whether it was constitutional. It may be decided that this resolution means that no special act shall be passed when there is a general law upon the subject. Well, if it means that, it does not accomplish what is intended by its friends, because, all that the legislature would have to do would be to repeal the general law, whenever a special act should be required. It seems to me that the amendment introduced the other day by the gentleman from Oxford, contains the true principle. He offered an amendment that certain corporations for certain specified purposes, should not be chartered, except under general laws; and he specified what they should be. They were subjects in relation to which the principles are well settled, and which are well understood by the community. But it seems to me that there is a vagueness about this resolution which will give rise to litigation hereafter, and this in the establishment of an organic law of the Commonwealth we should carefully avoid; therefore, unless this can be amended so as to make it certain as to what we are doing, I feel bound to vote against it as I did before.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. After the very decided vote, in favor of this resolution the other day, it may appear like hardihood or impudence, to rise in the Convention, and attempt to speak against it. But, I do not believe that the Convention fairly understood the whole matter, when they voted upon it before. The question was taken immediately, after a very able and eloquent speech by the gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney,) and I think that he succeeded in presenting his side of the question exceedingly well, by leaving unsaid certain things which had better been said. The whole strength of his argument was, that we should have a general system of corporations. To that, I have no objections. We have now, upon our statute books, a general corporation act, for manufacturing and mechanical, and other business purposes of that kind. We have also, a general law with regard to banks. I have no doubt that these laws will stand permanently, upon the statute books of this Commonwealth. But, I am opposed to taking from the people forever, the right to say, whether they shall have the right, under any circumstances whatever, to make a special act, for any special purpose. I desire to let the Constitution remain, so that the people shall have the power. I do not wish, for instance, that the people of 1853, shall bind for all time to come, the people of other years. I wish the people to have the right to say through their representatives, after they have heard a case, whether the legislature shall act upon it or not, keeping these general laws all the time upon the statute book, so that whoever wish to form themselves into corporations under these general laws, may do it.

There is another objection to this resolution, and one which the gentleman from Conway, avoided altogether; and that is: if we place this provision in the Constitution, we give to those special corporations now in existence—banking corporations—a monopoly for the next twenty-five years at least; for their charters extend until 1780, and they were all chartered the year before last. The very legislature which passed this general banking law, also re-chartered every bank in the Commonwealth. The very legislature which passed the general joint stock law, also incorporated companies for mechanical purposes, so that the theory and argument used upon that occasion was, that we would have both systems in operation; that is, we should have a general banking law for all those persons who think a general banking system is best, and wish to avail themselves of it, and also with regard to joint stock companies.

The proposition before us is to deprive the legislature of any supervision whatever over this great question of corporations; and I think the argument put forth by the gentleman from Worcester, this morning, is, of itself, conclusive, that we ought not thus to tie up the hands of the legislature. There is no doubt at all but that we can pass a general law with regard to railroads, as well as with regard to banks; and I ask whether it is the best, the purest, and the surest policy to allow persons to form themselves into corporations for railroad purposes, and run a railroad through our land, if we have any, to any point they please; whether the effect of it will not be to depreciate the property of individuals now in corporations of that kind, and whether it will not bring up the question of parallel roads? After men have invested their property upon a pledge of the State, in building railroads, I think it ought to be protected in some degree, upon the faith which the State has given.

Now, Sir, I think the argument is unanswerable, that all these matters ought to be kept in the hands of the people, and that we should allow them to do as they think best when the circumstances come up; and that is all that I desire. I think it is wrong to cramp the legislature of our State in this way. We have already general laws, and I trust that these general laws will remain; I have no doubt that they always will remain. There was no attempt last year to repeal them, and there will be no attempt to repeal them. It seems to me that there is an argument, and there is a strong reason, why we should keep this great power in the hands of the people, so that they can act upon the cases as they come up, and not forever exclude them from being heard here through their representatives. I trust that the order will be defeated, and that we shall leave the Constitution precisely as it now stands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester. I trust, Mr. President, that this proposition will be adopted; and it strikes me that if the members of the Convention will consider the matter, it would be adopted almost by a unanimous vote, if they are desirous of the prosperity and happiness of the good old State of Massachusetts. It is true that this is an important question; it is one which is to effect a major portion of the wealth of Massachusetts; because, by the last valuation, there are in this State about six hundred millions of property, and a majority of all this property, or more than three hundred millions, is now tied up in special acts of incorporation, where certain individuals have special privileges over the mass of the people. This has been done substantially and mainly during the last quarter of a century. With general laws upon the statute book, last winter there were special acts of incorporation passed by our legislature, to the amount of twenty-six millions of dollars; notwithstanding we had a general banking law upon the statute book, banks were incorporated to the amount of ten millions of dollars, when there was not specie enough in Massachusetts, by the bank returns, to put into these new banks to carry them into operation. Gentlemen know what the law is, and what men have to swear to, in order to get these banks into operation; and yet in the face and eyes of the returns of these banks that there was only three millions of specie, not ten cents to redeem a dollar, of the deposits for the bills in circulation, ten millions of dollars of capital were created by these special acts last winter, for banks; and for other business corporations, some sixteen millions more.

Gentlemen can easily see the whole length and breadth of this question, if they will look at the volumes of our special laws. Here are eight large volumes of special laws for the few, and two volumes of general laws for the many. This will show that there has been a system of legislation here in this Commonwealth, for the last quarter of a century, for the benefit of the few, and not of the many. Now, the principle of the proposition is to bring corporations, whenever practicable, under general laws, so as to legislate for all the people of the Commonwealth. The objection which has been taken by my colleague, (Mr. Chapin,) in my judgment, has no force in this particular; because, when the application comes up for a special act, it is for the legislature to judge, before they grant it, whether it can be brought under the general law. There may be cases, and I have no doubt but that there will be cases, in which it will be necessary to grant a special act; but, whenever they can be brought under general laws, they should be brought under general laws that will apply to the whole subject, and operate alike upon all the people. If gentlemen would go into a consideration of this matter—take up the ponderous volumes of special acts, and see how much time has been spent in legislating for the few—they will perceive that hundreds of thousands of dollars will be saved, in the mere business of legislation, by the adoption of this simple principle; for, if they will look over the work of last winter, they will perceive that three-fifths of the whole time was spent upon special legislation. Now, the question is—and I want gentlemen to meet it directly—is it right to legislate for the few or for the many? Should not our laws operate for the benefit of the whole people of the Commonwealth, and not for the few?

Wednesday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—DAVIS—CHAPIN—GRAY.

[July 20th.

In my judgment, Mr. President, if we had not been trammelled by these special acts, which are calculated to cripple, to break down and destroy individual enterprise, the population of Massachusetts, instead of being a million, would have now been a million and a half; and instead of the property of the Commonwealth amounting to six hundred millions, it would have amounted to a thousand millions of dollars. What has made fifty-five thousand of the native citizens of Massachusetts emigrate into the State of New York, where they can live under general laws, and where there is a fair competition in all these branches of business?

Yes, Sir, fifty-five thousand of our native-born citizens have gone out from Massachusetts, as is shown by the last census; and they have gone into New York to get a livelihood, simply because they were trammelled here, and all competition was broken down by these corporations. Take an illustration. At first, individuals in this Commonwealth set up establishments for the manufacturing of railroad-cars, and they did well, and were prosperous. By and by it was discovered to be a prosperous business, and people petitioned the legislature, and got an act of incorporation. By the combination of capital they succeeded in putting down prices, and they endeavored to crush every individual who was in the business. They accomplished this, and failed every individual in the Commonwealth who was engaged in this business; and in the effort to do this, they failed themselves. If gentlemen will look into the history of these special corporations, they will perceive—for it is obvious on the face of it—what these special acts are desired for. It is because those who ask for them want special privileges. What are these special privileges for? They are to enable them to gain an advantage over the masses of the people; that is all the reason why they come to the legislature for these special acts. But, says the gentleman, this is to open the door too wide, you are going to make more corporations, if you have such a general law. But when this general law comes before the legislature, I have confidence enough in the representatives of the people, to believe that a general law, which is to affect the whole people, will be guarded, so that men cannot get, under a general law, what they get under special laws, where they come into the legislature and have hundreds of petitions for special acts piled up on the table of the House, and, by a system of log-rolling, secure the passage of an act giving special and exclusive privileges.

Mr. CHAPIN. I wish to inquire of my colleague, who is to decide whether the object of the corporation can be attained under general laws or not.

Mr. DAVIS. The legislature will judge as to that matter.

Mr. CHAPIN. I suppose that the legislature, under this general law, could pass a special law, declaring that, in their opinion, the object was not attainable under general laws, and should therefore be chartered. I will also ask the gentleman another question: whether, in his opinion, the legislature can pass a general railroad corporation act?

Mr. DAVIS. There are general laws relative to railroads. I admit that railroads should never be permitted without some action on the part of the legislature; but yet there may be general laws that will affect the whole. The principle is substantially that which has been adopted in other States. It has been adopted in the State of New York, and it has operated well there. If gentlemen will look at the last census, and see the tide of population which has gone into that State, they will see how much this system has operated for her advancement, and they will see one of the causes which has driven energetic young men from this State. This leaves it in the power of the legislature to determine the matter. Take, for instance, the banking law of Massachusetts. The general banking law now upon the statute book is much more stringent than these special laws, which have been given to these individuals; and that is the reason that the bank men do not like it. Under the present system they can issue any amount of money they please, without anything to redeem it, in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, in my judgment. The Constitution of the United States establishes the fact that gold and silver shall be the standard by which we are to estimate the value of our goods, lands, wares, and merchandise; and yet we have another standard here in Massachusetts. Ten millions of bank capital are created in a single year, and everything is raised in value, not comparing it by the gold and silver standard, but by the paper standard, which is not a representation of specie, because, by the last returns of the banks there is not ten cents on a dollar to redeem their circulation and deposits. Why are all these ups and downs in trade, commerce, and manufactures, except from the constant change and variation of the amount of this paper circulation? And this is done for the benefit of the few, who wring their thousands from the masses. But if these ten millions of bank capital had been created under a general law, instead of being created under special acts last winter, it would have had a material effect upon the prosperity of this whole Commonwealth. The man who sits in State Street has the control of more than seventy millions of dollars—the control of all the paper circulation in New England. Every gentleman knows very well that all the banks pay tribute there. No bank can go into operation in New England, until it pays tribute to State Street; and whenever they see fit to put on the screws there, and to make money scarce by curtailing the circulation ten millions, they can do it, and what is the consequence? The farmer's produce falls, and the manufacturer's produce falls in value—all the products of labor fall, and the knowing ones can take the advantage and buy up what they want. The screw is raised, money is plenty, prices increase, and the knowing ones reap the harvest; and the people suffer, and are defrauded in that way. Their honest earnings are taken up in this manner; whereas, if all this business had been entered into under this general banking law, which stands upon your statute book, they could only issue so far as they have the money to redeem their paper with, and every bill-holder would have been safe with his bills. But no! they go on passing these charters, these special acts to give privileges to the few at the expense of the many. I think there is a sufficient guard, if the legislature should pass a general act, for they will do it with vastly more care than they exercise in granting a special act. It is impossible for them to review all these special acts with much care, as numerous as they are. Nobody knows the law with regard to these special acts. You may ask the best lawyer in this Convention about any particular charter, and he could not tell you unless he had happened to have occasion to examine it, and thus to become familiar with its provisions. But if we had a general law, every lawyer would understand it. Now, the simple proposition is to bring these special acts under a general law. Why, Sir, they have become so numerous in this Commonwealth, that—as gentlemen will see if they turn to document No. 37—it takes ninety pages, to enumerate these special acts! Here is a return made by the Secretary of State, filling ninety pages, just to name these special acts. We have gone to the extreme of any State in the Union. If gentlemen will look at the special acts of other States, they will find nothing to be compared with it. Now, Sir, I ask for this simple provision; it leaves it for the legislature to judge whether these corporations require a special act, as each case presents itself. I know, that under different legislatures, there might be different decisions. There is a certain set of gentlemen who think that it is proper to legislate for the few at the expense of the many, and they would judge that it was best to grant a special act; but whenever you have a legislature who believe that they ought to legislate for the many, and not for the few, then they would give them a general law.

I see no objection to it, nor do I see why it does not obviate the objection of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) entirely; that it leaves it with the legislature to determine; so that either a railway, or other corporation, can obtain full privileges to carry forward any needful enterprise. But to give privileges to any corporation, that will tend to crush individual enterprise; to all that class of corporations I am opposed. If they are placed under a general law, then there is no special privilege, and they will do no harm.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. It appears to me, and I think it will so appear to most gentlemen, who look coolly at the question, that there are, in fact, two questions before us; and I certainly think—with all respect to some of the gentlemen who have preceded me—that these two questions have been confounded. These two questions are, first, that corporations—and, I will add, a great number of corporations—are an evil; that it is an evil to have this system of carrying on business by means of joint stock companies. Then, Sir, the next question is—suppose that it is not an evil, but a benefit upon the whole, at any rate a thing not to be prohibited—how shall these corporations be created? What is the most convenient and proper way of doing it? Now, I think, that these two ideas have been confounded by gentlemen in their arguments. We are told of millions of capital being locked up in corporations; we are told that the legislature favors a few among the many; and we are farther told, that these corporations destroy individual competition. That is one branch of the question. And if all these arguments are true to the extent to which gentlemen have maintained them, what would be the course which we ought to take? Why, Sir, I think that an unbiased observer would naturally say that your course is to have no more of them, and to put an end, as far as you can legally, to all that you have got—if not on a principle of immediate abolition, at least, on one of gradual

Wednesday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—GRAY.

[July 20th.]

abolition—of these joint stock companies. But, Sir, nothing of the kind is proposed here. I can admit every word uttered by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis,) and those who have taken the other side of the argument, and then I would ask them, what do you intend to propose? Do you make one corporation less? Not one. What then? Why, you give them a different origin. You change their birth-place, but their nature is the same.

Now, the gentleman talks about three hundred millions of capital being locked up in corporations, and says that in this you have been legislating for the benefit of the few, to the disadvantage of the many; and yet, Sir, if these corporations are such a great evil as gentlemen would fain make the people believe, they would open the door, and let every-body come in, and by this process increase the evil to an indefinite extent. I tell the gentleman from Worcester, that by adopting this course, he will legislate for the few after all, for these three hundred millions of property are held not by a very few, absolutely speaking; but, considering that those engaged in business corporations are confined to a few spots, and considering that the great masses of the rural and laboring population—considering that these great masses are not owners in joint stock companies, and cannot well be—you still leave a very large majority of the people without the limits of corporations.

Now, Sir, I have no objection to a system of joint stock companies, always bearing in mind that I reserve a control over them; I have no objection in that sense to legislate for the few, provided we benefit the few without injuring the just rights of the many. If we benefit the few directly, and the many more than they were benefited before; if we take away no man's privilege by giving a privilege to a few because they want such privilege, where is the harm? Gentlemen say that this is a monopoly. I think it is not. If gentlemen want to be incorporated, and they come to the legislature for such purpose, the legislature having investigated the matter, and feeling assured that no party is to be injured by such grant will, as a matter of course, as it is a matter of duty, give them a special act of incorporation. But if they do not want to be incorporated, if the people generally think that these corporations are a great and crushing evil, then the will of the people will reach the legislature, and the legislature will take pains not to let every-body be incorporated, but will endeavor to diminish such corporations as we have.

Sir, the distinction which the gentleman makes, reminds me of a law formerly existing in some of the petit German States, and which, for anything I know, may exist now. In England, and most other countries in which they have orders of nobility, the king or sovereign ennobles whom he pleases; but in these German States, baronies could be bought; every man might have a barony who could pay ten thousand dollars for it. And was it any less an order of nobility because a man bought it himself instead of its being conferred by the crown? No gentleman will say that it was. An order of nobility, I suppose gentlemen here would consider as an evil. I suppose that we would all think so. And what course do we take in this respect? Why, Sir, we prevent their existence altogether. But my friend, who considers corporations an evil, and would prevent men from going into them indiscriminately and without means, yet does not prevent the man with ten thousand dollars from going into them. After all, it seems to me that this is only legislating for the few; for the "many," as the gentleman calls them, stand in the same degree by the one proposition as by the other.

I thought the argument of the gentleman's colleague very conclusive, but it seemed to me that it did not go far enough. I shall be obliged to go against the amendment, and also against the Report, for reasons which I have stated before, and which I will not now repeat. But I will say a word or two in addition to what I have said, and my object is rather to direct the minds of gentlemen to what I consider the true state of the question—rather to lead them to take a discriminating view of the issues before them, and I think only a little reflection is necessary for that—than to urge any other argument.

Now, we speak of creating corporations by special acts; and we say that we voted to create them by general laws. The truth is, if we would be precise, that I think our system is a mixed system. Take an illustration. Say that a manufacturing company comes up, or that you and I establish a milling company at Lawrence. We come in and petition for an incorporation, with a certain amount of capital. The legislature grants us an act of some twenty lines; and what is the provision that it puts in? It grants a charter with all the powers, and subject to all the liabilities of the 38th chapter of the Revised Statutes. The legislature grants this incorporation partly by general act, and partly by special act, covering the few points which, from the nature of the case, cannot be covered by a general act. They retain the provision of allowing persons to incorporate themselves under a general law, unless they see some objection to it. Now, let me ask, is not that distinction a wise one? Are gentlemen prepared to say that every-body ought to go in under all circumstances, and that to all future time? I think not. Is this to be done in regard to railroad corporations, canal corporations, and the like? No, Sir; because you would put into their hands the power of eminent domain. By a construction of the Constitution not warranted in its express terms,—as an original question, I think not a clear one, nevertheless highly necessary it may be,—we give them a power of eminent domain; we hand over to them our sceptre, and they march through any man's land they please; and they give him such remedy—the best remedy, perhaps, that can be had; but how near it is to perfect remedy, gentlemen can pretty well judge—they give him such remedy as he can find, by going to law for his recompense; for it does happen, that these corporations are sometimes difficult to deal with. But we give them certain powers which they generally take care to exercise. For instance, here is a private corporation in some business or other with which the public interest is connected, say a railroad company; or, if you choose, take another class of corporations—those engaged in the banking business, as that has been so specially referred to. Well, Sir, these corporations are connected with the public interest. They are not mere corporations for the transaction of business benefiting or injuring the public it may be by their relations with those who are their customers, or who transact business with them; but they have the power of regulating the whole currency of the State, and that I call a high public power. They can affect the prosperity of those who can least afford to lose any anything, and therefore, I think that these are corporations over which the legislature ought to exercise some control. They ought to adopt something more than a general act. But the general act they have now. They have the 38th chapter of the Revised Statutes, which, after all, regulates the banks; a provision enforcing the soundness of their currency; a provision which enforces their keeping themselves in good condition, as far as banking men under the supervision of the statute can affect it. These, and other provisions of importance, are all contained in the general act. Well, but my friend thinks that there ought to be other provisions—provisions as to the investment of their capital—provisions like that existing in the New York system; establishing a different basis of currency, a better system than ours. Now, how can that objection be met? Why, Sir, it can be met in a much less hazardous way than he proposes to meet it. Let him go into the legislature and take up the 38th chapter of the Revised Statutes and persuade the legislature to alter it, or else learn a lesson which we all have to learn even here—that is, to be voted down when we think and feel that we are right. That is the course, Sir.

Now, Sir, I will state what I think has had great effect upon the minds of gentlemen, and that is the mere fact of the saving of the time of the legislature. Gentlemen meet here, and they sit here—it may be for a hundred and twenty days—they come here every morning with a most determined purpose to end the session at the earliest hour; but they find, somehow or other, that the session spins on, and issue after issue arises, and time after time is fixed upon for adjourning, and one branch fixes a time and the other branch postpones it, as it may be; and, after all, the legislature, like all things human, does at sometime come to an end, at a time which nobody anticipated when they commenced their labors—that is, at a later day. Well, Sir, it is customary to ascribe all this to the immense mass of "private business," as it is called; but, Sir, I think they ascribe too much to that cause. If it were of any purpose to say much about it, I should say that the size of the House had something to do with it, but that might be a disputed point. But there is no dispute that the gentlemen of the House of Representatives do sit here for the first three weeks, appearing to those who are without as if they were helping each other to do nothing, while they are quietly preparing their business. But are we sure that this can be dispensed with? Take, for instance, a railroad corporation. We wish, when such a corporation is going to march through the land of individuals, to know something about the line they are going to take; we wish to know something, not only about the practicability of the enterprise, but something, also, in regard to the route that is to be taken. Is not this necessary and proper? Are we prepared to say—as my colleague has already spoken upon that point—that any company of men may come in and organize, under a general act, and run a railroad where they please? Sir, how can we say so? There might be a difference in the cases. Ten years ago, if we had authorized a railroad to run through the city of Lawrence, or had we authorized gentlemen to build a railroad where they pleased, they might have run a road through that ground, and would have done no more harm than driving a railroad through the centre of Africa. But what should we say of driving a railroad through the centre of Lawrence now? So with banking corporations. Suppose that application should be made for a bank at Lawrence, with a capital of two millions. The legislature would hesitate. They might grant it to a company in State Street. They are both respectable places, but are far from being equal in the control of business.

Wednesday.]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—GRAY—FRENCH—WATERS.

[July 20th.

The gentleman talks about the control in State Street. Sir, he must alter something else than general laws, before he can affect anything here. There are such things as general laws of trade, which are usually above the statute laws of any particular place, and are world-wide in their application and effect. What is done on the London exchange, we feel here; and twenty declarations of independence would not exempt us from it. But suppose the gentleman takes a general act—what is to prevent the owner of twenty millions from marching into State Street and doing all that the Suffolk, or any other bank, does now? Sir, I am at a loss to see it.

Now, Sir, I did not intend to trouble the House again upon this subject, and I should not have troubled them as it is, if I thought their minds were made up upon the subject. I did think that the question would not stand the worse for a little farther consideration. But, be a corporation a benefit, or be it an evil, they will be incorporated, and it is assumed that they will be incorporated under this general act; that if there are any provisions that ought to be incorporated in a general act, they can be inserted in the thirty-sixth chapter of the Revised Statutes now, and every corporation can, by its charter, be referred to that statute, and to the forty-fourth chapter, which puts them all under the control of the legislature. I say, Sir, that I humbly conceive that all the evils which result from corporations, will result from them whether they create themselves, or whether they are created under a general act. I say that the number of holders of stock in joint stock companies are pretty numerous, but they are not a majority, or anything like a majority, or even anything like a respectable minority, of the whole population of the State. But whether we legislate for the few or for the many, the question now seems to be, whether we shall legislate for them by general act, or by special act.

But I go back, for a moment, to the objection which I advanced upon a former occasion. I am ready to leave this matter with, and I think it is best to trust this matter to the legislature; but I would also say—and if I ever expected to be a member of the legislature, I would say the same thing there—I think it desirable to work by general laws as far as we can conveniently do so. I can see how we can have general laws for insurance and manufacturing companies, because they are companies for the transaction of private business. They do not seem to come in contact with the public generally, but only with their own customers. But as to railroad companies, they exercise the right of eminent domain, and come in contact with many people who have nothing to do with them of their own will, and never want to have. I say, with regard to banking corporations, that a state of things may arise in which the legislature may properly hesitate as to granting a charter, out of regard to what they think will be the effect upon the currency of the State, and in which effects every man, woman, and child in the Commonwealth are interested, and by which the poor are affected more than the rich, because they have their all to lose by it, and less discretion and power to protect themselves from loss.

One word only, will I say farther, in regard to real estate corporations. Shall we part with the power of discrimination of, and control over, them? Real estate corporations are sometimes a matter of necessity; for instance, those in relation to wharves and flats. Ever since the formation of the Constitution, I suppose, such corporations have been formed by law, because it is difficult to manage such matters in any other way. A limited partnership is so impracticable and inconvenient in regard to them, as to prevent the adoption of such partnerships. But the legislature might well hesitate to create many such real estate corporations as have been created heretofore, and may hereafter be incorporated. I do think that whole matter had better be left in the hands of the legislature. They can, if they see fit, adopt every one of the ideas of my friend from Worcester, (Mr. Davis,) and what is a matter of some consequence, if experience, which may throw some new light upon their minds, should lead them to vary and modify their course hereafter, the door will be open, to enable them to do so.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of these resolves, and particularly the third one. I never was very friendly to corporations. I was never fond of monopolized privileges, for I always supposed that corporations got more than belonged to them.

In reference to banks, let us look at the matter, and see whether or not, we ought to have a general law by which all the people who wish to be incorporated into such institutions, who wish to lay aside a part of their property, and be incorporated on the rest, may not have the privilege. Banks have undertaken to furnish the country with a circulating medium, and how stands the matter now, under that attempt? Go out and make inquiries in this city, and the people will tell you that they are greatly embarrassed every day for the want of change to do their ordinary and daily business. Undertaking to furnish the country with a circulating medium, they do not do it.

Are banks incorporated monopolies? Is there any other class of people that have the privileges which pertain to banking corporations? I wish some one would show me any other class of the community, who are drawing interest on their own indebtedness—on their own promises to pay. Other people are obliged to pay interest upon their promises to pay, but banks are exempted from that rule.

There is another consideration connected with this matter. There never was a State bank created, which was not created directly in violation of the Constitution or Federal Compact. Nothing in that instrument was more perfectly guarded than the regulation of the currency. Its framers saw at a single glance, that the regulation and control of the currency, was the highest prerogative of sovereignty, and they saw that they could not put its control into the possession of any body of men, or corporation of men, and they gave it to the whole people of the United States; to my father and to yours, Mr. President, to you and to me as their descendants. They said to the people, you shall have the control of the currency. The people could exercise that power only through their representatives in congress. The Constitution declared that congress should have the power to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin. But how is that matter regulated now? Who coins money now? That power was given to the whole people, but where is it now? In the hands and possession of the banking corporations. Are they acting for the public good, or for their own private benefit? This power, Sir, has been stolen from the people, and they do not know it. What power is there in congress to regulate State banking?

Well, it was said by the gentleman who a few moments since stood where I now do, (Mr. Gray,) that they control not only the currency of the country, but regulate and control the value of the whole property of the country. Is that an exclusive privilege, or is it not? Is it an exclusive privilege to diminish the value of any man's property, when they choose, in order to make the most of it, and to increase the value of that property when it is for their interest to do so? Now, when the people come forward and ask for a general law, and ask not to be shut out from the privileges which other people have, the favorites of the banking system come up and make a great complaint, and say that it would be very improper to do so. They say the people ought not to have this privilege, and that it does not belong to them.

Banks promise to pay, and they give their notes promising to pay on demand. How is their capital stock made up? Is it made up of specie; or is it made up of stock notes? Very poor property that, with which to pay specie upon demand. Thus it is improper, very improper indeed, that the people collectively should have a general act giving them equal privileges with others, so long as it is important that those who now have the power, should retain it.

I hope, Sir, this resolve will pass, so that the people shall have some chance. Now, what does this power of incorporation do? It gives to a certain class of the community the right to trade to any amount, whilst at the same time they are held responsible to pay only a specified amount. Has any other class of people that privilege? No. An individual is held to pay his debts, to the last farthing, and that is right. I hope, Sir, in order to remedy this great complaint which is now made throughout the country, that the next legislature which convenes, will pass a law that no bill under the denomination of five dollars, shall be passed in the State of Massachusetts; and if they do that, believe me, there will be no complaint of a want of change, to do business with. I submit the question to the Convention, whether or not Mr. Webster was right, when he said that the most effectual way of fertilizing the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow, is this State banking system.

Mr. WATERS, of Millbury. In the discussion of this subject, frequent allusions have been made to the industrial interests of Massachusetts, without defining what they are; and, by way of episode, we have been entertained, occasionally, by a chapter upon free trade. I propose to present, from official documents, some statistics, to show what those interests are, and also to prove what has been the effect produced upon them, by the repeal of the protective tariff in 1846—that being regarded as an approximation to free trade.

Wednesday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — WATERS.

[July 20th.

To these facts, I bespeak the candid attention of the members, as business men, without regard to party affiliations or favorite theories in political economy, for they involve questions vital to the growth and prosperity of our ancient Commonwealth. What are the industrial interests of Massachusetts?

From a volume of statistics, published by the Secretary of State for the year ending April 1, 1845, the annual products of the principal branches of industry, were as follows:—

I. COTTON MANUFACTURES.

Cotton Cloth,	$12,193,449
Calico,	4,779,817
Bleaching and Coloring,	2,166,000
	$19,139,266

II. BOOTS AND SHOES.

Boots and Shoes,	$14,799,140
Leather,	3,836,657
	$18,635,797

III. FISHERIES.

Whale,	$10,371,167
Mackerel and Cod,	1,484,137
Candles, Sperm and Oils,	3,613,796
	$15,469,100

IV. AGRICULTURAL.

Hay,	$5,214,357
Grain,	2,228,229
Potatoes,	1,309,030
Butter,	1,116,709
Wood, Bark and Charcoal,	1,088,656
Fruit,	744,540
Vegetables,	515,082
Cheese,	398,174
Wool,	365,136
Milk,	304,917
Beef, Brooms, Honey, Hops, Poultry, &c.,	917,787
	$14,202,617

V. WOOLLEN MANUFACTURES.

Woollen Goods,	$8,877,478
Carpeting,	834,322
Worsted Goods,	654,566
Hosiery and Yarn,	94,892
	$10,461,258

VI. IRON.

Rolled and Slit, and Nails,	$2,738,300
Castings,	1,280,141
Machinery,	2,022,648
Cars and Carriages,	1,343,676
Anchor, Cables, &c.,	538,966
Shovels,	275,212
Scythes,	113,935
Cutlery, Axes, and Edge-tools,	242,616
Engines and Steam Boilers, Ploughs,
Tacks, Tools, &c.,	1,433,807
	$9,989,201

VII. PAPER,	1,850,273
-----------------------	-----------

VIII. STRAW BONNETS AND PALM LEAF HATS,	1,649,496
IX. VESSELS,	1,172,147
X. GRANITE,	1,065,999

Adding to the above, various miscellaneous items, the aggregate of the products of the State for that year, is $115,000,000.

From these data, it is obvious, that the most prominent interests of Massachusetts are manufacturing and mechanical, whose aggregate annual products are at least eighty millions out of one hundred and fifteen millions—the entire products of the State. Hence, it follows as a necessary corollary, that the prosperity of the State depends chiefly upon the success of those interests. When they are prosperous, the whole are prosperous, embracing all other interests; and vice versa. This is a proposition which the experience of the last quarter of a century has abundantly established.

Of these interests, the leading in amount of products is the cotton, which amount is greatly understated in the above table, from the fact that some large establishments refused to make any return. In amount of capital invested, this interest also far exceeds either of the others. To manufacture cotton cloth requires a large investment in buildings, motive power, fixtures, machinery, &c., but in many kinds of business—the boot and shoe, for example—no such outlay is necessary. Indeed in most kinds of business the annual products largely exceed the capital invested, while in the cotton they fall below.

What has proved to be the effect upon this interest of the repeal of the tariff of 1842, in 1846?

I am prepared to prove, from official documents, that by that change in our national policy, Massachusetts has been set back one hundred millions of dollars in her valuation, and in amount of products seventy-five millions annually, amounting, in the six ensuing years, to four hundred and fifty millions. This statement will doubtless strike some minds as astounding and incredible, but I believe I am fully fortified by facts to sustain it.

The following table, taken from the Patent Office Report, 1851, (Agricultural,) exhibits the statistics of the cotton manufacture in different States:—

STATES.	Number of establishments.	Capital invested.	Value of entire products.
1. Massachusetts,	213	$28,455,630	$19,712,461
2. New Hampshire,	44	10,950,500	8,830,619
3. Rhode Island,	158	6,675,000	6,447,120
4. Pennsylvania,	208	4,528,925	5,322,282
5. Connecticut,	128	4,219,100	4,257,522
6. New York,	86	4,176,920	3,591,989
7. Maine,	12	2,329,700	2,596,356
8. Maryland,	24	2,236,000	2,120,504
9. Virginia,	27	1,908,900	1,486,384
10. Georgia,	35	1,736,156	2,135,044
11. New Jersey,	21	1,483,500	1,109,524
12. North Carolina,	28	1,058,800	831,342
13. South Carolina,	18	857,200	748,337
All others,		2,884,700
Total,	1,094	$74,501,031	$61,869,184

Of the capital invested in New Hampshire and

Maine, it is estimated that two-thirds, at least, belong to people of Massachusetts, which, added to the amount invested in this State, makes an aggregate of $37,500,000 capital owned by Massachusetts in the cotton manufacture—a sum equal to fully one-half of the whole capital invested in this business in the United States.

The following table, taken from the same Report, exhibiting the number of bales of cotton manufactured in this country, from 1841 to 1850, will show how the cotton business was affected by the tariff of 1842, and also by its repeal in 1846:—

1841—267,850
1842—325,714
1843—346,744
1844—389,000
1845—422,597
1846—427,627
1847—531,772
1848—518,039
1849—487,769
1850—404,108

From this table it appears, that in six years, from 1841 to 1847, under the influence of the tariff of 1842, the cotton manufacture increased in this country 264,000 bales—an expansion equal to 100 per cent., while, in three years, from 1847 to 1850, after that tariff was repealed, it actually receded 127,664 bales, a contraction equal to 22 per cent. These remarkable results are to be traced directly to the repeal of the tariff of 1842, and no other cause can be assigned.

Let us now glance, for a moment, at the condition and prospects of the cotton-growing interest of the South. The following table, taken from Patent Office Reports, exhibits the annual number of bales produced, average price and value of the same for seven years, from 1846 to 1852 inclusive:—

1846	1,778,651	7.81	$42,767,341
1847	2,347,634	10.34	53,415,848
1848	2,728,596	7.61	61,998,294
1849	2,096,706	6.4	66,896,967
1850	2,355,257	11.3	71,984,616
1851	3,015,000	12.11	112,316,317
1852	3,400,000		136,000,000

From the above, it appears, that since 1846, the cotton crop has increased, in bales, 1,600,000,—equal to one hundred per cent. nearly, and in value, $93,000,000,—exceeding two hundred per cent. This accounts for the high degree of prosperity prevailing at the South, and the great advance in the price of slave property. In the face of this rapid and enormous increase of crop, the price has been fully sustained, which proves that the consumption has advanced pari passu, with the production. Of course there has been an increase in the cotton manufacture in the same proportion. The positive increase of the crop, is equal to four times the number of bales manufactured in this country, and consequently the increase in the number of spindles, must be equal to four times the whole number running in this country. Where has this extraordinary increase of manufacture been developed? Not certainly, in Massachusetts, nor in the United States, as has already been shown. While the cotton growing interest of the South, has increased since 1846, nearly two hundred per cent., the manufacturing interest of the North has remained

Wednesday,]

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — WATERS — HALLETT.

[July 20th.

stationary. But this increase of manufacture, corresponding to the increase of crop, has been developed mostly in England. The newspapers contained an account a short time ago, of one mill erected by Mr. Titus, of Manchester, England, covering six acres; and many other similar accounts of increase there, have been published.

Had this expansion been made in this country, it would have added two hundred millions of dollars to our manufacturing capital, and one hundred and fifty millions to our products annually. This loss of business is fairly chargeable to the advocates of free trade. What the country has gained by way of compensation, I have yet to learn. As one-half of the cotton manufacture in the United States, belongs to Massachusetts, it follows that one-half of this loss falls to her—that is to say, she has lost in her valuation, by the repeal of the tariff in 1846, one hundred millions, and in annual products, seventy-five millions, amounting in six years, to four hundred and fifty millions of dollars. This is not a matter of conjecture, nor of prophecy, nor of theoretic speculation, but it is a matter of absolute demonstration—a result, which a few short years has clearly proved. No other cause but the repeal of the tariff in 1846, can be assigned, and no theory of the free traders, can account for it. Here is experience against theory—practice against prophecy. If to any member these facts seem to be exaggerated, I would say, that no estimate was made for collateral interests, such as building, machinery, foundries, rise of real estate, trade of all kinds, &c. &c., which, when made, will be found to far outweigh all deductions that can be justly claimed on the score of exaggeration. If then, such disastrous results have accrued to the leading interests of Massachusetts, from an approximation to free trade, what are we to expect from its full realization, which some gentlemen on this floor, have, with so much confidence predicted, at no distant day? The member for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) in some remarks which he made in favor of this doctrine, was so sanguine of its early adoption by the people, that he said he would venture to predict, that in ten years, it would be the prevailing sentiment of the North; that Boston itself, would adopt it, and that at some remote period hereafter, a Custom House would be as great a curiosity, as the Coliseum of Rome, or the Temple of Carnac.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Millbury is discussing the tariff, and the doctrine of free trade. Now, I am anxious to make a speech upon that subject of several hours in length. But if it is to come in here, I wish to know whether the subject is legitimately before the Convention?

Mr. WATERS. Whether legitimately before the Convention or not, I did not introduce the subject. In the discussion of this and various other questions, we have had several speeches in favor of free trade, and no member was called to order. Regarding this as a most fallacious and destructive doctrine, it seemed to me that some remarks, per contra, would not be ill-timed nor out of order. However, I do not wish to pursue the matter against the wishes of the House.

Cries of "Go on," "Go on."

If the expansion of business to which I have referred had been developed in this country, it would have enhanced the value of every square inch of territory in Massachusetts; added thousands to her population, and opened new avenues of wealth and employment. The programme of those gigantic enterprises at Holyoke and Lawrence would have been filled up, and scarce a foot of available water power in the State would have remained unoccupied. Many a water-fall now wasting its power upon the desert air, would have been brought into requisition, and filled the surrounding region with the music of prosperous industry. In short, the six years of leanness ensuing the year 1846, would have been years of plenty and prosperity. It has been a common impression in the country, even among manufacturers themselves, that under the tariff of 1842, this interest was stimulated to an unnatural growth, and was in danger of a reaction, from being overdone. But the foregoing statistics prove that this opinion was entirely erroneous; that rapid as was the expansion, it did not keep pace with the growth of the crop, nor the consumption of the fabric, but fell far behind both. Massachusetts has probably never known a period of so rapid growth and development, as from 1842 to 1847. Before this period, say from 1836 to 1842, there was a general crash, or breaking down of all kinds of business. General bankruptcy, and universal prostration prevailed, as though a tornado had swept over the land, until the passage of the tariff in 1842, when there was a simultaneous quickening into life of all our dead and prostrate interests; and they continued to grow in an accelerating ratio, until that Act was repealed, when their growth was arrested, as by a sudden frost. Some of them have since remained stationary—few have flourished—during the six famine years, being sustained chiefly by the strength and impetus before acquired, to the present year, which fortunately proves to be a year of plenty and prosperity, such as Massachusetts has not seen since 1845. What is the cause of this great change, this universal and exuberant prosperity? Not, certainly, that there has been any change in the policy of our government. It was formerly thought that loyalty on the part of the citizen, and protection of person and property, on the part of government, were reciprocal duties; but that is now called an exploded idea.

This change, it is well known, has been brought about, chiefly, if not solely, by the rise of labor in Europe. The drain of laborers from the workshops of Europe, to the gold mines of Australia and other regions, has been so heavy as to cause a general rise in the prices of labor and manufactured products, carrying them up to a grade where our manufacturers and laborers can thrive and prosper. No reason can be assigned, why we cannot, at all times, manufacture as cheap as in Europe, except the price of labor. If capital is cheaper there, so also are taxes very much higher. To obviate this difficulty—the higher price paid here for labor, and also to prepare the way for the glorious advent of free trade, the member for Berlin (Mr. Boutwell) proposes, and in his prophetic vision confidently predicts, the importation of large numbers of coolies from China. In this direction his prophetic vision even discerns an antidote for the removal of slavery itself!

Suppose this to happen; what is to become of all the Yankee boys and girls who now operate the machinery of our mills, and who are thus under-bid in the price of labor? Are they to be driven out from their native land, to make room for a horde of demi-barbarians from the Celestial Empire? Is that a wise and paternal statesmanship, looking to the best good of our country and our race? Besides, is the gentleman quite sure that these impressive Celestials, in wooden shoes, and with pumpkin-vine queues, are fitted to perform the labor of our versatile Yankees, with the same tact and rapidity? With all due deference to that gentleman, I must say, that this vision of his seems to me more like a creature of fancy, than the gift of prophecy.

This whole, and much vexed question of protection, resolves itself into a question of labor. Capital, in this country, needs no protection. The rate of interest is always about three times as much as it is in England, while the price of labor there, averages about one-third as much as is paid here. Labor can never be so cheap under a democracy as under a despotism. The former is founded upon numbers, and makes no distinctions of persons, between the laborer and the lord, the mechanic and the millionaire. To enable the laborer therefore, to maintain the dignity of his station, it is necessary that he should be able to read books, take newspapers, educate his children, and have many of the comforts of life which are unknown to the boors of England, the serfs of Russia, or the coolies of China. He must maintain a higher and more expensive style of living, and ought not, therefore, to be exposed to a competition with the bone soup, and pauper labor of Europe. "But," say the advocates of free trade, "it is on the very ground of sympathy for the poor laboring man, that we advocate this doctrine. A tariff is indirect taxation, and operates unequally. In the article of sugar, for example, the poor man consumes six times, it may be, as much as the millionaire, and consequently pays six times as much tax. This system surrounds him unseen, like the atmosphere, and he does not know how he is abused." Very likely. Probably he never will. For argument's sake admit all this to be true. If by paying one cent a day extra, on sugar, and as much more on a few other articles, he gets, instead of fifty cents, from a dollar and a half, to two dollars per day more for his labor, is he not the gainer? Where in the wide, wide world, is the laborer so well paid, as in this country? And here, especially in New England, labor is never in so great demand, nor so high, as at periods when the manufacturing interest is prosperous. Witness the present year, the years 1844, 1845, and 1846. For the reverse, witness the years from 1836 to 1842—from 1846 to 1850.

Who are the great sticklers for free trade in this country? Importers of foreign merchandise, resident agents of foreign manufacturers, bankers, and brokers, who have expended vast sums of money to buy up and subsidize some of our most influential presses. Much the largest proportion of the press, in this country, is concentrated in cities; and of that, a large share is enlisted in the foreign importing business. Hence, the general delusion which prevails upon this subject.

Another class of very obstreperous free traders, are the Southern planters, whose laborers are slaves. "Labor," say they, "should come from that quarter where it can be obtained cheapest." If this is a correct doctrine, we should expect that, like charity, it would begin at home. Let us see how their practice conforms to their teachings. The great interest of the South, is the slave

Wednesday,]

THE JUDICIARY, &c. — WATERS — WHITNEY — STETSON — MORTON — KNOWLTON — DANA.

[July 20th.]

